I leide an ear ay to° as I by went
And herde al, and thus in myn heart I caste:°
135 'Of long abidinge here I may me repent.
Lest that of hastiness I at the laste
Answer amiss, best is hence hie faste,°
For if I in this press° amiss me gye,°
To harm wole it me turn and to folie.'°
140

And this I deemed° well and knew well eke,° Whatso° that ever I should answer or seie,°
They wolden not han holde° it worth a leke.°
Forwhy,° as° I had lost my tounge keie,°
Kepte I me close,° and trussed me my weie,°
145 Dropping° and heavy and all woe bistad.°
Small cause had I, methoughte, to be glad.

My spirits laboureden ever ful busily
To painte countenance,° cheer and look,°
For° that men spake of me so wondrously,
150 And for the very shame and fear I qwook.°
Though° myn herte had be dippid° in the brook

It wet and moist was ynow<sup>o</sup> of my swoot,<sup>o</sup>
Which was now frosty cold, nowe fiery hoot.<sup>o</sup>

155 And in my chamber at home whan that I was Myself alone I in this wise<sup>o</sup> wrought.<sup>o</sup>
I straight<sup>o</sup> unto my mirror and my glass,<sup>o</sup>
To look how that me of my chere thought,<sup>o</sup>
If any<sup>o</sup> other<sup>o</sup> were it than it ought,
For fain<sup>o</sup> would I, if it not had been right, 160 Amended<sup>o</sup> it to my cunning<sup>o</sup> and might

Many a saut<sup>o</sup> made I to this mirror,
Thinking, 'If that I look in this manere
Amonge folk as I now do, noon<sup>o</sup> error
Of suspect<sup>o</sup> look may in my face appere.
165 This countenance,<sup>o</sup> I am sure, and this chere,<sup>o</sup>
If I it forth<sup>o</sup> use, is nothing<sup>o</sup> reprevable<sup>o</sup>
To hem that han conceites<sup>o</sup> resonable.'

And therwithal<sup>o</sup> I thoughte thus anoon:<sup>o</sup>
'Men in her<sup>o</sup> owne cas<sup>o</sup> been blind alday,<sup>o</sup>
170 As I have herde seie many a day agoon,<sup>o</sup>
And in that same plight<sup>o</sup> I stonde may.
How shall I do? Which is the beste way
My troubled spirit for to bring in rest?
If I wiste<sup>o</sup> how, fain<sup>o</sup> would I do the best.'

Sithen<sup>o</sup> I recovered was, have I full oft Cause had of anger and impacience,
Where I borne have it easily<sup>o</sup> and soft,<sup>o</sup>
Suffring<sup>o</sup> wrong be done to me, and offence,
And not answered again,<sup>o</sup> but kept silence, 180 Lest that men of me deem<sup>o</sup> would, and sein,
'See how this man is fallen in<sup>o</sup> again.'

As that I ones<sup>o</sup> from Westminster<sup>5</sup> cam,

Vexed full grievously with thoughtful hete,
Thus thought I, 'A greet fool I am,
185 This pavement adaies thus to bete,
And in and out laboure fast and swete,
Wondringe and heavinesse to purchase,
Sithen I stand out of all favor and grace.'

And than thought I on that other side,
190 'If that I not be seen among the press,
Men deme will that I myn hede hide,
And am worse than I am, it is no lees.
O Lorde, so my spirit was resteless.
I soughte reste and I not it fonde,
195 But ay was trouble ready at myn honde.

I may not let a man to imagine
Far above the moon, if that him liste.
Thereby the soth he may not determine,
But by the preef been thinges known and wiste.
200 Many a doom is wrapped in the miste.
Man by his dedes and not by his lookes
Shall knowen be. As it is written in bookes,

By taste of fruit men may wel wite and knowe
What that it is. Other preef is ther none.
205 Every man woote well that, as that I trowe.
Right so, they that deemen my wit is gone,
As yet this day there deemeth many one
I am not well, may, as I by hem go,
Taste and assay if it be so or no.

Uppon a look is harde men hem to ground
What a man is. Therby the soth is hid.
Whether his wittes sick been or sound,
By countenance is it not wist ne kid.
215 Though a man hard have once been bitid,

God shield<sup>o</sup> it should on him continue alway.
By communinge<sup>o</sup> is the best assay.<sup>o</sup>

220 I mene, to commune<sup>o</sup> of thinges mene,<sup>o</sup>
For I am but right lewed,<sup>o</sup> doubtless,
And ignorant. My cunning<sup>o</sup> is ful lene.<sup>o</sup>
Yet homely reason<sup>o</sup> know I neverethless.
Not hope<sup>o</sup> I founden be<sup>o</sup> so reasonless<sup>o</sup>
I can<sup>o</sup> no more. Preve<sup>o</sup> may the dede.<sup>o</sup>

225 If a man once falle in drunkenesse,
Shall he continue therein everemo<sup>o</sup>?
Nay, though a man do in drinking excesse<sup>o</sup>
So ferforth<sup>o</sup> that not speak he ne can, ne go,
And his wits well nigh been refte<sup>o</sup> him fro,
230 And buried in the cup; he afterward
Cometh to himself again, else were it<sup>o</sup> hard.

Right so, though that my wit were a pilgrim,
And wente fer<sup>o</sup> from home, he cam<sup>o</sup> again.
God me devoided<sup>o</sup> of the grievous venim
That had infected and wilded<sup>o</sup> my brain.
235 See how the courteous leche<sup>o</sup> most sovereign
Unto the sike yeveth<sup>o</sup> medicine
In need, and him releveth of his grievous pine.<sup>o</sup>

Now let this pass. God woot,<sup>o</sup> many a man
240 Which, and<sup>o</sup> he tasted<sup>o</sup> were what he can,<sup>o</sup>
Men mighten liken<sup>o</sup> him to a fooles pere,<sup>o</sup>
And some man looketh in foltisshe manere<sup>o</sup>
As to the outward doom<sup>o</sup> and jugement,
That, at the prefe,<sup>o</sup> discreet<sup>o</sup> is and prudent.

But algates,<sup>o</sup> how so<sup>o</sup> be my countenance,

Debate<sup>o</sup> is now noon bitwix<sup>o</sup> me and my wit,
 Although that there were a disseverance,<sup>o</sup>
 As for a time, bitwixe me and it.
 The greater harme is myn, that never yit<sup>o</sup>
 250 Was I wel lettred,<sup>o</sup> prudent and discreet.<sup>o</sup>
 Ther never stood yet wise man on my feet.

The soth<sup>o</sup> is this, suche conceit<sup>o</sup> as I had
 And understanding, al<sup>o</sup> were it but<sup>o</sup> small,
 Before that my wittes weren unsad,<sup>o</sup>
 255 Thanked be our Lorde Jhesu Christ of all,<sup>o</sup>
 Such have I now, but blow<sup>o</sup> is nigh overall<sup>o</sup>
 The reverse, wherethrough<sup>o</sup> much is my mourning,
 Which causeth me thus sigh in complaining.

 260 High tyme is me<sup>o</sup> to creep into my grave.
 To live joylees,<sup>o</sup> what do I here?
 I in myn herte can no gladness have.
 I may but small say but if<sup>o</sup> men deem<sup>o</sup> I rave.
 Sithen<sup>o</sup> other thing than woe may I noon gripe,<sup>o</sup>
 265 Unto<sup>o</sup> my sepulcher am I now ripe.<sup>o</sup>

My wele,<sup>o</sup> adieu, farewell, my good fortune.
 Oute of youre tables me planed<sup>o</sup> han ye.
 Sithen welnigh any wight<sup>o</sup> for to commune<sup>o</sup>
 With me loathe is, farewell prosperity.
 270 I am no longer of your livery.
 Ye have me put out of your retenance.<sup>o</sup>
 Adieu, my good aventure<sup>o</sup> and good chaunce.<sup>o</sup>

And aswith<sup>o</sup> after, thus bithought I me:<sup>o</sup>
 275 'If that I in this wise me despair,
 It is purchase of more adversity.
 What nedeth it<sup>o</sup> my feeble wit appair,<sup>o</sup>
 Sith<sup>o</sup> God hath made myn healthe home repair,<sup>o</sup>

280 Blessed be he. And what<sup>o</sup> men deem<sup>o</sup> and speke, Suffer<sup>o</sup> it think I and me not on me wreke.<sup>o</sup>

But somdel<sup>o</sup> had I rejoycing amonge,<sup>o</sup>
And a gladness also in my spirite,
That though the people took hem<sup>o</sup> miss<sup>o</sup> and wonge,<sup>o</sup>
Me deeming<sup>o</sup> of my sicknesse not quite,<sup>o</sup>
285 Yet for they complained<sup>o</sup> the heavy plite<sup>o</sup>
That they had seen me in with tenderness
Of hertes cherte,<sup>o</sup> my grief was the less.

In hem putte I no default<sup>o</sup> but oon.<sup>o</sup>
That I was whole, they not ne deme<sup>o</sup> coude,<sup>o</sup>
290 And day by day they saw me by hem goon<sup>o</sup>
In heat and cold, and neither still or lowde<sup>o</sup>
Knew they me do suspectly.<sup>o</sup> A derke<sup>o</sup> clowde
Hir<sup>o</sup> sight obscured withinne and withoute,
And for all that were<sup>o</sup> ay<sup>o</sup> in such a doute.<sup>o</sup>

295 Axed<sup>o</sup> han they full oft esith,<sup>o</sup> and freined<sup>o</sup>
Of my fellowes of the Privy Seel,<sup>6</sup>
And prayed hem to telle hem with heart unfained,<sup>o</sup>
How it stood with me, whether evil or well.
And they the sothe<sup>o</sup> tolde hem every del,<sup>o</sup>
300 But they helden her<sup>o</sup> wordes not but lees.<sup>o</sup>
They mighten as well have holden her peace.<sup>o</sup>

This troublly<sup>o</sup> life hath all too long endured.
Not have I wist<sup>o</sup> how in my skin to tourne.
But now myself to myself have ensured<sup>o</sup>
305 For no such wondring<sup>o</sup> after this to mourne.<sup>o</sup>
As long as my life shall in me sojourne<sup>o</sup>
Of such imagining I not ne recche.<sup>o</sup>
Let hem deem<sup>o</sup> as hem list<sup>o</sup> and speak and drecche.<sup>o</sup>

This other day a lamentacioun
Of a wooful man in a book<sup>z</sup> I sy,<sup>o</sup>
310 To whom wordes of consolacioun
Reason yaf<sup>o</sup> speking effectuelly,<sup>o</sup>
And well eased myn herte was thereby,<sup>o</sup>
For when I had a while in the book read,
315 With the spech of Reason was I well fed.<sup>o</sup>

The heavy<sup>o</sup> man woeful and anguishous<sup>o</sup> Complained in this wise, and thus said he:
'My life is unto me full encombrous,<sup>o</sup>
For whither or unto what place I flee,
My wickednesses evere followen me,
320 As men may see the shadow a body sue,<sup>o</sup>
And in no manner I may hem eschewe.<sup>o</sup>

'Vexation of spirit and torment
Lack I right none. I have of hem plenty.
Wonderly<sup>o</sup> bitter is my taste and scent.<sup>o</sup>
325 Woe<sup>o</sup> be the time of my nativity.
Unhappy man, that ever should I be.
O death, thy stroke a salve<sup>o</sup> is of sweetnesse
To hem that liven in such wrecchednesse.

'Greater plesance were it me<sup>o</sup> to die, 330 By many fold<sup>o</sup> than for to live so.
Sorrows so many in me multiplie
That my life is to me a very foe.
Comforted may I not be of my woe.
Of my distresse see none end I can.
335 No force<sup>o</sup> how soon I stinte<sup>o</sup> to be a man.'

Thanne spake Reason, 'What meneth all this fare?<sup>o</sup>
Though wealth be not friendly to thee, yit<sup>o</sup>
Out of thine herte voide<sup>o</sup> woe and care.'

340 'By what skill, o how, and by what reed o and wit, o
Said this woeful man, 'might I doon o it?'
'Wrestle,' quod Resoun, 'ayein o heavynesse o
Of the worlde, troubles, suffringe and duresse. o

'Biholde how many a man suffreth disease,
As great as thou and alaway o grettere,
345 And though it hem o pinche sharply and sieze,
Yet patiently they it suffer and bere. o
Think hereon and the less it shall thee dere. o
Such suffrance is of mannes guilt cleansing, o
And hem enableth to o joy everlasting.

350 'Woe, heaviness and tribulation
Common aren o to men all, and profitable.
Though grievous be mannes temptation,
It sleeth o man not. To hem that o ben suffrable o
And to whom Goddes stroke is acceptable
355 Purveyed o joy is, for God woundeth tho o
That he ordeined hath to bliss to go.

'Gold purged o is, thou seest, in the furneis, o
For the finer and cleaner o it shall be.
Of thy disease the weighte and the peis o
360 Bear lightly, o for God, to prove o thee,
Scourged thee hath with sharpe adversite.
Not grouche o and say, "Why sustain I this?"
For if thou do, thou thee takest amiss. o

365 'But thus thou shouldest thinke in thine herte,
And say, "To thee, lord God, I have aguilte o
So sore o I moot o for myn offences smerte, o
As I am worthy. o O Lorde I am spilte, o
But o thou to me thy mercy grante wilte.
I am ful sure thou mayst it not deny.
370 Lord, I me repent, and I thee mercy cry.' " o

Longer I thought read have<sup>o</sup> in this book,
But so it shope<sup>o</sup> that I ne might naught.<sup>o</sup>
He that it oughte<sup>o</sup> again it to him took,
Me of his haste unaware.<sup>o</sup> Yet have I caught<sup>o</sup>
375 Some of the doctrine by Reason taught
To the man, as above have I said.
Well thereof<sup>o</sup> I holde me full well apaid,<sup>o</sup>

For evere sithen<sup>o</sup> set have I the less
By the peoples imagination,
380 Talkinge this and that of my sickness
Which came of<sup>o</sup> Goddes visitation.
Might I have be<sup>o</sup> found in probation<sup>o</sup>
Not grouching<sup>o</sup> but han take it in souffrance,<sup>o</sup> Wholesome and wise had be<sup>o</sup> my 385 governance.<sup>o</sup>

Farewell my sorrow, I cast it to the cock.
With patience I henceforth think unpick<sup>o</sup>
Of such thoughtful disease<sup>o</sup> and woe the lock,
And let hem<sup>o</sup> out that han me made to sike.<sup>o</sup>
Hereafter our Lorde God may, if him like,<sup>o</sup>
390 Make all myn old affeccoun<sup>o</sup> resort,<sup>o</sup>
And in hope of that will I me comfort.

Thorough<sup>o</sup> Godes just doom<sup>o</sup> and his jugement
And for my best,<sup>o</sup> now I take and deeme,<sup>o</sup>
395 Gave that good lorde me my punishment.
In wealth I took of him none heed or yeme,<sup>o</sup>
Him for to please and him honor and queme,<sup>o</sup>
And he me gave a bone on for to gnawe,
Me to correct and of him to have awe.

He gave wit and he took it away
400 When that he saw that I it misdispente,<sup>o</sup>

And gave again when it was to his pay<sup>o</sup>
He granted me my guiltes to repente,
And hence forward to sette myn entente<sup>o</sup>
Unto his deity to do plesaunce,<sup>o</sup>
405 And to amend my sinful governaunce.<sup>o</sup>

Laud<sup>o</sup> and honor and thank unto thee be,
Lord God, that salve art to all heavinesse.<sup>o</sup>
Thank of<sup>o</sup> my wealth and myn adversity.
Thank of myn elde<sup>o</sup> and of my sicknesse.<sup>o</sup>
410 And thank be to thine infinite goodnesse
And thy giftes and benefices<sup>o</sup> alle,
And unto thy mercy and grace I calle.

Endnotes

- Note 1: The text is drawn from Thomas Hoccleve, "My compleinte" and Other Poems, edited by Roger Ellis (2001). Obsolete letter forms have been modernized. Spelling has also been modernized so as to facilitate sense, wherever this does not interfere with meter or rhyme. Ellis's glosses have been preserved, with some modification. Readers should aim to produce an iambic pentameter for each line. Some lines demand variation on that default pattern.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Michaelmas falls on September 29. Note the melancholy inversion of the opening of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales (see p. 473).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: All Hallowmas, or All Saints Day, falls on November 1.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: From Psalm 31; a psalter is a book of psalms and perhaps other devotional material.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Westminster, a city separate from London proper; Hoccleve's workplace as a royal bureaucrat.Return to reference 5

- Note 6: Hoccleve was a clerk in the Office of the Privy Seal, one of three great bureaucratic offices, responsible for the production and issuing of many kinds of official documents. Hoccleve himself produced a set, or "Formulary," of almost 900 model Privy Seal documents.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The book can be identified as the Synonyma of Isidore of Seville (d. 636).Return to reference 7

MIDDLE ENGLISH LYRICS

Medieval England was home to a distinctive practice of lyric poetry, quite different from the traditions developed in continental Europe. In southern France, elegantly produced chansonniers, or “songbooks,” anthologized the lyric poetry and music by troubadors and trouvères, whose names and, sometimes, biographies were attached to their compositions. It was only late in the fourteenth century that English writers began to develop the kind of aristocratic, formal, and learned lyric that had also been cultivated by the Minnesänger in Germany (German Minne corresponds to French fine amour—that is, refined or aristocratic love) and by the Italian poets writing in what Dante characterized as the dolce stil nuovo (sweet new style). By contrast, Middle English lyrics were often haphazardly copied, sometimes in the midst of other texts such as legal documents and student notes. The overwhelming majority of English lyrics are anonymous. These short, seemingly undistinguished verses testify to a conception among English audiences of lyric as a malleable poetic commons.

In the later fourteenth century, Chaucer, under the influence of French poets, began to write lovers’ complaints, homiletic poetry, and verse letters in the form of ballades, roundels, and other highly stylized lyric types (see pp. 573–76). In the fifteenth century, John Lydgate, Thomas Hoccleve, and others following Chaucer wrote lyrics of this sort, which were praised for embellishing the English language. These, along with Chaucer’s, were collected in manuscript anthologies that were produced commercially for well-to-do buyers.

Still, Chaucer and those who wrote after him remained familiar with and influenced by the tradition of common, anonymous verses and songs, almost all of which have perished. With one exception, the Middle English lyrics included in this section are the work of anonymous poets and are difficult to date with any precision. Some of these survive in only a single manuscript. The topics and language in these poems are highly conventional, yet the lyrics often seem remarkably fresh and spontaneous. Many are marked by strong accentual rhythms with a good deal of alliteration. Their pleasure comes not from originality or depictions of lived experience but from variations upon expected themes and images. Some were undoubtedly set to music, and in a few cases the music has survived. Perhaps the earliest of those printed here, "The Cuckoo Song," is a canon or round in which the voices follow one another and join together echoing the joyous cry, "Cuckou." The rooster and hen in The Nun's Priest's Tale sing "My Lief Is Faren in Londe" in "sweet accord" (line 59). "I Am of Ireland" was undoubtedly accompanied by dancing as well as music.

The joyous return of spring—celebrated in the reverdie, or spring song (literally, "regreening")—is the subject of many lyrics. In love lyrics the mating of birds and animals in wild nature often contrasts with the melancholy of unrequited or forsaken human lovers. These lovers are usually male. We know that some women wrote troubador and court poetry, but we do not know whether women composed popular lyrics; women certainly sang popular songs, just as they are portrayed doing in narrative poetry.

SIR THOMAS MALORY

ca. 1415–1471

Morte Darthur (Death of Arthur) is the title that William Caxton, the first English printer, gave to Malory's volume, which Caxton described more accurately in his Preface as "the noble histories of King Arthur and of certain of his knights." The volume begins with the mythical story of Arthur's birth. King Uther Pendragon falls in love with the wife of one of his barons. Merlin's magic transforms Uther into the likeness of her husband, and Arthur is born of this union. The volume ends with the destruction of the Round Table and the deaths of Arthur, Queen Guinevere, and Sir Lancelot, who is Arthur's best knight and the queen's lover. The bulk of the work is taken up with the separate adventures of the knights of the Round Table.

On the evolution of the Arthurian legend, see the headnote to "The Myth of Arthur's Return," p. 138. During the thirteenth century, the stories about Arthur and his knights had been turned into a series of enormously long prose romances in French, and it was these that, as Caxton informed his readers, "Sir Thomas Malory did take out of certain books of French and reduced into English."

Little was known about the author until the early twentieth century when scholars began to unearth the criminal record of a Sir Thomas Malory of Newbold Revell in Warwickshire. In 1451 he was arrested for the first time to prevent his doing injury—presumably further injury—to a priory in Lincolnshire, and shortly thereafter he was accused of a number of criminal acts. These included escaping from prison after his first arrest, twice breaking into and plundering the Abbey of Coombe, extorting money from various persons, and committing rape. Malory pleaded innocent of all charges. The Wars of the Roses—in which Malory, like the formidable earl of Warwick (the “kingmaker”), whom he seems to have followed, switched sides from Lancaster to York and back again—may account for some of his troubles with the law. After a failed Lancastrian revolt, the Yorkist king, Edward IV, specifically excluded Malory from four amnesties he granted to the Lancastrians.

The identification of this Sir Thomas Malory (there is another candidate with the same name) as the author of the Morte was strengthened by the discovery in 1934 of a manuscript that differed from Caxton’s text, the only version previously known. The manuscript contained eight separate romances. Caxton, in order to give the impression of a continuous narrative, had welded these together into twenty-one books, subdivided into short chapters with summary chapter headings. Caxton suppressed all but the last of the personal remarks the author had appended to individual tales in the manuscript. At the very end of the book Malory asks “all gentlemen and gentlewomen that readeth this book pray for me while I am alive that God send me good deliverance.” The discovery of the manuscript revealed that at the close of the first tale he had written: “this was drawyn by a knight presoner Sir Thomas Malleoré, that God sende him good recover.” There is strong circumstantial evidence, therefore, that the book from which the Arthurian legends were passed on to future generations to be adapted in literature, art, and film was written in prison by a man whose violent career might seem at odds with the chivalric ideals he professes.

Such a contradiction—if it really is one—should not be surprising. Nostalgia for an ideal past that never truly existed is typical of much historical romance. Like the slave-owning plantation society of Margaret Mitchell’s Gone with the Wind, whose Southern gentlemen cultivate chivalrous manners and respect for gentlewomen, Malory’s Arthurian world is a fiction. In our terms, it cannot even be labeled “historical,” although the distinction between romance and history is not one that Malory would have made. Only rarely does he voice skepticism about the historicity of his tale; one such example is his questioning of the myth of Arthur’s return. Much of the tragic power of his romance lies in his sense of the irretrievability of past glory in comparison with the sordidness of his own age.

The success of Malory’s retelling owes much to his development of a terse and direct prose style, especially the naturalistic dialogue that keeps his narrative close to earth. And both he and many of his characters are masters of understatement who express themselves, in moments of great emotional tension, with a bare minimum of words.

In spite of its professed dedication to service of women, Malory’s chivalry is primarily devoted to the fellowship and competitions of aristocratic men. Fighting consists mainly of single combats in tournaments, chance encounters, and battles, which Malory never tires of describing in professional detail. Commoners rarely come into view; when they do, the effect can be chilling—as when pillagers by moonlight plunder the corpses of the knights left on the field of Arthur’s last battle. Above all, Malory cherishes an aristocratic male code of honor for which his favorite word is “worship.” Men win or lose “worship” through their actions in war and love.

The most “worshipful” of Arthur’s knights is Sir Lancelot, the “head of all Christian knights,” as he is called in a moving eulogy by his brother, Sir Ector. But Lancelot is compromised by his fatal liaison with Arthur’s queen and torn between the incompatible loyalties that bind him as an honorable knight, on the one hand, to his lord Arthur and, on the other, to his lady Guinevere. Malory loves his character Lancelot even to the point of indulging in the fleeting speculation, after Lancelot has been admitted to the queen’s chamber, that their activities might have been innocent, “for love that time was not as love is nowadays.” But when the jealousy and malice of two wicked knights force the affair into the open, nothing can avert a mighty civil war; the breaking up of the fellowship of the Round Table; and the death of Arthur himself, which Malory relates with somber magnificence as the passing of a great era.

[THE CONSPIRACY AGAINST LANCELOT AND GUINEVERE]

In May, when every lusty<sup>2</sup> heart flourisheth and burgeoneth, for as the season is lusty to behold and comfortable,<sup>3</sup> so man and woman rejoiceth and gladdeth of summer coming with his fresh flowers; for winter with his rough winds and blasts causeth lusty men and women to cower and to sit fast by the fire—so this season it befell in the month of May a great anger and unhap that stinted not<sup>4</sup> till the flower of chivalry of all the world was destroyed and slain. And all was long upon two unhappy<sup>5</sup> knights which were named Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred that were brethren unto Sir Gawain.<sup>6</sup> For this Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred had ever a privy<sup>7</sup> hate unto the Queen, Dame Guinevere, and to Sir Lancelot, and daily and nightly they ever watched upon Sir Lancelot.

So it misfortuned Sir Gawain and all his brethren were in King Arthur's chamber, and then Sir Agravain said thus openly, and not in no counsel,<sup>8</sup> that many knights might hear: "I marvel that we all be not ashamed both to see and to know how Sir Lancelot lieth daily and nightly by the Queen. And all we know well that it is so, and it is shamefully suffered of us all<sup>9</sup> that we should suffer so noble a king as King Arthur is to be shamed."

Then spoke Sir Gawain and said, "Brother, Sir Agravain, I pray you and charge you, move no such matters no more afore<sup>1</sup> me, for wit you well, I will not be of your counsel."<sup>2</sup>

"So God me help," said Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth,<sup>3</sup> "we will not be known of your deeds."<sup>4</sup>

"Then will I!" said Sir Mordred.

"I lieve<sup>5</sup> you well," said Sir Gawain, "for ever unto all unhappiness, sir, ye will grant.<sup>6</sup> And I would that ye left all this and make you not so busy, for I know," said Sir Gawain, "what will fall of it."<sup>7</sup>

"Fall whatsoever fall may," said Sir Agravain, "I will disclose it to the King."

"Not by my counsel," said Sir Gawain, "for and<sup>8</sup> there arise war and wrack betwixt<sup>9</sup> Sir Lancelot and us, wit you well, brother, there will many kings and great lords hold with Sir Lancelot. Also, brother, Sir Agravain," said Sir Gawain, "ye must remember how often times Sir Lancelot hath rescued the King and the Queen. And the best of us all had been full cold at the heart-root<sup>1</sup> had not Sir Lancelot been better than we, and that has he proved himself full oft. And as for my part," said Sir Gawain, "I will never be against Sir Lancelot for<sup>2</sup> one day's deed, when he rescued me from King Carados of the Dolorous<sup>3</sup> Tower and slew him and saved my life. Also, brother, Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred, in like wise Sir Lancelot rescued you both and three score and two<sup>4</sup> from Sir Tarquin. And therefore, brother, methinks such noble deeds and kindness should be remembered."

"Do as ye list,"<sup>5</sup> said Sir Agravain, "for I will layne<sup>6</sup> it no longer." So with these words came in Sir Arthur.

"Now, brother," said Sir Gawain, "stint your noise."<sup>7</sup>

"That will I not," said Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred.

"Well, will ye so?" said Sir Gawain. "Then God speed you, for I will not hear of your tales, neither be of your counsel."

"No more will I," said Sir Gaheris.

"Neither I," said Sir Gareth, "for I shall never say evil by<sup>8</sup> that man that made me knight." And therewithal they three departed making great dole.<sup>9</sup>

"Alas!" said Sir Gawain and Sir Gareth, "now is this realm wholly destroyed and mischieved,<sup>1</sup> and the noble fellowship of the Round Table shall be disparbeled."<sup>2</sup>

So they departed, and then King Arthur asked them what noise<sup>3</sup> they made. "My lord," said Sir Agravain, "I shall tell you, for I may keep<sup>4</sup> it no longer. Here is I and my brother Sir Mordred broke<sup>5</sup> unto my brother Sir Gawain, Sir Gaheris, and to Sir Gareth—for this is all, to make it short—how that we know all that Sir Lancelot holdeth your queen, and hath done long; and we be your sister<sup>6</sup> sons, we may suffer it no longer. And all we woot<sup>7</sup> that ye should be above Sir Lancelot, and ye are the king that made him knight, and therefore we will prove it that he is a traitor to your person."

"If it be so," said the King, "wit<sup>8</sup> you well, he is none other. But I would be loath to begin such a thing but<sup>9</sup> I might have proofs of it, for Sir Lancelot is an hardy knight, and all ye know that he is the best knight among us all. And but if he be taken with the deed,<sup>1</sup> he will fight with him that bringeth up the noise, and I know no knight that is able to match him. Therefore, and<sup>2</sup> it be sooth as ye say, I would that he were taken with the deed."

For, as the French book saith, the King was full loath that such a noise should be upon Sir Lancelot and his queen. For the King had a deeming<sup>3</sup> of it, but he would not hear of it, for Sir Lancelot had done so much for him and for the Queen so many times that, wit you well, the King loved him passingly<sup>4</sup> well.

"My lord," said Sir Agravain, "ye shall ride tomorn<sup>5</sup> on hunting, and doubt ye not, Sir Lancelot will not go with you. And so when it draweth toward night, ye may send the Queen word that ye will lie out all that night, and so may ye send for your cooks. And then, upon pain of death, that night we shall take him with the Queen, and we shall bring him unto you, quick<sup>6</sup> or dead."

"I will well,"<sup>7</sup> said the King. "Then I counsel you to take with you sure fellowship."

"Sir," said Sir Agravain, "my brother, Sir Mordred, and I will take with us twelve knights of the Round Table."

"Beware," said King Arthur, "for I warn you, ye shall find him wight."<sup>8</sup>

"Let us deal!"<sup>9</sup> said Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred.

So on the morn King Arthur rode on hunting and sent word to the Queen that he would be out all that night. Then Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred got to them<sup>1</sup> twelve knights and hid themselves in a chamber in the castle of Carlisle. And these were their names: Sir Colgrevance, Sir Mador de la Porte, Sir Guingalen, Sir Meliot de Logres, Sir Petipace of Winchelsea, Sir Galeron of Galway, Sir Melion de la Mountain, Sir Ascamore, Sir Gromore Somyr Jour, Sir Curselayne, Sir Florence, and Sir Lovell. So these twelve knights were with Sir Mordred and Sir Agravain, and all they were of Scotland, or else of Sir Gawain's kin, or well-willers<sup>2</sup> to his brother.

So when the night came, Sir Lancelot told Sir Bors<sup>3</sup> how he would go that night and speak with the Queen.

"Sir," said Sir Bors, "ye shall not go this night by my counsel."

"Why?" said Sir Lancelot.

"Sir," said Sir Bors, "I dread me<sup>4</sup> ever of Sir Agravain that waiteth upon<sup>5</sup> you daily to do you shame and us all. And never gave my heart against no going that ever ye went<sup>6</sup> to the queen so much as now, for I mistrust<sup>7</sup> that the King is out this night from the Queen because peradventure he hath lain<sup>8</sup> some watch for you and the Queen. Therefore, I dread me sore of some treason."

"Have ye no dread," said Sir Lancelot, "for I shall go and come again and make no tarrying."

"Sir," said Sir Bors, "that me repents,<sup>9</sup> for I dread me sore that your going this night shall wrath<sup>1</sup> us all."

"Fair nephew," said Sir Lancelot, "I marvel me much why ye say thus, sithen<sup>2</sup> the Queen hath sent for me. And wit you well, I will not be so much a coward, but she shall understand I will<sup>3</sup> see her good grace."

"God speed you well," said Sir Bors, "and send you sound and safe again!"

So Sir Lancelot departed and took his sword under his arm, and so he walked in his mantel,<sup>4</sup> that noble knight, and put himself in great jeopardy. And so he passed on till he came to the Queen's chamber, and so lightly he was had<sup>5</sup> into the chamber. And then, as the French book saith, the Queen and Sir Lancelot were together. And whether they were abed or at other manner of disports, me list<sup>6</sup> not thereof make no mention, for love that time<sup>7</sup> was not as love is nowadays.

But thus as they were together there came Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred with twelve knights with them of the Round Table, and they said with great crying and scaring<sup>8</sup> voice: "Thou traitor, Sir Lancelot, now are thou taken!" And thus they cried with a loud voice that all the court might hear it. And these fourteen knights all were armed at all points, as<sup>9</sup> they should fight in a battle.

"Alas!" said Queen Guinevere, "now are we mischieved<sup>1</sup> both!"

"Madam," said Sir Lancelot, "is there here any armor within your chamber that I might cover my body withal? And if there be any, give it me, and I shall soon stint<sup>2</sup> their malice, by the grace of God!"

"Now, truly," said the Queen, "I have none armor neither helm, shield, sword, neither spear, wherefore I dread me sore our long love is come to a mischievous end. For I hear by their noise there be many noble knights, and well I woot they be surely<sup>3</sup> armed, and against them ye may make no resistance. Wherefore ye are likely to be slain, and then shall I be burned! For and<sup>4</sup> ye might escape them," said the Queen, "I would not doubt but that ye would rescue me in what danger that ever I stood in."

"Alas!" said Sir Lancelot, "in all my life thus was I never bestead<sup>5</sup> that I should be thus shamefully slain for lack of mine armor."

But ever in one<sup>6</sup> Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred cried: "Traitor knight, come out of the Queen's chamber! For wit thou well thou art beset so that thou shalt not escape."

"Ah, Jesu mercy!" said Sir Lancelot, "this shameful cry and noise I may not suffer, for better were death at once than thus to endure this pain." Then he took the Queen in his arms and kissed her and said, "Most noblest Christian queen, I beseech you, as ye have been ever my special good lady, and I at all times your poor knight and true unto<sup>7</sup> my power, and as I never failed you in right nor in wrong sithen the first day King Arthur made me knight, that ye will pray for my soul if that I be slain. For well I am assured that Sir Bors, my nephew, and all the remnant of my kin, with Sir Lavain and Sir Urry,<sup>8</sup> that they will not fail you to rescue you from the fire. And therefore, mine own lady, recomfort yourself,<sup>9</sup> whatsoever come of me, that ye go with Sir Bors, my nephew, and Sir Urry and they all will do you all the pleasure that they may, and ye shall live like a queen upon my lands."

"Nay, Sir Lancelot, nay!" said the Queen. "Wit thou well that I will not live long after thy days. But and<sup>1</sup> ye be slain I will take my death as meekly as ever did martyr take his death for Jesu Christ's sake."

"Well, Madam," said Sir Lancelot, "sith it is so that the day is come that our love must depart,<sup>2</sup> wit you well I shall sell my life as dear as I may. And a thousandfold," said Sir Lancelot, "I am more heavier<sup>3</sup> for you than for myself! And now I had liefer<sup>4</sup> than to be lord of all Christendom that I had sure armor upon me, that men might speak of my deeds ere ever I were slain."

"Truly," said the Queen, "and<sup>5</sup> it might please God, I would that they would take me and slay me and suffer<sup>6</sup> you to escape."

"That shall never be," said Sir Lancelot. "God defend me from such a shame! But, Jesu Christ, be Thou my shield and mine armor!" And therewith Sir Lancelot wrapped his mantel about his arm well and surely; and by then they had gotten a great form<sup>7</sup> out of the hall, and therewith they all rushed at the door. "Now, fair lords," said Sir Lancelot, "leave<sup>8</sup> your noise and your rushing, and I shall set open this door, and then may ye do with me what it liketh you."<sup>9</sup>

"Come off,<sup>1</sup> then," said they all, "and do it, for it availeth thee not to strive against us all. And therefore let us into this chamber, and we shall save thy life until thou come to King Arthur."

Then Sir Lancelot unbarred the door, and with his left hand he held it open a little, that but one man might come in at once. And so there came striding a good knight, a much<sup>2</sup> man and a large, and his name was called Sir Colgrevice of Gore. And he with a sword struck at Sir Lancelot mightily. And he put aside<sup>3</sup> the stroke and gave him such a buffet<sup>4</sup> upon the helmet that he fell groveling dead within the chamber door. Then Sir Lancelot with great might drew the knight within<sup>5</sup> the chamber door. And then Sir Lancelot, with help of the Queen and her ladies, he was lightly<sup>6</sup> armed in Colgreivance's armor. And ever stood Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred, crying, "Traitor knight! Come forth out of the Queen's chamber!"

"Sirs, leave<sup>7</sup> your noise," said Sir Lancelot, "for wit you well, Sir Agravain, ye shall not prison me this night. And therefore, and<sup>8</sup> ye do by my counsel, go ye all from this chamber door and make you no such crying and such manner of slander as ye do. For I promise you by my knighthood, and ye will depart and make no more noise, I shall as tomorn appear afore you all and before the King, and then let it be seen which of you all, other else ye all,<sup>9</sup> that will deprove<sup>1</sup> me of treason. And there shall I answer you, as a knight should, that hither I came to the Queen for no manner of mal engine,<sup>2</sup> and that will I prove and make it good upon you with my hands."

"Fie upon thee, traitor," said Sir Agravain and Sir Mordred, "for we will have thee malgré thine head<sup>3</sup> and slay thee, and we list.<sup>4</sup> For we let thee wit we have the choice of<sup>5</sup> King Arthur to save thee other slay thee."

"Ah, sirs," said Sir Lancelot, "is there none other grace with you? Then keep<sup>6</sup> yourself!" And then Sir Lancelot set all open the chamber door and mightily and knightly he strode in among them. And anon<sup>7</sup> at the first stroke he slew Sir Agravain, and after twelve of his fellows. Within a little while he had laid them down cold to the earth, for there was none of the twelve knights might stand Sir Lancelot one buffet.<sup>8</sup> And also he wounded Sir Mordred, and therewithal he fled with all his might.

And then Sir Lancelot returned again unto the Queen and said, "Madam, now wit you well, all our true love is brought to an end, for now will King Arthur ever be my foe. And therefore, Madam, and it like you<sup>9</sup> that I may have you with me, I shall save you from all manner adventurous<sup>1</sup> dangers."

"Sir, that is not best," said the Queen, "me seemeth, for<sup>2</sup> now ye have done so much harm, it will be best that ye hold you still with this. And if ye see that as tomorn they will put me unto death, then may ye rescue me as ye think best."

"I will well,"<sup>3</sup> said Sir Lancelot, "for have ye no doubt, while I am a man living I shall rescue you." And then he kissed her, and either of them gave other a ring, and so there he left the Queen and went until<sup>4</sup> his lodging.

[WAR BREAKS OUT BETWEEN ARTHUR AND LANCELOT]<sup>5</sup>

Then said King Arthur unto Sir Gawain, "Dear nephew, I pray you make ready in your best armor with your brethren, Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth, to bring my Queen to the fire, there to have her judgment and receive the death."

"Nay, my most noble king," said Sir Gawain, "that will I never do, for wit you well I will never be in that place where so noble a queen as is my lady Dame Guinevere shall take such a shameful end. For wit you well," said Sir Gawain, "my heart will not serve me for to see her die, and it shall never be said that ever I was of your counsel for her death."

"Then," said the King unto Sir Gawain, "suffer<sup>6</sup> your brethren Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth to be there."

"My lord," said Sir Gawain, "wit you well they will be loath to be there present because of many adventures<sup>7</sup> that is like to fall, but they are young and full unable to say you nay."

Then spake Sir Gaheris and the good knight Sir Gareth unto King Arthur: "Sir, ye may well command us to be there, but wit you well it shall be sore against our will. But and<sup>8</sup> we be there by your strait commandment, ye shall plainly<sup>9</sup> hold us there excused—we will be there in peaceable wise and bear none harness of war<sup>1</sup> upon us."

"In the name of God," said the King, "then make you ready, for she shall have soon<sup>2</sup> her judgment."

"Alas," said Sir Gawain, "that ever I should endure<sup>3</sup> to see this woeful day." So Sir Gawain turned him and wept heartily, and so he went into his chamber.

And then the Queen was led forth without<sup>4</sup> Carlisle, and anon she was dispoiled into<sup>5</sup> her smock. And then her ghostly father<sup>6</sup> was brought to her to be shriven of her misdeeds.<sup>7</sup> Then was there weeping and wailing and wringing of hands of many lords and ladies, but there were but few in comparison that would bear any armor for to strengthen<sup>8</sup> the death of the Queen.

Then was there one that Sir Lancelot had sent unto that place, which went to espy what time the Queen should go unto her death. And anon as<sup>9</sup> he saw the Queen dispoiled into her smock and shriven, then he gave Sir Lancelot warning. Then was there but spurring and plucking up<sup>1</sup> of horses, and right so they came unto the fire. And who<sup>2</sup> that stood against them, there were they slain—there might none withstand Sir Lancelot. So all that bore arms and withstood them, there were they slain, full many a noble knight. * *

Then when Sir Lancelot had thus done, and slain and put to flight all that would withstand him, then he rode straight unto Queen Guinevere and made a kirtle<sup>9</sup> and a gown to be cast upon her, and then he made her to be set behind him and prayed her to be of good cheer. Now wit you well the Queen was glad that she was escaped from death, and then she thanked God and Sir Lancelot.

And so he rode his way with the Queen, as the French book saith, unto Joyous Garde,<sup>1</sup> and there he kept her as a noble knight should. And many great lords and many good knights were sent him, and many full noble knights drew unto him. When they heard that King Arthur and Sir Lancelot were at debate,<sup>2</sup> many knights were glad, and many were sorry of their debate.

Now turn we again unto King Arthur, that when it was told him how and in what manner the Queen was taken away from the fire, and when he heard of the death of his noble knights, and in especial Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth, then he swooned for very pure<sup>3</sup> sorrow. And when he awoke of his swoon, then he said: "Alas, that ever I bore crown upon my head! For now have I lost the fairest fellowship of noble knights that ever held Christian king<sup>4</sup> together. Alas, my good knights be slain and gone away from me. Now within these two days I have lost nigh forty knights and also the noble fellowship of Sir Lancelot and his blood,<sup>5</sup> for now I may nevermore hold them together with my worship.<sup>6</sup> Alas, that ever this war began!

"Now, fair fellows," said the King, "I charge you that no man tell Sir Gawain of the death of his two brethren, for I am sure," said the King, "when he heareth tell that Sir Gareth is dead, he will go nigh out of his mind. Mercy Jesu," said the King, "why slew he Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth? For I dare say, as for Sir Gareth, he loved Sir Lancelot above all men earthly."<sup>7</sup>

"That is truth," said some knights, "but they were slain in the hurling,<sup>8</sup> as Sir Lancelot thrang in the thickest of the press. And as they were unarmed, he smote them and wist<sup>9</sup> not whom that he smote, and so unhappily<sup>1</sup> they were slain."

"Well," said Arthur, "the death of them will cause the greatest mortal war that ever was, for I am sure that when Sir Gawain knoweth hereof that Sir Gareth is slain, I shall never have rest of him<sup>2</sup> till I have destroyed Sir Lancelot's kin and himself both, other else he to destroy me. And therefore," said the King, "wit you well, my heart was never so heavy as it is now. And much more I am sorrier for my good knights' loss<sup>3</sup> than for the loss of my fair queen; for queens I might have enough, but such a fellowship of good knights shall never be together in no company. And now I dare say," said King Arthur, "there was never Christian king that ever held such a fellowship together. And alas, that ever Sir Lancelot and I should be at debate. Ah, Agravain, Agravain!" said the King, "Jesu forgive it thy soul, for thine evil will that thou and thy brother Sir Mordred haddest unto Sir Lancelot hath caused all this sorrow." And ever among these complaints the King wept and swooned.

Then came there one to Sir Gawain and told him how the Queen was led away with<sup>4</sup> Sir Lancelot, and nigh a four-and-twenty knights slain. "Ah, Jesu, save me my two brethren!" said Sir Gawain. "For full well wist I," said Sir Gawain, "that Sir Lancelot would rescue her, other else he would die in that field. And to say the truth he were not of worship but if he had<sup>5</sup> rescued the Queen, insomuch as she should have been burned for his sake. And as in that," said Sir Gawain, "he hath done but knightly, and as I would have done myself and I had stood in like case. But where are my brethren?" said Sir Gawain. "I marvel that I hear not of them."

Then said that man, "Truly, Sir Gaheris and Sir Gareth be slain."

"Jesu defend!"<sup>6</sup> said Sir Gawain. "For all this world I would not that they were slain, and in especial my good brother Sir Gareth."

"Sir," said the man, "he is slain, and that is great pity."

"Who slew him?" said Sir Gawain.

"Sir Lancelot," said the man, "slew them both."

"That may I not believe," said Sir Gawain, "that ever he slew my good brother Sir Gareth, for I dare say my brother loved him better than me and all his brethren and the King both. Also I dare say, an<sup>7</sup> Sir Lancelot had desired my brother Sir Gareth with him, he would have been with him against the King and us all. And therefore I may never believe that Sir Lancelot slew my brethren."

"Verily, sir," said the man, "it is noised<sup>8</sup> that he slew him."

"Alas," said Sir Gawain, "now is my joy gone." And then he fell down and swooned, and long he lay there as he had been dead. And when he arose out of his swoon, he cried out sorrowfully and said, "Alas!" And forthwith he ran unto the King, crying and weeping, and said, "Ah, mine uncle King Arthur! My good brother Sir Gareth is slain, and so is my brother Sir Gaheris, which were two noble knights."

Then the King wept and he both, and so they fell on swooning. And when they were revived, then spake Sir Gawain and said, "Sir, I will go and see my brother Sir Gareth."

"Sir, ye may not see him," said the King, "for I caused him to be interred and Sir Gaheris both, for I well understood that ye would make overmuch sorrow, and the sight of Sir Gareth should have caused your double sorrow."

"Alas, my lord," said Sir Gawain, "how slew he my brother Sir Gareth? Mine own good lord, I pray you tell me."

"Truly," said the King, "I shall tell you as it hath been told me—Sir Lancelot slew him and Sir Gaheris both."

"Alas," said Sir Gawain, "they bore none arms against him, neither of them both."

"I woot not how it was," said the King, "but as it is said, Sir Lancelot slew them in the thickest of the press and knew them not. And therefore let us shape a remedy for to revenge their deaths."

"My king, my lord, and mine uncle," said Sir Gawain, "wit you well, now I shall make you a promise which I shall hold by my knighthood, that from this day forward I shall never fail<sup>9</sup> Sir Lancelot until that one of us have slain the other. And therefore I require you, my lord and king, dress<sup>1</sup> you unto the wars, for wit you well, I will be revenged upon Sir Lancelot; and therefore, as ye will have my service and my love, now haste you thereto and assay<sup>2</sup> your friends. For I promise unto God," said Sir Gawain, "for the death of my brother Sir Gareth I shall seek Sir Lancelot throughout seven kings' realms, but I shall slay him, other else he shall slay me."

"Sir, ye shall not need to seek him so far," said the King, "for as I hear say, Sir Lancelot will abide me and us all within the castle of Joyous Garde. And much people draweth unto him, as I hear say."

"That may I right well believe," said Sir Gawain, "but my lord," he said, "assay your friends and I will assay mine."

"It shall be done," said the King, "and as I suppose I shall be big<sup>3</sup> enough to drive him out of the biggest tower of his castle."

So then the King sent letters and writs throughout all England, both the length and the breadth, for to summon all his knights. And so unto King Arthur drew many knights, dukes, and earls, that he had a great host, and when they were assembled the King informed them how Sir Lancelot had bereft him his Queen. Then the King and all his host made them ready to lay siege about Sir Lancelot where he lay within Joyous Garde.

[THE DEATH OF ARTHUR]<sup>4</sup>

So upon Trinity Sunday at night King Arthur dreamed a wonderful dream, and in his dream him seemed that he saw upon a chafflet<sup>5</sup> a chair, and the chair was fast to a wheel, and thereupon sat King Arthur in the richest cloth of gold that might be made. And the King thought there was under him, far from him, an hideous deep black water, and therein was all manner of serpents, and worms, and wild beasts, foul and horrible. And suddenly the King thought that the wheel turned upside down, and he fell among the serpents, and every beast took him by a limb. And then the King cried as he lay in his bed, "Help, help!"

And then knights, squires, and yeomen awaked the King, and then he was so amazed<sup>6</sup> that he wist<sup>7</sup> not where he was. And then so he awaked<sup>8</sup> until it was nigh day, and then he fell on slumbering again, not sleeping nor thoroughly waking. So the King seemed<sup>9</sup> verily that there came Sir Gawain unto him with a number of fair ladies with him. So when King Arthur saw him, he said, "Welcome, my sister's son. I weened ye had been dead. And now I see thee on-live, much am I beholden unto Almighty Jesu. Ah, fair nephew and my sister's son, what been these ladies that hither be come with you?"

"Sir," said Sir Gawain, "all these be ladies for whom I have foughten for when I was man living. And all these are tho<sup>1</sup> that I did battle for in righteous quarrels, and God hath given them that grace, at their great prayer, because I did battle for them for their right, that they should bring me hither unto you. Thus much hath given me leave God, for to warn you of your death. For and ye fight as tomorn<sup>2</sup> with Sir Mordred, as ye both have assigned,<sup>3</sup> doubt ye not ye must be slain, and the most party of your people on both parties. And for the great grace and goodness that Almighty Jesu hath unto you, and for pity of you and many mo other good men there<sup>4</sup> shall be slain, God hath sent me to you of his special grace to give you warning that in no wise ye do battle as tomorn, but that ye take a treatise for a month-day.<sup>5</sup> And proffer you largely,<sup>6</sup> so that tomorn ye put in a delay. For within a month shall come Sir Lancelot with all his noble knights and rescue you worshipfully and slay Sir Mordred and all that ever will hold with him."

Then Sir Gawain and all the ladies vanished. And anon the King called upon his knights, squires, and yeomen, and charged them wightly<sup>7</sup> to fetch his noble lords and wise bishops unto him. And when they were come the King told them of his avision,<sup>8</sup> that Sir Gawain had told him and warned him that, and he fought on the morn, he should be slain. Then the King commanded Sir Lucan the Butler<sup>9</sup> and his brother Sir Bedivere the Bold, with two bishops with them, and charged them in any wise to take a treatise for a month-day<sup>1</sup> with Sir Mordred. "And spare not: proffer him lands and goods as much as ye think reasonable."

So then they departed and came to Sir Mordred where he had a grim host of an hundred thousand, and there they entreated<sup>2</sup> Sir Mordred long time. And at the last Sir Mordred was agreed for to have Cornwall and Kent by King Arthur's days,<sup>3</sup> and after that, all England, after the days of King Arthur.

Then were they condescended<sup>4</sup> that King Arthur and Sir Mordred should meet betwixt both their hosts, and everich<sup>5</sup> of them should bring fourteen persons. And so they came with this word unto Arthur. Then said he, "I am glad that this is done," and so he went into the field.

And when King Arthur should depart, he warned all his host that, and<sup>6</sup> they see any sword drawn, "Look ye come on fiercely and slay that traitor Sir Mordred, for I in no wise trust him." In like wise Sir Mordred warned his host that "And ye see any manner of sword drawn, look that ye come on fiercely, and so slay all that ever before you standeth, for in no wise I will not trust for this treatise." And in the same wise said Sir Mordred unto his host, "For I know well my father will be avenged upon me."

And so they met as their pointment<sup>7</sup> was and were agreed and accorded thoroughly. And wine was fetched and they drank together. Right so came an adder out of a little heath-bush, and it stung a knight in the foot. And so when the knight felt him so stung, he looked down and saw the adder. And anon he drew his sword to slay the adder, and thought<sup>8</sup> none other harm. And when the host on both parties saw that sword drawn, then they blew beams,<sup>9</sup> trumpets, and horns, and shouted grimly. And so both hosts dressed them<sup>1</sup> together. And King Arthur took his horse and said, "Alas, this unhappy day!" and so rode to his party, and Sir Mordred in like wise.

And never since was there never seen a more dolefuller battle in no Christian land, for there was but rushing and riding, foining<sup>2</sup> and striking; and many a grim word was there spoken of either to other, and many a deadly stroke. But ever King Arthur rode throughout the battle<sup>3</sup> of Sir Mordred many times and did full nobly, as a noble king should do, and at all times he fainted<sup>4</sup> never. And Sir Mordred did his devoir<sup>5</sup> that day and put himself in great peril.

And thus they fought all the long day, and never stinted<sup>6</sup> till the noble knights were laid to the cold earth. And ever they fought still till it was near night, and by then was there an hundred thousand laid dead upon the down.<sup>7</sup> Then was King Arthur wood-wroth<sup>8</sup> out of measure when he saw his people so slain from him. And so he looked about him and could see no mo<sup>9</sup> of all his host, and good knights left no mo on-live, but two knights: the t'one<sup>1</sup> was Sir Lucan the Butler and [the other] his brother Sir Bedivere. And yet they were full sore wounded.

"Jesu, mercy," said the King, "where are all my noble knights become?<sup>2</sup> Alas that ever I should see this doleful day! For now," said King Arthur, "I am come to mine end. But would to God," said he, "that I wist<sup>3</sup> now where were that traitor Sir Mordred that has caused all this mischief."

Then King Arthur looked about and was ware where stood Sir Mordred leaning upon his sword among a great heap of dead men.

"Now give me my spear," said King Arthur unto Sir Lucan, "for yonder I have espied the traitor that all this woe hath wrought."

"Sir, let him be," said Sir Lucan, "for he is unhappy.<sup>4</sup> And if ye pass this unhappy day ye shall be right well revenged upon him. And, good lord, remember ye of your night's dream, and what the spirit of Sir Gawain told you tonight, and yet God of his great goodness hath preserved you hitherto. And for God's sake, my lord, leave off by this,<sup>5</sup> for, blessed be God, ye have won the field: for yet we been here three on-live, and with Sir Mordred is not one on-live. And therefore if ye leave off now, this wicked day of destiny is past."

"Now, tide<sup>6</sup> me death, tide me life," said the King, "now I see him yonder alone, he shall never escape mine hands. For at a better avail<sup>7</sup> shall I never have him."

"God speed you well!" said Sir Bedivere.

Then the King got his spear in both his hands and ran toward Sir Mordred, crying and saying, "Traitor, now is thy deathday come!"

And when Sir Mordred saw King Arthur he ran until him with his sword drawn in his hand, and there King Arthur smote Sir Mordred under the shield, with a foin<sup>8</sup> of his spear, throughout the body more than a fathom.<sup>9</sup> And when Sir Mordred felt that he had his death's wound, he thrust himself with the might that he had up to the burr<sup>1</sup> of King Arthur's spear, and right so he smote his father King Arthur with his sword holden in both his hands, upon the side of the head, that the sword pierced the helmet and the tay<sup>2</sup> of the brain. And therewith Sir Mordred dashed down stark dead to the earth.

And noble King Arthur fell in a swough<sup>3</sup> to the earth, and there he swooned oftentimes, and Sir Lucan and Sir Bedivere oftentimes heaved him up. And so, weakly betwixt them, they led him to a little chapel not far from the seaside, and when the King was there, him thought him reasonably eased. Then heard they people cry in the field. "Now go thou, Sir Lucan," said the King, "and do me to wit<sup>4</sup> what betokens that noise in the field."

So Sir Lucan departed, for he was grievously wounded in many places. And so as he yede<sup>5</sup> he saw and harkened by the moonlight how that pillers<sup>6</sup> and robbers were come into the field to pill and to rob many a full noble knight of brooches and bees<sup>7</sup> and of many a good ring and many a rich jewel. And who that were not dead all out there they slew them for their harness<sup>8</sup> and their riches. When Sir Lucan understood this work, he came to the King as soon as he might and told him all what he had heard and seen. "Therefore by my read,"<sup>9</sup> said Sir Lucan, "it is best that we bring you to some town."

"I would it were so," said the King, "but I may not stand, my head works<sup>1</sup> so. Ah, Sir Lancelot," said King Arthur, "this day have I sore missed thee. And alas that ever I was against thee, for now have I my death, whereof Sir Gawain me warned in my dream."

Then Sir Lucan took up the King the t'one party<sup>2</sup> and Sir Bedivere the other party; and in the lifting up the King swooned and in the lifting Sir Lucan fell in a swoon that part of his guts fell out of his body, and therewith the noble knight's heart burst. And when the King awoke he beheld Sir Lucan how he lay foaming at the mouth and part of his guts lay at his feet.

"Alas," said the King, "this is to me a full heavy<sup>3</sup> sight to see this noble duke so die for my sake, for he would have holpen<sup>4</sup> me that had more need of help than I. Alas that he would not complain him for<sup>5</sup> his heart was so set to help me. Now Jesu have mercy upon his soul."

Then Sir Bedivere wept for the death of his brother.

"Now leave this mourning and weeping, gentle knight," said the King, "for all this will not avail me. For wit thou well, and<sup>6</sup> I might live myself, the death of Sir Lucan would grieve me evermore. But my time passeth on fast," said the King. "Therefore," said King Arthur unto Sir Bedivere, "take thou here Excalibur<sup>7</sup> my good sword and go with it to yonder water's side; and when thou comest there I charge thee throw my sword in that water and come again and tell me what thou sawest there."

"My lord," said Sir Bedivere, "your commandment shall be done, and [I shall] lightly<sup>8</sup> bring you word again."

So Sir Bedivere departed. And by the way he beheld that noble sword, that the pommel and the haft<sup>9</sup> was all precious stones. And then he said to himself, "If I throw this rich sword in the water, thereof shall never come good, but harm and loss." And then Sir Bedivere hid Excalibur under a tree. And so, as soon as he might, he came again unto the King and said he had been at the water and had thrown the sword into the water.

"What saw thou there?" said the King.

"Sir," he said, "I saw nothing but waves and winds."

"That is untruly said of thee," said the King. "And therefore go thou lightly again and do my commandment; as thou art to me lief<sup>1</sup> and dear, spare not, but throw it in."

Then Sir Bedivere returned again and took the sword in his hand. And yet him thought<sup>2</sup> sin and shame to throw away that noble sword. And so eft<sup>3</sup> he hid the sword and returned again and told the King that he had been at the water and done his commandment.

"What sawest thou there?" said the King.

"Sir," he said, "I saw nothing but waters wap and waves wan."<sup>4</sup>

"Ah, traitor unto me and untrue," said King Arthur, "now hast thou betrayed me twice. Who would have weened that thou that has been to me so lief and dear, and thou art named a noble knight, and would betray me for the riches of this sword. But now go again lightly, for thy long tarrying putteth me in great jeopardy of my life, for I have taken cold. And but if thou do now as I bid thee, if ever I may see thee I shall slay thee mine<sup>5</sup> own hands, for thou wouldest for my rich sword see me dead."

Then Sir Bedivere departed and went to the sword and lightly took it up, and so he went to the water's side; and there he bound the girdle<sup>6</sup> about the hilts, and threw the sword as far into the water as he might. And there came an arm and an hand above the water and took it and clutched it, and shook it thrice and brandished; and then vanished away the hand with the sword into the water. So Sir Bedivere came again to the King and told him what he saw.

"Alas," said the King, "help me hence, for I dread me I have tarried overlong."

Then Sir Bedivere took the King upon his back and so went with him to that water's side. And when they were at the water's side, even fast<sup>7</sup> by the bank hovered<sup>8</sup> a little barge with many fair ladies in it; and among them all was a queen; and all they had black hoods, and all they wept and shrieked when they saw King Arthur.

"Now put me into that barge," said the King; and so he did softly. And there received him three ladies with great mourning, and so they set them<sup>9</sup> down. And in one of their laps King Arthur laid his head, and then the queen said, "Ah, my dear brother, why have ye tarried so long from me? Alas, this wound on your head hath caught overmuch cold." And anon they rowed fromward the land, and Sir Bedivere beheld all tho ladies go froward him.

Then Sir Bedivere cried and said, "Ah, my lord Arthur, what shall become of me, now ye go from me and leave me here alone among mine enemies?"

"Comfort thyself," said the King, "and do as well as thou mayest, for in me is no trust for to trust in. For I must into the vale of Avilion<sup>1</sup> to heal me of my grievous wound. And if thou hear nevermore of me, pray for my soul."

But ever the queen and ladies wept and shrieked that it was pity to hear. And as soon as Sir Bedivere had lost the sight of the barge he wept and wailed and so took the forest, and went<sup>2</sup> all that night. And in the morning he was ware betwixt two holts hoar<sup>3</sup> of a chapel and an hermitage.<sup>4</sup>

Thus of Arthur I find no more written in books that been authorized,<sup>5</sup> neither more of the very certainty of his death heard I never read,<sup>6</sup> but thus was he led away in a ship wherein were three queens: that one was King Arthur's sister, Queen Morgan la Fée,<sup>7</sup> the t'other<sup>8</sup> was the Queen of North Wales, and the third was the Queen of the Waste Lands. * * *

Now more of the death of King Arthur could I never find but that these ladies brought him to his burials,<sup>9</sup> and such one was buried there that the hermit bore witness that sometime was Bishop of Canterbury.<sup>1</sup> But yet the hermit knew not in certain that he was verily the body of King Arthur, for this tale Sir Bedivere, a Knight of the Table Round, made it to be written. Yet some men say in many parts of England that King Arthur is not dead, but had<sup>2</sup> by the will of our Lord Jesu into another place. And men say that he shall come again and he shall win the Holy Cross. Yet I will not say that it shall be so, but rather I will say, Here in this world he changed his life. And many men say that there is written upon his tomb this verse: Hic iacet Arthurus, rex quondam, rexque futurus.<sup>3</sup>

The pope arranges a truce, Guinevere is returned to Arthur, and Lancelot and his kin leave England to become rulers of France. At Gawain's instigation Arthur invades France to resume the war against Lancelot. Word comes to the king that Mordred has seized the kingdom, and Arthur leads his forces back to England. Mordred attacks them upon their landing, and Gawain is mortally wounded and dies, although not before he has repented for insisting that Arthur fight Lancelot and has written Lancelot to come to the aid of his former lord.

[THE DEATHS OF LANCELOT AND GUINEVERE]<sup>4</sup>

And thus upon a night there came a vision to Sir Lancelot and charged him, in remission<sup>5</sup> of his sins, to haste him unto Amesbury: "And by then<sup>6</sup> thou come there, thou shalt find Queen Guinevere dead. And therefore take thy fellows with thee, and purvey them of an horse-bier,<sup>7</sup> and fetch thou the corse<sup>8</sup> of her, and bury her by her husband, the noble King Arthur. So this avision<sup>9</sup> came to Lancelot thrice in one night. Then Sir Lancelot rose up ere day and told the hermit.

"It were well done," said the hermit, "that ye made you ready and that ye disobey not the avision."

Then Sir Lancelot took his eight fellows with him, and on foot they yede<sup>1</sup> from Glastonbury to Amesbury, the which is little more than thirty mile, and thither they came within two days, for they were weak and feeble to go. And when Sir Lancelot was come to Amesbury within the nunnery, Queen Guinevere died but half an hour afore. And the ladies told Sir Lancelot that Queen Guinevere told them all ere she passed that Sir Lancelot had been priest near a twelve-month:<sup>2</sup> "and hither he cometh as fast as he may to fetch my corse, and beside my lord King Arthur he shall bury me." Wherefore the Queen said in hearing of them all, "I beseech Almighty God that I may never have power to see Sir Lancelot with my worldly eyes."

"And thus," said all the ladies, "was ever her prayer these two days till she was dead."

Then Sir Lancelot saw her visage, but he wept not greatly, but sighed. And so he did all the observance of the service himself, both the dirige<sup>3</sup> and on the morn he sang mass. And there was ordained<sup>4</sup> an horse-bier, and so with an hundred torches ever burning about the corse of the Queen, and ever Sir Lancelot with his eight fellows went about<sup>5</sup> the horse-bier, singing and reading many an holy orison,<sup>6</sup> and frankincense upon the corse incensed.<sup>7</sup>

Thus Sir Lancelot and his eight fellows went on foot from Amesbury unto Glastonbury, and when they were come to the chapel and the hermitage, there she had a dirige with great devotion.<sup>8</sup> And on the morn the hermit that sometime<sup>9</sup> was Bishop of Canterbury sang the mass of requiem with great devotion, and Sir Lancelot was the first that offered, and then als<sup>1</sup> his eight fellows. And then she was wrapped in cered cloth of Rennes, from the top<sup>2</sup> to the toe, in thirtyfold, and after she was put in a web<sup>3</sup> of lead, and then in a coffin of marble.

And when she was put in the earth Sir Lancelot swooned and lay long still, while<sup>4</sup> the hermit came and awaked him, and said, "Ye be to blame, for ye displease God with such manner of sorrow-making."

"Truly," said Sir Lancelot, "I trust I do not displease God, for He knoweth mine intent—for my sorrow was not, nor is not, for any rejoicing of sin, but my sorrow may never have end. For when I remember of her beaulté and of her noblesse<sup>5</sup> that was both with her king and with her,<sup>6</sup> so when I saw his corse and her corse so lie together, truly mine heart would not serve to sustain my careful<sup>7</sup> body. Also when I remember me how by my defaute and mine orgule<sup>8</sup> and my pride that they were both laid full low, that were peerless that ever was living of Christian people, wit you well," said Sir Lancelot, "this remembered, of their kindness and mine unkindness, sank so to mine heart that I might not sustain myself." So the French book maketh mention.

Then Sir Lancelot never after ate but little meat,<sup>9</sup> nor drank, till he was dead, for then he sickened more and more and dried and dwined<sup>1</sup> away. For the Bishop nor none of his fellows might not make him to eat, and little he drank, that he was waxen by a kibbet<sup>2</sup> shorter than he was, that the people could not know him. For evermore, day and night, he prayed, but sometime he slumbered a broken sleep. Ever he was lying groveling on the tomb of King Arthur and Queen Guinevere, and there was no comfort that the Bishop nor Sir Bors, nor none of his fellows could make him—it availed not.

So within six weeks after, Sir Lancelot fell sick and lay in his bed. And then he sent for the Bishop that there was hermit, and all his true fellows. Then Sir Lancelot said with dreary steven,<sup>3</sup> "Sir Bishop, I pray you give to me all my rights that longeth<sup>4</sup> to a Christian man."

"It shall not need you,"<sup>5</sup> said the hermit and all his fellows. "It is but heaviness of your blood. Ye shall be well mended by the grace of God tomorn."

"My fair lords," said Sir Lancelot, "wit you well my careful body will into the earth; I have warning more than now I will say. Therefore give me my rights."

So when he was houseled and annealed<sup>6</sup> and had all that a Christian man ought to have, he prayed the Bishop that his fellows might bear his body to Joyous Garde. (Some men say it was Alnwick, and some men say it was Bamborough.) "Howbeit," said Sir Lancelot, "me repenteth<sup>7</sup> sore, but I made mine avow sometime that in Joyous Garde I would be buried. And because of breaking<sup>8</sup> of mine avow, I pray you all, lead me thither." Then there was weeping and wringing of hands among his fellows.

So at a season of the night they all went to their beds, for they all lay in one chamber. And so after midnight, against<sup>9</sup> day, the Bishop that was hermit, as he lay in his bed asleep, he fell upon a great laughter. And therewith all the fellowship awoke and came to the Bishop and asked him what he ailed.<sup>1</sup>

"Ah, Jesu mercy," said the Bishop, "why did ye awake me? I was never in all my life so merry and so well at ease."

"Wherefore?" said Sir Bors.

"Truly," said the Bishop, "here was Sir Lancelot with me, with mo<sup>2</sup> angels than ever I saw men in one day. And I saw the angels heave<sup>3</sup> up Sir Lancelot unto heaven, and the gates of heaven opened against him."

"It is but dretching of swevens,"<sup>4</sup> said Sir Bors, "for I doubt not Sir Lancelot aileth nothing but good."<sup>5</sup>

"It may well be," said the Bishop. "Go ye to his bed and then shall ye prove the sooth."

So when Sir Bors and his fellows came to his bed, they found him stark dead. And he lay as he had smiled, and the sweetest savor<sup>6</sup> about him that ever they felt. Then was there weeping and wringing of hands, and the greatest dole they made that ever made men. And on the morn the Bishop did his mass of Requiem, and after the Bishop and all the nine knights put Sir Lancelot in the same horse-bier that Queen Guinevere was laid in tofore that she was buried. And so the Bishop and they all together went with the body of Sir Lancelot daily, till they came to Joyous Garde. And ever they had an hundred torches burning about him.

And so within fifteen days they came to Joyous Garde. And there they laid his corse in the body of the choir,<sup>7</sup> and sang and read many psalters<sup>8</sup> and prayers over him and about him. And ever his visage was laid open and naked, that all folks might behold him; for such was the custom in tho<sup>9</sup> days that all men of worship should so lie with open visage till that they were buried.

And right thus as they were at their service, there came Sir Ector de Maris that had seven year sought all England, Scotland, and Wales, seeking his brother, Sir Lancelot. And when Sir Ector heard such noise and light in the choir of Joyous Garde, he alight and put his horse from him and came into the choir. And there he saw men sing and weep, and all they knew Sir Ector, but he knew not them. Then went Sir Bors unto Sir Ector and told him how there lay his brother, Sir Lancelot, dead. And then Sir Ector threw his shield, sword, and helm from him, and when he beheld Sir Lancelot's visage, he fell down in a swoon. And when he waked, it were hard any tongue to tell the doleful complaints that he made for his brother.

"Ah, Lancelot!" he said, "thou were head of all Christian knights. And now I dare say," said Sir Ector, "thou Sir Lancelot, there thou liest, that thou were never matched of earthly knight's hand. And thou were the courteoust<sup>1</sup> knight that ever bore shield. And thou were the truest friend to thy lover that ever bestrode horse, and thou were the truest lover, of a sinful man,<sup>2</sup> that ever loved woman, and thou were the kindest man that ever struck with sword. And thou were the goodliest person that ever came among press of knights, and thou was the meekest man and the gentlest that ever ate in hall among ladies, and thou were the sternest knight to thy mortal foe that ever put spear in the rest.”<sup>3</sup>

Then there was weeping and dolor out of measure.

Thus they kept Sir Lancelot’s corse aloft fifteen days, and then they buried it with great devotion. And then at leisure they went all with the Bishop of Canterbury to his hermitage, and there they were together more than a month.

Then Sir Constantine that was Sir Cador’s son of Cornwall was chosen king of England, and he was a full noble knight, and worshipfully he ruled this realm. And then this King Constantine sent for the Bishop of Canterbury, for he heard say where he was. And so he was restored unto his bishopric and left that hermitage, and Sir Bedivere was there ever still hermit to his life’s end.

Then Sir Bors de Ganis, Sir Ector de Maris, Sir Gahalantine, Sir Galihud, Sir Galihodin, Sir Blamour, Sir Bleoberis, Sir Villiars le Valiant, Sir Clarrus of Clermount, all these knights drew them to their countries.<sup>4</sup> Howbeit<sup>5</sup> King Constantine would have had them with him, but they would not abide in this realm. And there they all lived in their countries as holy men.

And some English books make mention that they went never out of England after the death of Sir Lancelot—but that was but favor of makers.<sup>6</sup> For the French book maketh mention—and is authorized—that Sir Bors, Sir Ector, Sir Blamour, and Sir Bleoberis went into the Holy Land, whereas Jesu Christ was quick<sup>7</sup> and dead, and anon as they had stablished their lands,<sup>8</sup> for the book saith so Sir Lancelot commanded them for to do ere ever he passed out of this world. There these four knights did many battles upon the miscreants,<sup>9</sup> or Turks, and there they died upon a Good Friday for God’s sake.

Here is the end of the whole book of King Arthur and of his noble knights of the Round Table, that when they were whole together there was ever an hundred and forty. And here is the end of The Death of Arthur.<sup>1</sup>

I pray you all gentlemen and gentlewomen that readeth this book of Arthur and his knights from the beginning to the ending, pray for me while I am alive that God send me good deliverance. And when I am dead, I pray you all pray for my soul.

For this book was ended the ninth year of the reign of King Edward the Fourth, by Sir Thomas Malory, knight, as Jesu help him for His great might, as he is the servant of Jesu both day and night.

EVERYMAN after 1485

Everyman belongs to the midpoint of the morality play's history. The surviving examples of this genre include only a handful from the fifteenth century (for example, the earliest, The Pride of Life, ca. 1400) but more than two dozen from the sixteenth century, dating as late as 1579 (The Marriage between Wit and Wisdom). Morality plays apparently originated side by side with the mystery plays (see p. 247) but were composed individually rather than in cycles and were dominated by allegorical characters. Some morality plays addressed such diverse subjects as social and political satire (All for Money, Skelton's Magnificence), philosophy of education (The Marriage of Wit and Science), Protestant polemic (The Conflict of Conscience), prudential morality (The Contention between Liberality and Prodigality), and natural science (The Nature of the Four Elements). From first to last, however, the dominant theme was the struggle of good and evil for the human soul (psychomachia), usually depicted in the life span of a representative figure with a name like "Mankind." Everyman, untypically, is devoted entirely to the day of judgment that every individual human being must face eventually. The play represents allegorically the forces—both outside the protagonist and within—that can help save Everyman and those that cannot or that obstruct his salvation.

Everyman lacks the broad (even slapstick) humor of many morality plays that portray as clowns the vices that try to lure the Everyman figure away from salvation. The play does contain a certain grim humor in showing the haste with which the hero's fair-weather friends abandon him when they discover what his problem is. The play inculcates its austere lesson by the simplicity and directness of its language and of its approach. A sense of urgency builds—one by one Everyman's supposed resources fail him as time is running out. Ultimately Knowledge teaches him the lesson that every pre-Reformation Christian must learn in order to be saved (and that every post-Reformation Christian who believed in grace alone had to unlearn): that Good Deeds is his only true friend who will accompany him on his perilous journey.

The play was written near the end of the fifteenth century. It is probably a translation of a Flemish play, although it is possible that the Flemish play is the translation and the English Everyman the original.

HERE BEGINNETH A TREATISE HOW THE HIGH FATHER OF HEAVEN SENDETH DEATH TO SUMMON EVERY CREATURE TO COME AND GIVE ACCOUNT OF THEIR LIVES IN THIS WORLD, AND IS IN MANNER OF A MORAL PLAY

[Enter MESSENGER.]

MESSENGER I pray you all give your audience,<sup>o</sup>
And hear this matter with reverence,<sup>o</sup>
By figure<sup>o</sup> a moral play.
The Summoning of Everyman called it is,
That of our lives and ending shows
5 How transitory we be all day.<sup>o</sup>
The matter is wonder precious,
But the intent of it is more gracious
And sweet to bear away.
The story saith: Man, in the beginning
10 Look well, and take good heed to the ending,
Be you never so gay.
You think sin in the beginning full sweet,
Which in the end causeth the soul to weep,
When the body lieth in clay.
15 Here shall you see how fellowship and jollity,
Both strength, pleasure, and beauty,
Will fade from thee as flower in May.
For ye shall hear how our Heaven-King
Calleth Everyman to a general reckoning.
20 Give audience and hear what he doth say.

[Exit MESSENGER.—Enter GOD.]

GOD I perceive, here in my majesty,
How that all creatures be to me unkind,<sup>o</sup>
Living without dread in worldly prosperity.
Of ghostly<sup>o</sup> sight the people be so blind,
25 Drowned in sin, they know me not for their God.
In worldly riches is all their mind:

They fear not of my righteousness the sharp rod;
My law that I showed when I for them died
They forget clean, and shedding of my blood red.
30 I hanged between two,<sup>2</sup> it cannot be denied:
To get them life I suffered to be dead.<sup>o</sup>
I healed their feet, with thorns hurt was my head.
I could do no more than I did, truly—
And now I see the people do clean forsake me.
35 They use the seven deadly sins damnable,
As pride, coveitise,<sup>o</sup> wrath, and lechery<sup>3</sup>
Now in the world be made commendable.
And thus they leave of angels the heavenly company.
Every man liveth so after his own pleasure,
40 And yet of their life they be nothing sure.
I see the more that I them forbear,
The worse they be from year to year:
All that liveth appaireth<sup>o</sup> fast.
Therefore I will, in all the haste,
45 Have a reckoning of every man's person.
For, and<sup>o</sup> I leave the people thus alone
In their life and wicked tempests,
Verily they will become much worse than beasts;
For now one would by envy another up eat.
50 Charity do they all clean forgeet.
I hoped well that every man
In my glory should make his mansion,
And thereto I had them all elect.<sup>o</sup>
But now I see, like traitors deject,<sup>o</sup> 55 They thank me not for the pleasure that I to<sup>o</sup> them meant,
Nor yet for their being that I them have lent.
I proffered the people great multitude of mercy,
And few there be that asketh it heartily.<sup>o</sup>
They be so cumbered<sup>o</sup> with worldly riches
60 That needs on them I must do justice—

On every man living without fear.
Where art thou, Death, thou mighty messenger?

[Enter DEATH.]

DEATH    Almighty God, I am here at your will,
Your commandment to fulfill.

65    GOD    Go thou to Everyman,
And show him, in my name,
A pilgrimage he must on him take,
Which he in no wise may escape;
70    And that he bring with him a sure reckoning
Without delay or any tarrying.

DEATH    Lord, I will in the world go run over all,°
And cruelly out-search both great and small.

[Exit GOD.]

Everyman will I beset that liveth beastly
Out of God's laws, and dreadeth not folly.
75    He that loveth riches I will strike with my dart,
His sight to blind, and from heaven to depart°
Except that Almsdeeds be his good friend—
In hell for to dwell, world without end.
80    Lo, yonder I see Everyman walking:
Full little he thinketh on my coming;
His mind is on fleshly lusts and his treasure,
And great pain it shall cause him to endure
Before the Lord, Heaven-King.

[Enter EVERYMAN.]

85    Everyman, stand still! Whither art thou going Thus gaily? Hast thou thy Maker forget?°

EVERYMAN    Why askest thou?

Why wouldest thou weet?°

DEATH    Yea, sir, I will show you:

90 In great haste I am sent to thee
 From God out of his majesty.
 EVERYMAN What! sent to me?
 DEATH Yea, certainly.
 Though thou have forgot him here,
 He thinketh on thee in the heavenly sphere,
 95 As, ere we depart, thou shalt know.
 EVERYMAN What desireth God of me?<sup>4</sup>
 DEATH That shall I show thee:
 A reckoning he will needs have
 Without any longer respite.
 100 EVERYMAN To give a reckoning longer leisure I crave.<sup>o</sup>
 This blind<sup>o</sup> matter troubleth my wit.<sup>o</sup>
 DEATH On thee thou must take a long journey:
 Therefore thy book of count<sup>o</sup> with thee thou bring,
 For turn again thou cannot by no way.
 105 And look thou be sure of thy reckoning,
 For before God thou shalt answer and shew
 Thy many bad deeds and good but a few—
 How thou hast spent thy life and in what wise,
 Before the Chief Lord of Paradise.
 110 Have ado that we were in that way,<sup>5</sup>
 For weet<sup>o</sup> thou well thou shalt make none attorney.<sup>6</sup> EVERYMAN Full unready I am such reckoning to give.
 I know thee not. What messenger art thou?
 DEATH I am Death that no man dreadeth,<sup>7</sup>
 115 For every man I 'rest,<sup>o</sup> and no man spareth;
 For it is God's commandment
 That all to me should be obedient.
 EVERYMAN O Death, thou comest when I had thee least in mind.
 In thy power it lieth me to save:
 120 Yet of my good<sup>o</sup> will I give thee, if thou will be kind,
 Yea, a thousand pound shalt thou have—
 And defer this matter till another day.

DEATH Everyman, it may not be, by no way.
 I set nought by<sup>8</sup> gold, silver, nor riches,
 125 Nor by pope, emperor, king, duke, nor princes,
 For, and<sup>o</sup> I would receive gifts great,
 All the world I might get.
 But my custom is clean contrary:
 I give thee no respite. Come hence and not tarry!
 130 EVERYMAN Alas, shall I have no longer respite?
 I may say Death giveth no warning.
 To think on thee it maketh my heart sick,
 For all unready is my book of reckoning.
 But twelve year and I might have a bidding,<sup>9</sup>
 135 My counting-book I would make so clear
 That my reckoning I should not need to fear.
 Wherefore, Death, I pray thee, for God's mercy,
 Spare me till I be provided of remedy.
 DEATH Thee availeth not to cry, weep, and pray; 140 But haste thee lightly<sup>o</sup> that thou were gone that journey
 And prove<sup>o</sup> thy friends, if thou can.
 For weet<sup>o</sup> thou well the tide<sup>o</sup> abideth no man,
 And in the world each living creature
 For Adam's sin must die of nature.<sup>1</sup> 145 EVERYMAN Death, if I should this pilgrimage take
 And my reckoning surely make,
 Show me, for saint<sup>o</sup> charity,
 Should I not come again shortly?
 DEATH No, Everyman. And<sup>o</sup> thou be once there, 150 Thou mayst never more come here,
 Trust me verily.
 EVERYMAN O gracious God in the high seat celestial,
 Have mercy on me in this most need!
 Shall I have company from this vale terrestrial 155 Of mine acquaintance that way me to lead?
 DEATH Yea, if any be so hardy

That would go with thee and bear thee company.
Hie<sup>o</sup> thee that thou were gone to God's magnificence,
Thy reckoning to give before his presence.
160 What, weenest<sup>o</sup> thou thy life is given thee,
And thy worldly goods also?
EVERYMAN I had weened so, verily.
DEATH Nay, nay, it was but lent thee.
For as soon as thou art go,
165 Another a while shall have it and then go therefro,<sup>2</sup>
Even as thou hast done.
Everyman, thou art mad! Thou hast thy wits<sup>o</sup> five,
And here on earth will not amend thy live!<sup>3</sup>
For suddenly I do come.
170 EVERYMAN O wretched caitiff! Whither shall I flee
That I might 'scape this endless sorrow?
Now, gentle Death, spare me till tomorrow,
That I may amend me
With good advisement.<sup>o</sup>
175 DEATH Nay, thereto I will not consent,
Nor no man will I respite,
But to the heart suddenly I shall smite,
Without any advisement.<sup>o</sup>
And now out of thy sight I will me hie:
180 See thou make thee ready shortly,
For thou mayst say this is the day
That no man living may 'scape away.

[Exit DEATH.]

EVERYMAN Alas, I may well weep with sighs deep:
Now have I no manner of company
185 To help me in my journey and me to keep.<sup>o</sup>
And also my writing<sup>o</sup> is full unready—
How shall I do now for to excuse me?
I would to God I had never be geet!<sup>o</sup>

190 To my soul a full great profit it had be.
For now I fear pains huge and great.
The time passeth: Lord, help, that all wrought!
For though I mourn, it availeth nought.
The day passeth and is almost ago:°
I wot° not well what for to do.
195 To whom were I best my complaint to make?
What and° I to Fellowship thereof spake,
And showed him of this sudden chance?
For in him is all mine affiance,°
200 We have in the world so many a day
Be good friends in sport and play.
I see him yonder, certainly.
I trust that he will bear me company.
Therefore to him will I speak to ease my sorrow.

[Enter FELLOWSHIP.]

205 Well met, good Fellowship, and good morrow!
FELLOWSHIP Everyman, good morrow, by this day!
Sir, why lookest thou so piteously?
If anything be amiss, I pray thee me say,
That I may help to remedy.
EVERYMAN Yea, good Fellowship, yea:
210 I am in great jeopardy.
FELLOWSHIP My true friend, show to me your mind.
I will not forsake thee to my life's end
In the way of good company.
EVERYMAN That was well spoken, and lovingly!
215 FELLOWSHIP Sir, I must needs know your heaviness.°
I have pity to see you in any distress.
If any have you wronged, ye shall revenged be,
Though I on the ground be slain for thee,
Though that I know before that I should die.
220 EVERYMAN Verily, Fellowship, gramercy.°
FELLOWSHIP Tush! by thy thanks I set not a stree.°

Show me your grief and say no more.
 EVERYMAN If I my heart should to you break,<sup>o</sup>
 And then you to turn your mind fro me,
 225 And would not me comfort when ye hear me speak,
 Then should I ten times sorrier be.
 FELLOWSHIP Sir, I say as I will do, indeed.
 EVERYMAN Then be you a good friend at need.
 I have found you true herebefore.
 230 FELLOWSHIP And so ye shall evermore.
 For, in faith, and<sup>o</sup> thou go to hell,
 I will not forsake thee by the way.
 EVERYMAN Ye speak like a good friend. I believe you well.
 I shall deserve<sup>o</sup> it, and<sup>o</sup> I may.
 235 FELLOWSHIP I speak of no deserving, by this day!
 For he that will say and nothing do
 Is not worthy with good company to go.
 Therefore show me the grief of your mind,
 As to your friend most loving and kind.
 240 EVERYMAN I shall show you how it is:
 Commanded I am to go a journey,
 A long way, hard and dangerous,
 And give a strait<sup>o</sup> count,<sup>o</sup> without delay,
 Before the high judge Adonai.<sup>o</sup>
 245 Wherefore I pray you bear me company,
 As ye have promised, in this journey.
 FELLOWSHIP This is matter indeed! Promise is duty—
 But, and<sup>o</sup> I should take such a voyage on me,
 I know it well, it should be to my pain.
 250 Also it maketh me afeard, certain.
 But let us take counsel here, as well as we can—
 For your words would fear<sup>o</sup> a strong man.
 EVERYMAN Why, ye said if I had need,
 Ye would me never forsake, quick ne dead,
 255 Though it were to hell, truly.
 FELLOWSHIP So I said, certainly,

But such pleasures<sup>o</sup> be set aside, the sooth to say.
 And also, if we took such a journey,
 When should we again come?
 260 EVERYMAN Nay, never again, till the day of doom.
 FELLOWSHIP In faith, then will not I come there!
 Who hath you these tidings brought?
 EVERYMAN Indeed, Death was with me here.
 FELLOWSHIP Now by God that all hath bought,<sup>o</sup>
 265 If Death were the messenger,
 For no man that is living today
 I will not go that loath<sup>o</sup> journey—
 Not for the father that begat me!
 EVERYMAN Ye promised otherwise, pardie.<sup>o</sup>
 270 FELLOWSHIP I wot well I said so, truly.
 And yet, if thou wilt eat and drink and make good cheer,
 Or haunt to women the lusty company,<sup>4</sup>
 I would not forsake you while the day is clear,
 Trust me verily!
 275 EVERYMAN Yea, thereto ye would be ready—
 To go to mirth, solace,<sup>o</sup> and play:
 Your mind to folly will sooner apply<sup>o</sup>
 Than to bear me company in my long journey.
 FELLOWSHIP Now in good faith, I will not that way.
 280 But, and<sup>o</sup> thou will murder or any man kill,
 In that I will help thee with a good will.
 EVERYMAN O that is simple<sup>o</sup> advice, indeed!
 Gentle fellow, help me in my necessity:
 We have loved long, and now I need—
 285 And now, gentle Fellowship, remember me!
 FELLOWSHIP Whether ye have loved me or no,
 By Saint John, I will not with thee go!
 EVERYMAN Yet I pray thee take the labor and do so much for me,
 290 To bring me forward,<sup>o</sup> for saint charity,

And comfort me till I come without the town.
FELLOWSHIP Nay, and<sup>o</sup> thou would give me a new gown,
I will not a foot with thee go.
But, and<sup>o</sup> thou had tarried, I would not have left thee so.
And as now, God speed thee in thy journey!
295 For from thee I will depart as fast as I may.
EVERYMAN Whither away, Fellowship? Will thou forsake me?
FELLOWSHIP Yea, by my fay!<sup>o</sup> To God I betake<sup>o</sup> thee.
EVERYMAN Farewell, good Fellowship! For thee my heart is sore.
Adieu forever—I shall see thee no more.
300 FELLOWSHIP In faith, Everyman, farewell now at the ending:
For you I will remember that parting is mourning.

[Exit FELLOWSHIP.]

EVERYMAN Alack, shall we thus depart<sup>o</sup> indeed—
Ah, Lady, help!<sup>5</sup>—without any more comfort?
Lo, Fellowship forsaketh me in my most need!
305 For help in this world whither shall I resort?
Fellowship herebefore<sup>o</sup> with me would merry make,
And now little sorrow for me doth he take.
It is said, "In prosperity men friends may find
Which in adversity be full unkind."
310 Now whither for succor<sup>o</sup> shall I flee, Sith<sup>o</sup> that Fellowship hath forsaken me?
To my kinsmen I will, truly,
Praying them to help me in my necessity.
I believe that they will do so,
315 For kind will creep where it may not go.<sup>6</sup>
I will go 'say<sup>o</sup>—for yonder I see them—
Where<sup>o</sup> be ye now my friends and kinsmen.

[Enter KINDRED and COUSIN.]

KINDRED Here be we now at your commandment:
Cousin, I pray you show us your intent
320 In any wise, and not spare.
COUSIN Yea, Everyman, and to us declare
If ye be disposed to go anywhither.
For, weete<sup>o</sup> you well, we will live and die together.
KINDRED In wealth and woe we will with you hold,
325 For over his kin a man may be bold.<sup>7</sup>
EVERYMAN Gramercy,<sup>o</sup> my friends and kinsmen kind.
Now shall I show you the grief of my mind.
I was commanded by a messenger
That is a high king's chief officer:
330 He bade me go a pilgrimage, to my pain—
And I know well I shall never come again.
Also I must give a reckoning strait,<sup>o</sup>
For I have a great enemy that hath me in wait,<sup>8</sup>
Which intendeth me to hinder.
335 KINDRED What account is that which ye must render?
That would I know.
EVERYMAN Of all my works I must show
How I have lived and my days spent;
Also of ill deeds that I have used
340 In my time sith<sup>o</sup> life was me lent,
And of all virtues that I have refused.
Therefore I pray you go thither with me
To help me make mine account, for saint<sup>o</sup> charity.
COUSIN What, to go thither? Is that the matter?
345 Nay, Everyman, I had liefer fast<sup>9</sup> bread and water
All this five year and more!
EVERYMAN Alas, that ever I was bore!<sup>o</sup>
For now shall I never be merry
If that you forsake me.
350 KINDRED Ah, sir, what? Ye be a merry man:

Take good heart to you and make no moan.
But one thing I warn you, by Saint Anne,
As for me, ye shall go alone.

- EVERYMAN My Cousin, will you not with me go?
355 COUSIN No, by Our Lady! I have the cramp in my toe:
Trust not to me. For, so God me speed,o
I will deceive you in your most need.
KINDRED It availeth you not us to 'tice.o
Ye shall have my maid with all my heart:
360 She loveth to go to feasts, there to be nice,o
And to dance, and abroad to start.1
I will give her leave to help you in that journey,
If that you and she may agree.
EVERYMAN Now show me the very effecto of your mind:
365 Will you go with me or abide behind?
KINDRED Abide behind? Yea, that will I ando I may!
Therefore farewell till another day.

[Exit KINDRED.]

- EVERYMAN How should I be merry or glad?
For fair promises men to me make,
370 But when I have most need they me forsake.
I am deceived. That maketh me sad.
COUSIN Cousin Everyman, farewell now,
For verily I will not go with you;
Also of mine own an unready reckoning
375 I have to account—therefore I make tarrying.
Now God keep thee, for now I go.

[Exit COUSIN.]

- EVERYMAN Ah, Jesus, is all come hereto?o
Lo, fair words maketh fools fain:o
They promise and nothing will do, certain.
380 My kinsmen promised me faithfully

For to abide with me steadfastly,
And now fast away do they flee.
Even so Fellowship promised me.
What friend were best me of to provide?
385 I lose my time here longer to abide.
Yet in my mind a thing there is:
All my life I have loved riches;
If that my Good<sup>o</sup> now help me might,
He would make my heart full light.
390 I will speak to him in this distress.
Where art thou, my Goods and riches?
GOODS [within] Who calleth me? Everyman? What, hast thou haste?
I lie here in corners, trussed and piled so high,
And in chests I am locked so fast—
395 Also sacked in bags—thou mayst see with thine eye
I cannot stir, in packs low where I lie.
What would ye have? Lightly<sup>o</sup> me say.
EVERYMAN Come hither, Good, in all the haste thou may,
For of counsel I must desire thee.

[Enter GOODS.]

GOODS Sir, and<sup>o</sup> ye in the world have sorrow or adversity,<sup>2</sup>
That can I help you to remedy shortly.
EVERYMAN It is another disease<sup>o</sup> that grieveth me:
In this world it is not, I tell thee so.
I am sent for another way to go,
405 To give a strait count general
Before the highest Jupiter<sup>o</sup> of all.
And all my life I have had joy and pleasure in thee:
Therefore I pray thee go with me,
For, peradventure, thou mayst before God Almighty
410 My reckoning help to clean and purify.

For it is said ever among<sup>o</sup>
 That money maketh all right that is wrong.
 GOODS Nay, Everyman, I sing another song:
 I follow no man in such voyages.
 415 For, and<sup>o</sup> I went with thee,
 Thou shouldest fare much the worse for me;
 For because on me thou did set thy mind,
 Thy reckoning I have made blotted and blind,<sup>o</sup>
 That thine account thou cannot make truly—
 420 And that hast thou for the love of me.
 EVERYMAN That would grieve me full sore
 When I should come to that fearful answer.
 Up, let us go thither together.
 GOODS Nay, not so, I am too brittle, I may not endure.
 425 I will follow no man on foot, be ye sure.
 EVERYMAN Alas, I have thee loved and had great pleasure
 All my life-days on good and treasure.
 GOODS That is to thy damnation, without leasing,<sup>o</sup>
 For my love is contrary to the love everlasting.
 430 But if thou had me loved moderately during,<sup>o</sup>
 As to the poor to give part of me,
 Then shouldest thou not in this dolor be,
 Nor in this great sorrow and care.
 EVERYMAN Lo, now was I deceived ere I was ware,
 435 And all I may wite<sup>o</sup> misspending of time.
 GOODS What, weenest<sup>o</sup> thou that I am thine?
 EVERYMAN I had weened so.
 GOODS Nay, Everyman, I say no.
 As for a while I was lent thee;
 440 A season thou hast had me in prosperity.
 My condition<sup>o</sup> is man's soul to kill;
 If I save one, a thousand I do spill.<sup>o</sup>
 Weenest thou that I will follow thee?
 Nay, from this world, not verily.
 445 EVERYMAN I had weened otherwise.

GOODS Therefore to thy soul Good is a thief;
For when thou art dead, this is my guise<sup>o</sup>—
Another to deceive in the same wise
As I have done thee, and all to his soul's reproof.<sup>o</sup>
450 EVERYMAN O false Good, cursed thou be,
Thou traitor to God, that hast deceived me
And caught me in thy snare!
GOODS Marry, thou brought thyself in care,<sup>o</sup>
Whereof I am glad:
455 I must needs laugh, I cannot be sad.
EVERYMAN Ah, Good, thou hast had long my heartily<sup>o</sup> love;
I gave thee that which should be the Lord's above.
But wilt thou not go with me, indeed?
I pray thee truth to say.
460 GOODS No, so God me speed!
Therefore farewell and have good day.

[Exit GOODS.]

EVERYMAN Oh, to whom shall I make my moan
For to go with me in that heavy<sup>o</sup> journey?
First Fellowship said he would with me gone:<sup>o</sup>
465 His words were very pleasant and gay,
But afterward he left me alone.
Then spake I to my kinsmen, all in despair,
And also they gave me words fair—
They lacked no fair speaking,
470 But all forsake me in the ending.
Then went I to my Goods that I loved best,
In hope to have comfort; but there had I least,
For my Goods sharply did me tell
That he bringeth many into hell.
475 Then of myself I was ashamed,
And so I am worthy to be blamed:
Thus may I well myself hate.

Of whom shall I now counsel take?
I think that I shall never speed<sup>o</sup>
480 Till that I go to my Good Deed.
But alas, she is so weak
That she can neither go<sup>o</sup> nor speak.
Yet will I venture<sup>o</sup> on her now.
My Good Deeds, where be you?
485 GOOD DEEDS [speaking from the ground] Here I lie, cold in the ground:
Thy sins hath me sore bound
That I cannot stear.<sup>o</sup>
EVERYMAN O Good Deeds, I stand in fear:
I must you pray of counsel,
490 For help now should come right well.
GOOD DEEDS Everyman, I have understanding
That ye be summoned, account to make,
Before Messiah of Jer'salem King.
And you do by me,<sup>3</sup> that journey with you will I take.
495 EVERYMAN Therefore I come to you my moan to make:
I pray you that ye will go with me.
GOOD DEEDS I would full fain,<sup>o</sup> but I cannot stand, verily.
EVERYMAN Why, is there anything on you fall?<sup>o</sup>
GOOD DEEDS Yea, sir, I may thank you of all:
500 If ye had perfectly cheered me,
Your book of count full ready had be.

[GOOD DEEDS shows him the account book.]

Look, the books of your works and deeds eke,<sup>o</sup>
As how they lie under the feet,
To your soul's heaviness.<sup>o</sup>
505 EVERYMAN Our Lord Jesus help me!
For one letter here I cannot see.
GOOD DEEDS There is a blind<sup>o</sup> reckoning in time of distress!

EVERYMAN Good Deeds, I pray you help me in this need,
Or else I am forever damned indeed.
510 Therefore help me to make reckoning
Before the Redeemer of all thing
That King is and was and ever shall.
GOOD DEEDS Everyman, I am sorry of<sup>o</sup> your fall
And fain would help you and<sup>o</sup> I were able.
515 EVERYMAN Good Deeds, your counsel I pray you give me.
GOOD DEEDS That shall I do verily,
Though that on my feet I may not go;
I have a sister that shall with you also,
520 Called Knowledge, which shall with you abide
To help you to make that dreadful reckoning.

[Enter KNOWLEDGE.]

KNOWLEDGE Everyman, I will go with thee and be thy guide,
In thy most need to go by thy side.
EVERYMAN In good condition I am now in everything,
And am whole content with this good thing,
525 Thanked be God my Creator.
GOOD DEEDS And when she hath brought you there
Where thou shalt heal thee of thy smart,<sup>o</sup>
Then go you with your reckoning and your Good Deeds together
For to make you joyful at heart
530 Before the blessed Trinity.
EVERYMAN My Good Deeds, gramercy!<sup>o</sup>
I am well content, certainly,
With your words sweet.
KNOWLEDGE Now go we together lovingly
535 To Confession, that cleansing river.
EVERYMAN For joy I weep—I would we were there!

But I pray you give me cognition,<sup>o</sup>
Where dwelleth that holy man Confession?
540 KNOWLEDGE In the House of Salvation:
We shall us comfort, by God's grace.

[KNOWLEDGE leads EVERYMAN to CONFESSION.]

Lo, this is Confession: kneel down and ask mercy,
For he is in good conceit<sup>o</sup> with God Almighty.
EVERYMAN [kneeling] O glorious fountain that all uncleanness doth clarify,<sup>o</sup>
545 Wash from me the spots of vice unclean,
That on me no sin may be seen.<sup>4</sup>
I come with Knowledge for my redemption,
Redempt<sup>o</sup> with heart and full contrition,
For I am commanded a pilgrimage to take
And great accounts before God to make.
550 Now I pray you, Shrift,<sup>o</sup> mother of Salvation,
Help my Good Deeds for my piteous exclamation.
CONFESSION I know your sorrow well, Everyman:
Because with Knowledge ye come to me,
I will you comfort as well as I can,
555 And a precious jewel I will give thee,
Called Penance, voider<sup>o</sup> of adversity.
Therewith shall your body chastised be—
With abstinence and perseverance in God's service.
Here shall you receive that scourge of me,
560 Which is penance strong<sup>o</sup> that ye must endure,
To remember thy Saviour was scourged for thee
With sharp scourges,<sup>5</sup> and suffered it patiently.
So must thou ere thou 'scape that painful pilgrimage.
Knowledge, keep<sup>o</sup> him in this voyage,
565 And by that time Good Deeds will be with thee.
But in any wise be secure<sup>o</sup> of mercy—
For your time draweth fast—and ye will saved be.
Ask God mercy and he will grant, truly.

570 When with the scourge of penance man doth him<sup>o</sup> bind,
 The oil of forgiveness then shall he find.
 EVERYMAN Thanked be God for his gracious work,
 For now I will my penance begin.
 This hath rejoiced and lighted my heart,
 Though the knots be painful and hard within.<sup>6</sup> 575 KNOWLEDGE Everyman, look your penance that ye fulfill,
 What pain that ever it to you be;
 And Knowledge shall give you counsel at will
 How your account ye shall make clearly.
 EVERYMAN O eternal God, O heavenly figure,
 580 O way of righteousness, O goodly vision,
 Which descended down in a virgin pure
 Because he would every man redeem,
 Which Adam forfeited by his disobedience;
 O blessed Godhead, elect and high Divine,<sup>o</sup>
 585 Forgive my grievous offense!
 Here I cry thee mercy in this presence:
 O ghostly<sup>o</sup> Treasure, O Ransomer and Redeemer,
 Of all the world Hope and Conduiter,<sup>o</sup>
 Mirror of joy, Founder<sup>o</sup> of mercy, 590 Which enlumineth<sup>o</sup> heaven and earth thereby,
 Hear my clamorous complaint, though it late be;
 Receive my prayers, of thy benignity.
 Though I be a sinner most abominable,
 Yet let my name be written in Moses' table.<sup>7</sup>
 595 O Mary, pray to the Maker of all thing
 Me for to help at my ending,
 And save me from the power of my enemy,
 For Death assaileth me strongly.
 And Lady, that I may by mean of thy prayer
 600 Of your Son's glory to be partner—
 By the means of his passion<sup>o</sup> I it crave.

I beseech you help my soul to save.
 Knowledge, give me the scourge of penance:
 My flesh therewith shall give acquittance.◊
 605 I will now begin, if God give me grace.
 KNOWLEDGE Everyman, God give you time and space!◊
 Thus I bequeath you in the hands of our Saviour:
 Now may you make your reckoning sure.
 EVERYMAN In the name of the Holy Trinity 610 My body sore punished shall be:
 Take this, body, for the sin of the flesh!
 Also◊ thou delightest to go gay and fresh,
 And in the way of damnation thou did me bring,
 Therefore suffer now strokes of punishing!
 615 Now of penance I will wade the water clear,
 To save me from purgatory, that sharp fire.
 GOOD DEEDS I thank God, now can I walk and go,
 And am delivered of my sickness and woe.
 Therefore with Everyman I will go, and not spare:
 620 His good works I will help him to declare.
 KNOWLEDGE Now, Everyman, be merry and glad:
 Your Good Deeds cometh now, ye may◊ not be sad.
 Now is your Good Deeds whole and sound,
 Going◊ upright upon the ground.
 625 EVERYMAN My heart is light, and shall be evermore.
 Now will I smite faster than I did before.
 GOOD DEEDS Everyman, pilgrim, my special friend,
 Blessed be thou without end!
 For thee is prepartate◊ the eternal glory.
 630 Ye have me made whole and sound
 Therefore I will bide by thee in every stound.◊8 EVERYMAN Welcome, my Good Deeds! Now I hear thy voice,
 I weep for very sweetness of love.
 KNOWLEDGE Be no more sad, but ever rejoice:
 635 God seeth thy living in his throne above.

Put on this garment to thy behove,<sup>o</sup>
 Which is wet with your tears—
 Or else before God you may it miss
 When ye to your journey's end come shall.
 640 EVERYMAN Gentle Knowledge, what do ye it call?
 KNOWLEDGE It is a garment of sorrow;
 From pain it will you borrow:<sup>o</sup>
 Contrition it is
 That getteth forgiveness;
 645 It pleaseth God passing<sup>o</sup> well.
 GOOD DEEDS Everyman, will you wear it for your heal?<sup>o</sup>
 EVERYMAN Now blessed be Jesu, Mary's son,
 For now have I on true contrition.
 And let us go now without tarrying.
 650 Good Deeds, have we clear our reckoning?
 GOOD DEEDS Yea, indeed, I have it here.
 EVERYMAN Then I trust we need not fear.
 Now friends, let us not part in twain.
 KNOWLEDGE Nay, Everyman, that will we not, certain.
 655 GOOD DEEDS Yet must thou lead with thee
 Three persons of great might.
 EVERYMAN Who should they be?
 GOOD DEEDS Discretion and Strength they hight,<sup>o</sup>
 And thy Beauty may not abide behind.
 660 KNOWLEDGE Also ye must call to mind
 Your Five-Wits<sup>o</sup> as for your counselors.
 GOOD DEEDS You must have them ready at all hours.
 EVERYMAN How shall I get them hither?
 KNOWLEDGE You must call them all together,
 665 And they will be here incontinent.<sup>o</sup>
 EVERYMAN My friends, come hither and be present, Discretion, Strength, my Five-Wits, and Beauty!

[They enter.]

BEAUTY Here at your will we be all ready.

What will ye that we should do?
 670 GOOD DEEDS That ye would with Everyman go
 And help him in his pilgrimage.
 Advise you: o will ye with him or not in that voyage?
 STRENGTH We will bring him all thither,
 To his help and comfort, ye may believe me.
 675 DISCRETION So will we go with him all together.
 EVERYMAN Almighty God, loved o might thou be!
 I give thee laud that I have hither brought Strength, Discretion, Beauty, and Five-Wits—lack I nought—
 And my Good Deeds, with Knowledge clear,
 680 All be in my company at my will here:
 I desire no more to my business.
 STRENGTH And I, Strength, will by you stand in distress,
 Though thou would in battle fight on the ground.
 FIVE-WITS And though it were through the world round, 685 We will not depart for sweet ne sour.
 BEAUTY No more will I, until death's hour,
 Whatsoever thereof befall.
 DISCRETION Everyman, advise you first of all:
 Go with a good advisement o and deliberation.
 690 We all give you virtuous o monition o
 That all shall be well.
 EVERYMAN My friends, hearken what I will tell;
 I pray God reward you in his heaven-sphere;
 Now hearken all that be here,
 695 For I will make my testament,
 Here before you all present:
 In alms half my good o I will give with my hands twain,
 In the way of charity with good intent;
 And the other half, still o shall remain,
 700 I 'queath o to be returned there it ought to be.
 This I do in despite of the fiend of hell,

To go quit out of his perel,<sup>9</sup>
 Ever after and this day.
 KNOWLEDGE Everyman, hearken what I say:
 705 Go to Priesthood, I you advise,
 And receive of him, in any wise,<sup>o</sup>
 The holy sacrament and ointment<sup>o</sup> together;
 Then shortly see ye turn again hither:
 We will all abide you here.
 710 FIVE-WITS Yea, Everyman, hie<sup>o</sup> you that ye ready were.
 There is no emperor, king, duke, ne baron,
 That of God hath commission
 As hath the least priest in the world being:
 For of the blessed sacraments pure and bening<sup>o</sup>
 715 He beareth the keys, and thereof hath the cure<sup>o</sup>
 For man's redemption—it is ever sure—
 Which God for our souls' medicine
 Gave us out of his heart with great pine,<sup>o</sup>
 Here in this transitory life for thee and me.
 720 The blessed sacraments seven there be:
 Baptism, confirmation, with priesthood<sup>o</sup> good,
 And the sacrament of God's precious flesh and blood,
 Marriage, the holy extreme unction, and penance:
 These seven be good to have in remembrance,
 725 Gracious sacraments of high divinity.
 EVERYMAN Fain<sup>o</sup> would I receive that holy body,
 And meekly to my ghostly<sup>o</sup> father I will go.
 FIVE-WITS Everyman, that is the best that ye can do:
 God will you to salvation bring.
 730 For priesthood exceedeth all other thing:
 To us Holy Scripture they do teach,
 And converteth man from sin, heaven to reach;
 God hath to them more power given
 Than to any angel that is in heaven.
 735 With five words<sup>1</sup> he may consecrate

God's body in flesh and blood to make,
And handleth his Maker between his hands.
The priest bindeth and unbindeth all bands,<sup>2</sup>
Both in earth and in heaven.
740 Thou ministers<sup>o</sup> all the sacraments seven;
Though we kiss thy feet, thou were worthy;
Thou art surgeon that cureth sin deadly;
No remedy we find under God
But all only priesthood.<sup>3</sup>
745 Everyman, God gave priests that dignity
And setteth them in his stead among us to be.
Thus be they above angels in degree.

[Exit EVERYMAN.]

KNOWLEDGE If priests be good, it is so, surely.
But when Jesu hanged on the cross with great 750 smart,<sup>o</sup>
There he gave out of his blessed heart
The same sacrament in great torment,
He sold them not to us, that Lord omnipotent:
Therefore Saint Peter the Apostle doth say
That Jesu's curse hath all they 755 Which God their Saviour do buy or sell,<sup>4</sup>
Or they for any money do take or tell.<sup>5</sup>
Sinful priests giveth the sinners example bad:
Their children sitteth by other men's fires, I have heard;
And some haunteth<sup>o</sup> women's company
760 With unclean life, as lusts of lechery.
These be with sin made blind.
FIVE-WITS I trust to God no such may we find.
Therefore let us priesthood honor,
And follow their doctrine for our souls' succor.
765 We be their sheep and they shepherds be

By whom we all be kept in surety.
Peace, for yonder I see Everyman come,
Which hath made true satisfaction.
GOOD DEEDS    Methink it is he indeed.

[Re-enter EVERYMAN.]

EVERYMAN    Now Jesu be your alder speed!<sup>6</sup>
I have received the sacrament for my redemption,
And then mine extreme unction.
Blessed be all they that counseled me to take it!
And now, friends, let us go without longer respite.
775 I thank God that ye have tarried so long.
Now set each of you on this rood<sup>o</sup> your hond
And shortly follow me:
I go before there<sup>o</sup> I would be. God be our guide!

775

STRENGTH    Everyman, we will not from you go
775 Till ye have done this voyage long.

DISCRETION    I, Discretion, will bide by you also.

KNOWLEDGE    And though this pilgrimage be never so strong,<sup>o</sup>

I will never part you fro.

STRENGTH    Everyman, I will be as sure by thee
785 As ever I did by Judas Maccabee.<sup>7</sup>

EVERYMAN    Alas, I am so faint I may not stand—
My limbs under me doth fold!

Friends, let us not turn again to this land,
Not for all the world's gold.

For into this cave must I creep
And turn to earth, and there to sleep.

BEAUTY    What, into this grave, alas?

EVERYMAN    Yea, there shall ye consume,<sup>o</sup> more and lass.<sup>8</sup>

BEAUTY    And what, should I smother here?

795

EVERYMAN    Yea, by my faith, and nevermore appear.
In this world live no more we shall,

But in heaven before the highest Lord of all.

BEAUTY I cross out all this! Adieu, by Saint John—

800 I take my tape in my lap and am gone.<sup>9</sup>

EVERYMAN What, Beauty, whither will ye?

BEAUTY Peace, I am deaf—I look not behind me,
Not and thou wouldest give me all the gold in thy chest.

[Exit BEAUTY.]

EVERYMAN Alas, whereto may I trust?

805 Beauty goeth fast away fro me—
She promised with me to live and die!

STRENGTH Everyman, I will thee also forsake and deny.
Thy game liketh<sup>o</sup> me not at all.

EVERYMAN Why then, ye will forsake me all?
Sweet Strength, tarry a little space.

810 STRENGTH Nay, sir, by the rood of grace,
I will hie me from thee fast,
Though thou weep till thy heart tobrast.<sup>o</sup>

EVERYMAN Ye would ever bide by me, ye said.

815 STRENGTH Yea, I have you far enough conveyed!<sup>o</sup>
Ye be old enough, I understand,
Your pilgrimage to take on hand:
I repent me that I hither came.

EVERYMAN Strength, you to displease I am to blame,<sup>1</sup>
Yet promise is debt, this ye well wot.<sup>o</sup>

820 STRENGTH In faith, I care not:
Thou art but a fool to complain;
You spend your speech and waste your brain.
Go, thrust thee into the ground.

[Exit STRENGTH.]

825 EVERYMAN I had weened<sup>o</sup> surer I should you have found.

He that trusteth in his Strength
She him deceiveth at the length.
Both Strength and Beauty forsaketh me—
Yet they promised me fair and lovingly.

830 DISCRETION Everyman, I will after Strength be gone:
As for me, I will leave you alone.

EVERYMAN Why Discretion, will ye forsake me?

DISCRETION Yea, in faith, I will go from thee.

For when Strength goeth before,
I follow after evermore.

835 EVERYMAN Yet I pray thee, for the love of the Trinity,
Look in my grave once piteously.

DISCRETION Nay, so nigh will I not come.
Farewell everyone!

[Exit DISCRETION.]

840 EVERYMAN O all thing faileth save God alone—
Beauty, Strength, and Discretion.
For when Death bloweth his blast
They all run fro me full fast.

FIVE-WITS Everyman, my leave now of thee I take.
I will follow the other, for here I thee forsake.

845 EVERYMAN Alas, then may I wail and weep,
For I took you for my best friend.

FIVE-WITS I will no longer thee keep.°
Now farewell, and there an end!

[Exit FIVE-WITS.]

850 EVERYMAN O Jesu, help, all hath forsaken me!

GOOD DEEDS Nay, Everyman, I will bide with thee:
I will not forsake thee indeed;

Thou shalt find me a good friend at need.

EVERYMAN Gramercy, Good Deeds! Now may I true friends see.

855 They have forsaken me every one—
I loved them better than my Good Deeds alone.
Knowledge, will ye forsake me also?
KNOWLEDGE Yea, Everyman, when ye to Death shall go,
But not yet, for no manner of danger.
EVERYMAN Gramercy, Knowledge, with all my heart!
860 KNOWLEDGE Nay, yet will I not from hence depart
Till I see where ye shall be come.<sup>2</sup>
EVERYMAN Methink, alas, that I must be gone
To make my reckoning and my debts pay,
For I see my time is nigh spent away.
865 Take example, all ye that this do hear or see,
How they that I best loved do forsake me,
Except my Good Deeds that bideth truly.
GOOD DEEDS All earthly things is but vanity.
Beauty, Strength, and Discretion do man forsake,
870 Foolish friends and kinsmen that fair spake—
All fleeth save Good Deeds, and that am I.
EVERYMAN Have mercy on me, God most mighty,
And stand by me, thou mother and maid, holy Mary!
GOOD DEEDS Fear not: I will speak for thee.
875 EVERYMAN Here I cry God mercy!
GOOD DEEDS Short our end, and 'minish our pain.<sup>3</sup>
Let us go, and never come again.
EVERYMAN Into thy hands, Lord, my soul I commend:
Receive it, Lord, that it be not lost.
880 As thou me boughtest,<sup>o</sup> so me defend,
And save me from the fiend's boast,
That I may appear with that blessed host
That shall be saved at the day of doom.
In manus tuas, of mights most,
885 Forever commendo spiritum meum.<sup>4</sup>

[EVERYMAN and GOOD DEEDS descend into the grave.]

KNOWLEDGE Now hath he suffered that we all shall endure,

The Good Deeds shall make all sure.

Now hath he made ending,

890 Methinketh that I hear angels sing

And make great joy and melody

Where Everyman's soul received shall be.

ANGEL [within] Come, excellent elect<sup>o</sup> spouse to Jesu!<sup>5</sup>

Here above thou shalt go

Because of thy singular virtue.

895 Now the soul is taken the body fro,

Thy reckoning is crystal clear:

Now shalt thou into the heavenly sphere—

Unto the which all ye shall come

900 That liveth well before the day of doom.

[Enter DOCTOR.]<sup>6</sup>

DOCTOR This memorial<sup>o</sup> men may have in mind:

Ye hearers, take it of worth,<sup>o</sup> old and young,

And forsake Pride, for he deceiveth you in the end.

And remember Beauty, Five-Wits, Strength, and Discretion,

905 They all at the last do Everyman forsake,

Save his Good Deeds there doth he take—

But beware, for and<sup>o</sup> they be small,

Before God he hath no help at all—

None excuse may be there for Everyman.

910 Alas, how shall he do than?<sup>o</sup>

For after death amends may no man make,

For then mercy and pity doth him forsake.

If his reckoning be not clear when he doth come,

God will say, "Ite, maledicti, in ignem eternum!"<sup>7</sup>

915 And he that hath his account whole and sound,

High in heaven he shall be crowned,

Unto which place God bring us all thither,

That we may live body and soul together.
 Thereto help, the Trinity!
 Amen, say ye, for saint<sup>o</sup> charity.

WHAT THE ANIMALS SAY

Literature written in Britain between the twelfth and the sixteenth centuries is crowded with animals. Of course writers of encyclopedias and moralists also focused on animals as sources of knowledge about the natural world and ethical instruction for humans, respectively. Literary animals, by contrast, tell us something very different—much funnier, more skeptical, and more daring.

Works of medieval literature tell us little of serious interest about the reality of the natural world, and for the most part they do not pretend to. Though often zoologically implausible, many works of literature about animals superficially seem to use animals in the same way moralists use them: as prompts to ideal ethical behavior for humans. In fact, however, animal literature points to an ethics that tends to be much more daring than that of the moralists, as it deals much more candidly with the powerful challenges humans face as they attempt to live ethically. The animal literature openly confesses, for example, that humans experience sexual desire, that many of us eat other animals, and that we are likely to ignore ethical advice when we are hungry. The literature frankly recognizes, that is, that we too are animals.

In addition to making adventurous forays into ethics, animal literature also prompts us to think about politics. The need for collective action is all the more urgent and all the more difficult to achieve when considered through the lens of the animal “kingdom.” Much late medieval animal literature is less about animals than about us; it uses animals to think with, and the thoughts it thinks are daring and often refreshing, if sometimes uncomfortable.

Above all, animals in late medieval animal literature talk. When they talk, they obviously blur the boundary between animals and humans, emphasizing that talking animals point to linguistically gifted human counterparts. Thus animal literature tends, paradoxically perhaps, to focus with especial sophistication on linguistic issues: The Owl and the Nightingale (1189–1216) is as much, if not more, interested in how to debate as it is in the content of debate; in Robert Henryson's "The Cock and the Jasper" (ca. 1470s) the cock deploys a beautifully crafted rhetoric to disown rhetorical skill; the Swallow in Henryson's "Preaching of the Swallow" (ca. 1470s) subtly deploys university learning to reveal its inability to persuade; Chaucer's Nun's Priest's Tale (1390s; see pp. 556–70) challenges the reader to interpret the fable persuasively.

Yet precisely as these animals speak in specifically human ways, authors will take care to remind readers that the speakers are animals, that humans are animals too, and that, therefore, humans may have no stronger claims to elevated philosophical, ethical, and political discourse than do animals. The same vulnerability attends the rhetorically elevated ways in which narrators describe animal action: if it is ridiculous to describe animals as exemplary of higher human aspirations, then maybe the description is no less ridiculous when applied to humans.

The main genre of medieval literary animal story is that of the animal fable. Animal fables, which trace their origin to Aesop (ca. sixth century B.C.E.), are small narratives in which animals act and speak, usually concluding with a sentence-long moral tacked on. They involve many animals, such as frogs, mice, lambs, foxes, birds, wolves, and lions. In later contexts, such stories were used to teach schoolboys both Latin and some commonsense morality (for example, don't overeat; don't overreach; save up for the hard times; justice can be rough and ready, so keep clear of the predators). In the hands of great literary artists such as Chaucer and Henryson, however, these narratives express mordant comedy and truths whose force extends well beyond the elementary classroom.

Beast epic is a much later offshoot from the ancient animal fable tradition. It appears in Europe for the first time in the tenth century in Latin, and in the twelfth century in vernacular languages. Beast epics are groups of interconnected narratives, set in the court of the lion; their single (anti-)hero is Reynard the Fox. They present narratives of dark but vital humor that repeat the same story with many variations: the rhetorically brilliant fox Reynard almost always outwits all comers by manipulating their greed or vanity. No matter how tight the corner into which Reynard has been backed, we know he'll escape through brilliant narrative control and intimate, intuitive knowledge of his enemies' weaknesses. He exposes not just the arrogance of the greedy but also, and even more damagingly, the hypocrisy of the "civilized" order. Chaucer's Nun's Priest's Tale is excerpted from larger narratives of this kind, even if the fox in that tale is foiled in his scheme.

Late medieval writers reach for animals in many other genres, too. The Owl and the Nightingale belongs to a long medieval tradition of debate poetry, while Chaucer's Parliament of Birds (1370s) draws on a great late medieval tradition of Neoplatonic philosophical poetry. This tradition attempted to express the ecological balance of the cosmos, placing the microcosm of humans within the macrocosm of the natural world and planets. Though humans were definitely at the center of that vision, they were in no way conceived as transcendent above the natural world: in order to understand ourselves, these texts tell us, humans need to understand how we are a compact amalgam of the forces and matter that govern the universe. Humans, like the rest of nature, participate in the tense balance of the natural energies that constitute natural systems. We can understand nature because we are made of the same stuff, but for that reason we are dangerously prone to place appetite above understanding. Animals naturally figure powerfully in philosophical Latin fictions such as Bernard Silvestris's Cosmographia (1140s) and Alan of Lille's Complaint of Nature (1160s). Vernacular poems such as Chaucer's Parliament of Birds rework and question this Latin tradition.

In all the traditions so far considered, humans are humans and animals are animals, even if they are talking animals. Medieval literature also has examples of interspecies crossing, of humans provisionally and painfully locked into animal form. Derived ultimately from the tradition of Ovid's Metamorphoses (before 8 C.E.), these stories are said to be taken from folk culture and the cultural margins, thereby permitting weird, unscientific, but wonderfully penetrating accounts of human/animal overlaps. Because they merge animal and human, they permit and provoke reflection across the species divide: what might it be like to be an animal? Marie de France's lay Bisclavret (late twelfth century) is an especially rich example of this genre.

All these traditions involve narrative and literary surprises, not to say shocks. Animals fail to observe the rules of social or literary decorum that govern human actors. These surprises can be amusing or dark, but they are always revealing about the full scope of what it is to be human.

MARIE DE FRANCE

For the full headnote on Marie de France (fl. ca. 1180), see page 159. The Germanic term werewolf (in this tale “garwaf”; line 4) is a compound word with two equally balanced, juxtaposed elements: “gar”—derived from “wer,” meaning “man”—and “wolf.” Marie de France’s Bisclavret tests the degree to which these species categories are indeed balanced, by telling a story derived from the ancient belief in lycanthropy (the transformation of a human into a wolf). Romances (see pp. 141–42) always involve a movement from civilization to a wild place, and from the wild back to a reformed, strengthened civilization. The wisdom embedded in that narrative structure is that civilization is not a unitary concept; on the contrary, for the civilized order to maintain its balance, it must have commerce with all that threatens it. In testing that claim, romances occasionally involve a species shift from human to animal.

Bisclavret not only involves that shift but does so at an extreme limit: the human morphs into one of the most brutal and savage of animals, the wolf. Bisclavret therefore puts the binary civilizational claim of romance narrative to the test. Can the human survive transformation into wolf? Or, even further, must the human have commerce with its wolf counterpart to maintain its balance? Binary romance narratives, always moving between tame and wild, express and disguise a shameful secret: civilization needs the wild. While the story structure might pretend otherwise, as it returns the protagonist to, and reconfirms the values of, civilization at its end, it has secretly confessed civilization’s dependence on the wild. In this story, the husband clearly needs to be a wolf, for three whole days a week. His marriage is stable as long as this need is not articulated by the couple. Once articulated, the structure of the marriage collapses, since the wife wants nothing to do with the man-wolf and repudiates him.

One might expect a savage, civilization-destroying narrative from here on. And indeed, that expectation is in part confirmed: the wolf is condemned to his wild state, twice he attacks humans, and he is twice on the point of being torn apart as a wild animal. But savagery is not the whole story: the wolf “speaks,” his attacks are targeted, and he otherwise observes court propriety with extreme delicacy. Even when he can retrieve his human form by donning his clothes, he refuses to do so in public. Through his wildness he prompts the mechanisms of human justice. Sometimes the bad manners of a wolf attack in the court itself are necessary to prompt justice. That is one way of reading Bisclavret, from the wolf-man’s perspective. From that angle, however, structures of heterosexual marriage turn out to be disposable. The wife is attacked and tortured: she ends up banished, without a nose, and becomes the ancestor of noseless offspring. The husband ends up kissing and hugging the king in the king’s bed. “Civilization,” “justice,” and “human,” then, turn out to have somewhat more restricted referents in this story by a woman author.

Since I am undertaking to compose lais,
I don't want to forget Bisclavret;
In Bréton, the lai's name is Bisclavret— the Normans call it Garwaf<sup>2</sup> 5 In the old days, people used to say—and it often actually happened—that some men turned into werewolves and lived in the woods.
A werewolf is a savage beast;
while his fury is on him
10 he eats men, does much harm, goes deep in the forest to live.
But that's enough of this for now:
I want to tell you about the Bisclavret.

15 In Brittany there lived a nobleman whom I've heard marvelously praised;
a fine, handsome knight who behaved nobly.
He was close to his lord,
and loved by all his neighbors.
20 He had an estimable wife,
one of lovely appearance;
he loved her and she him,
but one thing was very vexing to her:
during the week he would be missing
25 for three whole days, and she didn't know what happened to him or where he went.
Nor did any of his men know anything about it.
One day he returned home
happy and delighted;

she asked him about it.
30 "My lord," she said, "and dear love,
I'd very much like to ask you one thing—
if I dared;
but I'm so afraid of your anger
35 that nothing frightens me more."
When he heard that, he embraced her, drew her to him and kissed her.
"My lady," he said, "go ahead and ask!
There's nothing you could want to know,
40 that, if I knew the answer, I wouldn't tell you."
"By God," she replied, "now I'm cured!
My lord, on the days when you go away from me
I'm in such a state—
so sad at heart,
45 so afraid I'll lose you—that if I don't get quick relief
I could die of this very soon.
Please, tell me where you go,
where you have been staying.
50 I think you must have a lover, and if that's so, you're doing wrong."
"My dear," he said, "have mercy on me, for God's sake!
Harm will come to me if I tell you about this, because I'd lose your love
55 and even my very self."
When the lady heard this she didn't take it lightly;
she kept asking him,
coaxed and flattered him so much,
60 that he finally told her what happened to him—he hid nothing from her.
"My dear, I become a werewolf:
I go off into the great forest,
in the thickest part of the woods,

65 and I live on the prey I hunt down."
When he had told her everything, she asked further whether he undressed or kept his clothes on.<sup>3</sup>
"Wife," he replied, "I go stark naked."
70 "Tell me, then, for God's sake, where your clothes are."
"That I won't tell you;
for if I were to lose them,
and then be discovered,
I'd stay a werewolf forever.
75 I'd be helpless
until I got them back.
That's why I don't want their hiding place to be known."
"My lord," the lady answered,
"I love you more than all the world;
80 you mustn't hide anything from me or fear me in any way:
that doesn't seem like love to me.
What wrong have I done? For what sin of mine do you mistrust me about anything?
85 Do the right thing and tell me!"
She harassed and bedeviled him so, that he had no choice but to tell her.
"Lady," he said, "near the woods, beside the road that I use to get there, 90 there's an old chapel that has often done me good service;
under a bush there is a big stone,
hollowed out inside;
I hide my clothes right there
90 until I'm ready to come home."
The lady heard this wonder and turned scarlet from fear;

she was terrified of the whole adventure.
Over and over she considered
100 how she might get rid of him;
she never wanted to sleep with him again.
There was a knight of that region who had loved her for a long time, who begged for her love,
105 and dedicated himself to serving her.
She'd never loved him at all,
nor pledged her love to him,
but now she sent a messenger for him,
and told him her intention.
110 "My dear," she said, "cheer up!
I shall now grant you without delay what you have suffered for;
you'll meet with no more refusals—
I offer you my love and my body;
115 make me your mistress!"
He thanked her graciously and accepted her promise, and she bound him to her by an oath.
Then she told him
120 how her husband went away and what happened to him;
she also taught him the precise path her husband took into the forest, and then she sent the knight to get her husband's clothes.
So Bisclavret was betrayed,
125 ruined by his own wife.
Since people knew he was often away from home they all thought
this time he'd gone away forever.
They searched for him and made inquiries
130 but could never find him, so they had to let matters stand.

The wife later married the other knight, who had loved her for so long.

135     A whole year passed until one day the king went hunting; he headed right for the forest
where Bisclavret was.
When the hounds were unleashed,
140     they ran across Bisclavret;
the hunters and the dogs chased him all day, until they were just about to take him
and tear him apart,
145     at which point he saw the king and ran to him, pleading for mercy.
He took hold of the king's stirrup, kissed his leg and his foot.
The king saw this and was terrified;
he called his companions.
150     "My lords," he said, "come quickly!
Look at this marvel—
this beast is humbling itself to me.
It has the mind of a man, and it's begging me for mercy!
155     Chase the dogs away,
and make sure no one strikes it.
This beast is rational—he has a mind.
Hurry up: let's get out of here.
I'll extend my peace to the creature;
indeed, I'll hunt no more today!"
160     Thereupon the king turned away.
Bisclavret followed him;
he stayed close to the king, and wouldn't go away;
he'd no intention of leaving him.
165     The king led him to his castle;
he was delighted with this turn of events,
for he'd never seen anything like it.

He considered the beast a great wonder and held him very dear.
He commanded all his followers,
170 for the sake of their love for him, to guard Bisclavret
well,
and under no circumstances to do him harm;
none of them should strike him;
rather, he should be well fed and watered.
They willingly guarded the creature;
175 every day he went to sleep among the knights, near the king.
Everyone was fond of him;
he was so noble and well behaved that he never wished to do anything wrong.
180 Regardless of where the king might go,
Bisclavret never wanted to be separated from him;
he always accompanied the king.
The king became very much aware that the creature loved him.
Now listen to what happened next.
185 The king held a court;
to help him celebrate his feast and to serve him as handsomely as possible, he summoned all the barons who held fiefs from him.
190 Among the knights who went,
and all dressed up in his best attire,
was the one who had married Bisclavret's wife.
He neither knew nor suspected that he would find Bisclavret so close by.
195 As soon as he came to the palace
Bisclavret saw him,
ran toward him at full speed, sank his teeth into him, and started to drag him down.
He would have done him great damage

200 if the king hadn't called him off, and threatened him with a stick.
Twice that day he tried to bite the knight.
Everyone was extremely surprised,
205 since the beast had never acted that way toward any other man he had seen.
All over the palace people said that he wouldn't act that way without a reason:
that somehow or other, the knight had mistreated Bisclavret,
and now he wanted his revenge.
210 And so the matter rested until the feast was over and until the barons took their leave of the king and started home.
The very first to leave,
215 to the best of my knowledge,
was the knight whom Bisclavret had attacked.
It's no wonder the creature hated him.
Not long afterward,
as the story leads me to believe,
220 the king, who was so wise and noble, went back to the forest
where he had found Bisclavret, and the creature went with him.
That night, when he finished hunting,
225 he sought lodging out in the countryside.
The wife of Bisclavret heard about it, dressed herself elegantly,
and went the next day to speak with the king, bringing rich presents for him.
230 When Bisclavret saw her coming, no one could hold him back;
he ran toward her in a rage.
Now listen to how well he avenged himself!
He tore the nose off her face.

235 What worse thing could he have done to her?
Now men closed in on him from all sides;
they were about to tear him apart,
when a wise man said to the king,
"My lord, listen to me!
240 This beast has stayed with you, and there's not one of us who hasn't watched him closely, hasn't traveled with him often.
He's never touched anyone,
245 or shown any wickedness, except to this woman.
By the faith that I owe you,
he has some grudge against her,
and against her husband as well.
250 This is the wife of the knight whom you used to like so much, and who's been missing for so long—
we don't know what became of him.
Why not put this woman to torture 255 and see if she'll tell you why the beast hates her?
Make her tell what she knows!
We've seen many strange things happen in Brittany!"
260 The king took his advice;
he detained the knight.
At the same time he took the wife and subjected her to torture;
out of fear and pain 265 she told all about her husband:
how she had betrayed him
and taken away his clothes;
the story he had told her about what happened to him and where he went;
270 and how after she had taken his clothes

he'd never been seen in his land again.
She was quite certain that this beast was Bisclavret.
The king demanded the clothes;
275 whether she wanted to or not she sent home for them,
and had them brought to Bisclavret.
When they were put down in front of him
he didn't even seem to notice them;
280 the king's wise man—
the one who had advised him earlier—said to him, "My lord, you're not doing it right.
This beast wouldn't, under any circumstances,
in order to get rid of his animal form, 285 put on his clothes in front of you;
you don't understand what this means:
he's just too ashamed to do it here.
Have him led to your chambers and bring the clothes with him;
290 then we'll leave him alone for a while.
If he turns into a man, we'll know about it."
The king himself led the way and closed all the doors on him.
After a while he went back,
295 taking two barons with him;
all three entered the king's chamber.
On the king's royal bed
they found the knight asleep.
The king ran to embrace him.
300 He hugged and kissed him again and again.
As soon as he had the chance,
the king gave him back all his lands;
he gave him more than I can tell.
He banished the wife,
305 chased her out of the country.
She went into exile with the knight with whom she had betrayed her lord.

She had several children
310 who were widely known for their appearance:
several women of the family were actually born without noses, and lived out their lives noseless.

315 The adventure that you have heard really happened, no doubt about it.
The lai of Bisclavret was made so it would be remembered forever.

THE OWL AND THE NIGHTINGALE

The Owl and the Nightingale is a brilliant yet largely ignored debate poem, probably from the late twelfth or early thirteenth century. The date of the poem turns on the identity of "King Henry," referred to in line 1092 as dead. This is most probably King Henry II (d. 1189), rather than Henry III (1216–1272). The poem is therefore most probably written 1189–1216.

The poem's brilliance consists in pitting against each other two female voices, that of a sophisticated, courtly nightingale and that of a somber, wise owl. These two birds face off directly on a number of fronts, most though not all of which pertain especially to female predicaments in the twelfth century, human or avian (for example, household management; musical skill and effect, both aesthetic and ethical; conduct of amorous affairs; marriage; and spiritual probity).

No victor emerges from the debate, but the whole is both unfailingly lively and highly attentive to the emotional and argumentative strategies of debate itself: the strongest argument will not win unless the debater maintains rhetorical control. The work is also acutely conscious that verbal debate is better for resolving differences than physical violence, into which the birds' debate frequently threatens to tip. Wholly free of authorial moralizing, The Owl and the Nightingale addresses its readership without condescension of any kind. The very fact that the poem is written in the vernacular, as well as its subject matter, implies an audience of women. And the poem is often very funny.

The poem consists of 1794 lines, written in four-stress couplets (the verse form adapted from French octosyllabic couplets). The verse is exceptionally energetic, as it captures the live force of vital, speaking, opposed voices.

The debate is presented to us as overheard by the poem's narrator in a field on a summer's day. The fictional situation is similar to that of The Canterbury Tales: a largely passive and wholly nonjudgmental narrator reports oral poetry performed live by nonprofessional yet competitive and gifted individuals. We are not explicitly told the identity of the narrator, and likely author, but the birds themselves give us a strong hint: they twice agree to submit their debate before a trusted arbitrator, one “Master Nicholas of Guilford,” from Portesham in Dorset. That person has not been identified as a historical figure, but we might assume that he is university educated (as his title “master” suggests) and the poem’s author.

Modern readers have ignored the poem for two main reasons. First, written in the late twelfth or early thirteenth century, it is an outlier and has virtually no surviving literary context, no comparable texts in English that would highlight its excellence within its period and thereby garner it literary attention. Second, its language (a southern English dialect of so-called early Middle English) is difficult; competence in Old English is required to read this poem in the original with any fluency. The translation here is by Simon Armitage, who also produced the translation of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight used in this anthology.

The three selections here are lines 1–100, 1043–120, and 1511–634. They focus respectively on (1) the setting of the scene for the lively, confrontational debate between the Owl and the Nightingale; (2) the Owl’s attack on, and the Nightingale’s defense of, the Nightingale’s encouragement of an illicit love, making a clear reference to the features of the story told in Marie de France’s Laüstic (see above, pp. 184–86); and (3) the Owl’s extraordinarily daring defense of the sexual infidelity of battered wives, and her sympathy for lonely wives.

From The Owl and the Nightingale*

One summer's day I overheard a mighty war of words disturb a peaceful & secluded dale;
between an Owl & Nightingale
5      barbed comments flew, now soft, now loud, but always heartfelt, wounding, proud.
The birds, both swollen up with anger, hurled abuse at one another, taking turns to slate & curse
10      what in the other bird was worst, with insults being especially strong when rubbishing the other's song.<sup>1</sup>
The Nightingale took up proceedings from the corner of a clearing, 15      perching on a handsome bough with blossoms hanging down & round, beside a densely knotted hedge entwined with reeds & bright green sedge.
She gloried in that branch; it formed 20      a kind of stage, & she performed the music of her repertoire as if she played a pipe or harp, as if each bright, melodious note were not the product of a throat.
25      There was, nearby, a tree-stump where the Owl intoned her hourly prayers, an ancient ivy-covered bole
the Owl had claimed as her abode.
The Nightingale clapped eyes on her 30      & shot the Owl a filthy glare, disgusted by that horrid creature's loathsome, nauseating features.

"Freak, why don't you disappear?
It sickens me to see you here.
Your ugly presence guarantees
35 to throw my fluting out of key.
In fact whenever you turn up my jaw locks & my heart won't pump.
As for your tuneless yodelling
it makes me want to spit, not sing."
40 The Owl was silent until dusk, by which time she was on the cusp of rage, her lungs about to burst through holding back her angry words, her heart about to pop. She yowled,
45 "How does my music strike you now?
You tell yourself that I can't sing but I'm not one for twittering.
You ridicule me & you mock,
snipe from the cover of the copse,
50 but if you flew that branch of yours
I'd make you welcome in my claws
(bring on that day before too long!)
& then you'd sing a different song!"
At which the Nightingale remarked, 55 "As long as I'm alert & sharp in open ground or on the wing your menace has a hollow ring.
As long as I keep to the hedge your words are simply worthless threats.
60 I've seen the ruthless way you rip those birds who can't escape your grip, & how you like to sink your pincers into little larks & finches.
That's why feathered creatures hate you,
65 drive you from their patch, berate you with their screams & cries, & why they rise & mob you when you fly, & why the tiniest of tits would gladly tear you bit from bit.

70 You really are a gruesome sight in ways too many to describe:
your neck's too thin, your trunk's too small,
your head is bigger than . . . your all!
Your coal-black eyes are weirdly broad
75 & look like they've been daubed with woad, & glare as if you'd like to feast on anyone within your reach.
Your bill is sharp & bent & hard—a flesh-hook with a buckled barb—80 that issues—loud & all day long—some caterwaul you call a song.
You threaten me, & say your feet will catch & mulch me into meat;
a frog, though, underneath the mill-wheel,
85 surely makes a truer Owl meal?
Snail & mouse & squelchy slug are more your right & proper grub.
You roost by day & fly by night which proves that something isn't right.
90 You are repellent & impure, you & those filthy chicks of yours, that brood of dirty-looking pests you're raising in a filthy nest.
They soil the den they're living in 95 until their droppings reach their chins then stand about as if they're blind, which brings this truism to mind:
'Accursed be the wretched beast that makes its toilet where it feeds.' "

* * *

The angry Owl was so provoked her eyes grew wider as she spoke.
1045 "You claim to guard the bower where the leaves grow & the flowers flare & couples sleep, that sheltered place where lovers lie down & embrace.
But once you sang—I know for sure—1050 outside a marriage suite, to lure a lady into wicked ways.
To lead her body to disgrace you sang tunes of a shameful sort & filled her dreams with carnal thoughts.
His lordship soon became aware;
1055 with lime & every type of snare
he laid his traps to make a catch, &, landing at the window's hatch
you came to justice, being pinned
& fastened firmly by your shins.<sup>2</sup> 1060 The punishment your crime would bring:
wild horses tore you limb from limb.
So do your worst with maids & wives by bringing ruin to their lives;
your tongue will prove the very trap
1065 that leaves you floored & in a flap."

The Nightingale, piqued at these words, would readily have fought with swords & spears if she had been a man, but since she had no choice her plan 1070 involved her sharp & clever tongue.
"Who speaks well . . . fights well," goes the song;
she'd wage war with her voice instead.
"To fight well, sing well," Alfred<sup>3</sup> said.
"Your talk won't cover me in shame—1075 his lordship was the one to blame for being jealous of his wife.

His envy could have cost his life because his heart began to fail when she conversed with other males.
1080 He locked her in an inner chamber;
strong & steadfast bounds contained her;
sorry for her anguish there
I felt her pain & pitied her & kept her cheerful all day long 1085 by filling every hour with song, a tactic which enraged the knight who loathed my bones with all his might.
He tried to make his problem mine
but was found guilty of the crime:
1090 on hearing of that man's misdeed
King Henry,<sup>4</sup> rest in peace, decreed the sentence must be banishment, a right & proper punishment for acts so base & underhand 1095 committed in a good king's land, whereby a tiny Nightingale had been dismembered top to tail.
To bring back honor to my race
he wiped the smile from that man's face 1100 & made him pay one hundred pounds to me. My chicks, now safe & sound, enjoy their new prosperity
by right, & their security.
And I, avenged of the offence,
1105 speak with a strengthened confidence.
Because of that one incident my cheerfulness is permanent
& as I please I raise my voice
& no one dares dispute my choice.
1110 But you, you wretch, you ghoulisg ghost, you can't identify a post or hollow stump to crouch inside avoiding those who'd nip your hide.

For youngsters, serfs, & those who farm,
1115 & peasant folk, all mean you harm,
& if they spy you on your perch
they hope to injure you, or worse, & fill their pockets up with stones then aim to break your horrid bones."

1120

The Owl was glad to hear this tale, because although the Nightingale had started speaking well enough her argument had tapered off.
She said, "From what you have described 1515 it's clear your sympathies reside with girls; they're faultless in your eyes, therefore you praise them to the skies.
But married women, filled with grief,
all turn to me to seek relief.
1520 It happens time & time again that married life comes under strain, because of which the husband strays & finds some other love to chase, immorally pursuing her 1525 & tipping out his purse on her, abandoning his lawful spouse who occupies their lonely house in threadbare clothes, among bare walls, with very little food at all.
1530 And out of terror she has learned to bite her lip once he's returned, though like a lunatic he shouts
& bawls & throws his weight about.
All that she does displeases him, 1535

all that she utters teases him,
& when she tries to keep the peace
he's apt to punch her in the teeth.
The man who misbehaves that way can't fail to send his wife astray.
1540 Because of his abuse at home she'll seek out pleasures of her own;
she'll cuckold him, of course she will,
but don't say she's responsible.
And yes, it's usually the case
1545 she's well brought-up & fair of face, so when the husband spends his purse outside the home the crime seems worse—the mistress of his love affair is barely worth one strand of hair 1550 belonging to his spouse. In life such husbands fail to trust their wives:
no other men must talk to them,
& if they look at other men or speak with other men politely 1555 husbands think deceit is likely.
Stifled, then, by lock & key,
the wives turn to adultery, because they're driven to explore what was anathema before.
1560 A curse on those who whine & whinge when wives deliver their revenge.
This is the thing that wives complain to me about; I feel their pain & sense such overwhelming hurt
1565 I sometimes think my heart will burst.
My eyes are sore with bitter tears;
I pray that Christ our Lord will hear their prayers so wives might share their beds with decent, honest men instead.
1570 And now I'll tell you one thing more that you will have no answer for,

I'll put your logic in a spin
& no reply will save your skin.
1575 So, many merchants, many knights, will love their wives & treat them right,
& many peasants will do too;
accordingly each wife stays true,
& does her best to serve her lord
1580 both in the bedroom & at board & eagerly she'll aim to please with caring words & thoughtful deeds.
The husband travels far & wide in his endeavors to provide 1585 for them, & when he ups & leaves the steadfast wife at home will grieve; she'll sit & sigh when he departs because a longing fills her heart
& anxious for her husband's sake,
1590 she'll fret by day then lie awake;
each moment lasts a long, long while,
& every step feels like a mile.
Outside, alone, at night, I keep a vigil while the world's asleep; alert to how bereft she is 1595 I sing songs for her benefit, laments for her unhappiness expressing just how sad she is,
& for this show of sympathy she warms to me & welcomes me.
1600 I strive to help such wives because they seek to plot a noble course.
You've riled my heart to such a stage
it's almost paralyzed with rage
& I can barely speak a word,
1605 but I'll continue, undeterred.
You say that I'm despised by men, inspire hostility in them;

they threaten me with stones & sticks
then beat & smash my bones to bits 1610 & when all life in me is lost they hang me from a hedge or post to scare the magpie & the crow in acres where the crops are sown.
And so, in truth, by shedding blood
1615 I'm helping out & doing good!
My death brings people benefit which you find painful to admit, for once you're shrivelled up & gone
you are no use to anyone.
1620 Why you exist I just don't know you good-for-nothing so-&-so, but even when I cease to live
I still have something more to give:
when hunters mount me on a stick
1625 in woods where trees grow dense & thick
I serve my purpose as a lure for little birds, so I ensure men have their share of roasted meat by snaring food they like to eat 1630 You're just as pointless when alert as when you're lifeless & inert;
why bother bringing up a brood—alive or dead they do no good."

GEOFFREY CHAUCER

For the full headnote on Geoffrey Chaucer (ca. 1340–1400), see pages 467–69.

Chaucer's Parliament of Birds is deeply indebted to two classic texts, but a servant to neither. For in both cases, dreaming, desire, and the birds take over.

Chaucer's narrator starts reading a text by the Roman orator and politician Marcus Tullius Cicero (106–43 B.C.E.), Book 6 of his Republic (51 B.C.E.), known in the medieval period as The Dream of Scipio. The Latin text relates the dream of the Roman general Scipio (d. 129 B.C.E.), who dreams that his grandfather Scipio Africanus takes him on an astral voyage to understand how service to the state will be rewarded in the afterlife, and how pursuit of sensual desire must be repressed by servants of the state as they pursue the Roman military conquest of North Africa.

Later in the poem, the narrator mentions another Latin philosophical text, the late medieval Complaint of Nature (1160s) by Alan of Lille. In this text the goddess Nature, whose gown is splendidly embroidered with images of every species of bird, explains to the narrator why human desire, especially homosexual desire, alone in nature deviates from the ideal, fertile, and productive models of the natural order. Alan's Complaint ends with the excommunication of homosexual love.

How are these severe Latin texts received in Chaucer's vernacular poem? They enter the dream world and are there rewritten by the desire of the narrator's dreaming psyche. He enters the walled garden of Nature, there to replay Cicero's "common profit," or political good, as the collective "good" of sexual desire as expressed in Nature's parliament, where birds choose their mates on Valentine's Day. And the birds embroidered on the outer garment of Alan's goddess Nature come to life here, irrepressibly debating, singing, and quacking their way to a collective, ecological resolution of desire. Whereas Alan's natural order is ideally a hierarchical one ruled by cosmic reason, here the hierarchy is invoked only to be questioned in many ways. The aristocratic birds (revealingly, they are birds of prey) may, for example, be sophisticated in their pursuit of a refined and courtly love, but it's the lower birds who, for all their comic, no-nonsense quacking, are better serving the common profit of Nature's ecological order by choosing their mates with admirable dispatch. And when it comes to advising the young aristocratic female bird about the male lover she should choose among the three offering themselves, Nature refuses to recognize the "natural" hierarchy of birth: "If I were Reason, certes, then would I / Counsel you the royal tercel take" (lines 632–33). With this single subjunctive, Chaucer opens up a significant difference between himself and his Neoplatonic poetic and philosophical frames: passionate love may not be rational, but it is natural. And natural love can cross the class boundaries of birth, thereby revealing that those boundaries are not in fact natural at all. In this poem, bonding is a matter of election.

This, then, is an account of a new and largely joyous ecology, with immediate implications for humans and human society. Chaucer's Latin source texts promote cosmic, philosophical reason as expressed by patrician figures; his own vernacular poem takes its cue rather from the parliament (literally "the speaking") of birds of all classes.

The Parliament of Birds<sup>1</sup>

The life so short, the craft so long to learn,<sup>2</sup>
Th'assay<sup>o</sup> so sharp,<sup>o</sup> so hard the conquering,
The dreadful<sup>o</sup> joy that always slit so yerne,<sup>3</sup>
All this mean I by Love,<sup>4</sup> that my feeling
Astonieth<sup>o</sup> with his wonderful working<sup>5</sup>
5 So sore<sup>o</sup> ywis,<sup>o</sup> that when I on him think,
Not wot I<sup>6</sup> well wher<sup>o</sup> that I float or sink.

For all be<sup>o</sup> that I know not love in deed,<sup>o</sup>
Ne wot<sup>o</sup> how that he quiteth folk their hire,<sup>7</sup>
10 Yet happeth me<sup>o</sup> full ofte in bokes<sup>o</sup> read
Of his miracles and his cruel ire;<sup>o</sup>
There read I well he will be lord and sire,
I dare not seyn,<sup>o</sup> his strokes<sup>o</sup> been so sore,
But<sup>o</sup> God save such a lord! I can no more.<sup>8</sup>

15 Of usage what for luste what for lore,<sup>9</sup>
On bokes rede I ofte, as I you tolde.
But wherefore that I speak all this? Not yore<sup>o</sup>
Ago, it happed<sup>o</sup> me for to beholde
Upon a book, was write with lettres olde;
And thereupon a certain thing to learn,
20 The longe day full faste<sup>o</sup> I read and yerne.<sup>o</sup>

For out of olde felde,<sup>o</sup> as men sey,
Cometh all this newe corn<sup>o</sup> from year to year;
And out of olde bokes, in good fey,<sup>o</sup>
Cometh all this newe science<sup>o</sup> that men lere.<sup>o</sup>
25 But now to purpose as of this matere<sup>1</sup>—
To rede forth so gan me to delite,<sup>o</sup>

That all that day me thoughte but a lite.<sup>o</sup><sub>2</sub>

30 This book of which I make of mencioun,
Entitled was all thus, as I shall telle,
"Tullius<sup>o</sup> of the dream of Scipioun."<sup>2</sup><sub>2</sub>
Chapitres seven it hadde, of heaven and helle,
And earth, and soules that therein dwelle,
Of whiche, as shortly<sup>o</sup> as I can it treat,<sup>o</sup>
35 Of his sentence<sup>o</sup> I will ye seyn the grete.<sup>o</sup>

First telleth it, when Scipion was come
In Afrik,<sup>o</sup> how he met Massinisse,
That him for joy in armes hath ynome.<sup>o</sup>
Then telleth it their speech and all the blisse<sup>o</sup>
40 That was betwix<sup>o</sup> them, til the day gan misse;<sup>o</sup>
And how his ancestor, African so dear,
Gan in his sleep that night to him appear.

Then telleth it that from a starry place,<sup>o</sup>
How African hath him Carthage shewed,<sup>o</sup>
And warned him before of all his grace<sup>o</sup> 45 And said him,<sup>o</sup> what man, lered other lewed,<sup>o</sup>
That loveth common profit,<sup>o</sup> well ythewed,<sup>o</sup>
He should unto a blissful place wende,<sup>o</sup>
Thereas<sup>o</sup> joy is that last withouten ende.

50 Then asked he, if folk that now ben dead
Have life and dwelling in another place;
And African saide, "Ye, withouten dread,"<sup>o</sup>
And that our present worldes lifes space<sup>3</sup>
Nis<sup>o</sup> but a manner<sup>o</sup> death, what wey we trace,<sup>4</sup>
55 And rightful folk shall go, after they die,
To heaven; and shewed him the galaxy.

Then showed he him the little earth, that here is,

At regard of<sup>o</sup> the hevenes quantity;
And after showed he him the nine spheres,
And after that the melody herde he 60 That cometh of thilke<sup>o</sup> spheres thrice three,<sup>5</sup>
That well is of music and melody
In this world here, and cause of harmony.

Then bade he him, since erthe was so lite,<sup>o</sup>
And full of torment and of harde grace,<sup>o</sup>
65 That he ne should him in the world delite.
Then tolde he him, in certain yeres space,<sup>6</sup>
That every star should come into his place
There it was first; and all should out of mind<sup>o</sup>
70 That in this world is done of all mankind.

Then prayed him Scipioun<sup>o</sup> to tell him all
The way to come into that heavenly blisse;
And he said, "Know thyself first<sup>o</sup> immortal,<sup>7</sup>
And look ay<sup>o</sup> busily thou work and wisse<sup>o</sup>
75 To common profit, and thou shalt not misse<sup>o</sup>
To comen swiftly to that place dear,<sup>o</sup>
That full of bliss is and of soules clear.<sup>o</sup>

But breakers of the law, soth to seyne,<sup>o</sup>
And lecherous folk, after that they be dead,
80 Shall always whirl about the earth in pain,
Til many a world be passed, out of dread,<sup>o</sup>
And then, forgiven all their wicked deed,
Then shall they come unto that blissful place,
To which to comen God thee sende his grace!"

85 The day gan failen and the darke night,
That reveth<sup>o</sup> bestes<sup>o</sup> from their business,<sup>o</sup>
Berafte me<sup>o</sup> my book for lack of light,
And to my bed I gan me for to dresse,<sup>o</sup>
Fulfilled of thought<sup>o</sup> and busy heavinesse;<sup>o</sup>

90 For both I hadde thing which that I nolde,
And eek<sup>o</sup> I ne had that thing that I wolde.<sup>o</sup>

But finally my spirit, at the last,
Forweary<sup>o</sup> of my labor all the day,
Took rest, that made me to slepe faste,<sup>o</sup>
And in my sleep I mette,<sup>o</sup> as that I lay,
95 How African, right in the selfe aray<sup>o</sup>
That Scipioun him saw before that tide,<sup>o</sup>
Was come and stood right at my bedes side.

The weary hunter sleeping in his bed,
To woode again his minde goth anoon;<sup>o</sup>
100 The judge dremeth how his pleas ben sped;<sup>o</sup>
The carter dremeth how his cart is goon;
The rich, of gold; the knight fights with his foon;<sup>o</sup>
The sick met<sup>o</sup> he drinketh of the ton;<sup>o</sup>
105 The lover met he hath his lady won.<sup>8</sup>

Can I not say if that the cause were
For<sup>o</sup> I had read of African beforne,
That made me to met<sup>o</sup> that he stood there;
But thus said he, "Thou hast thee so well born<sup>o</sup>
110 In looking of min olde book totorn.<sup>o</sup>
Of which Macrobie roghte<sup>o</sup> not a lite,<sup>o</sup>
That somdel<sup>o</sup> of thy labor would I quite!"<sup>o</sup>—

Citherea!<sup>9</sup> thou blissful lady sweete,
That with thy firebrand dauntest whom thee lest,<sup>o</sup>
And madest me this sweven<sup>o</sup> for to mete,<sup>o</sup>
115 Be thou my help in this, for thou mayst best;
As wisly<sup>o</sup> as I saw thee north-north-west,
When I began my sweven for to write,<sup>1</sup>
So give me might to rhyme and ek t'endite!<sup>o</sup>

120 This foresaid African me hente<sup>o</sup> anoon,

And forth with him unto a gate broughte
Right of a parke, walled of grene stone;
And over the gate, with letters large ywroghte,<sup>o</sup>
There weren vers<sup>o</sup> ywriten, as me thoghte,<sup>o</sup>
On either half,<sup>o</sup> of full great difference, 125 Of which I shall you say the plain sentence.<sup>o</sup>

"Through me men go into that blissful place
Of hertes hele<sup>o</sup> and dedly woundes cure;
Through me men go unto the welle<sup>o</sup> of Grace,
There green and lusty<sup>o</sup> May shall ever endure;
130 This is the way to all good aventure;<sup>o</sup>
Be glad, thou reader, and thy sorrow ofcaste,<sup>o</sup>
All open am I; passe in, and hie thee faste!"<sup>o</sup>

"Through me men go," then spoke that other side,
"Unto the mortal strokes of the spear,
135 Of which Disdain and Danger<sup>o</sup> is the guide,
There tree shall never fruit nor leves<sup>o</sup> bear.
This stream you ledeth to the sorrowful were,<sup>o</sup>
There as the fish in prison is all drie;
Th'eschewing<sup>o</sup> is only the remedie."<sup>2</sup>

These vers of gold and black ywriten were,
Of whiche I gan astounded<sup>o</sup> to beholde,
For with that one increased ay<sup>o</sup> my fear,
And with that other gan min herte bolde;<sup>o</sup>
145 That one me het,<sup>o</sup> that other did me colde,<sup>o</sup>
No wit had I, for<sup>o</sup> error, for to chese<sup>o</sup>
To entre or flee, or me to save or lese.<sup>o</sup>

Right<sup>o</sup> as, betwixen adamauntes<sup>o</sup> two
Of even might,<sup>o</sup> a piece of iron yset
That hath no might to move to ne fro—
150 For what that one may hale,<sup>o</sup> that other let<sup>o</sup>—
Ferde<sup>o</sup> I; that niste whether me was bet,<sup>3</sup>

To enter or leave, til African my guide
Me hente,<sup>o</sup> and shoof<sup>o</sup> in at the gates wide,

155 And said, "It stondeth<sup>o</sup> written in thy face,
Thin error, though thou tell it not to me;
But dread the not to come into this place,
For this writing nis nothing meant by thee,<sup>o</sup>
Ne by none, but<sup>o</sup> he Loves servant be;
160 For thou of love hast lost thy taste, I guess,
As sick man hath of sweet and bitterness.

But nonetheless, although that thou be dull,
Yet that thou canst not do, yet mayst thou see;
For many a man that may not stand<sup>o</sup> a pulle,<sup>o</sup>
Yet liketh him<sup>o</sup> at wrestling for to be,
165 And demeth yet wher he do bet or he;<sup>4</sup>
And if thou haddest cunning for t'endite,<sup>o</sup>
I shal thee shewen matter of to write."<sup>o</sup>

With that my hand he took in his anoon,
Of which I comfort caught, and went in faste;<sup>o</sup>
170 But Lord! so I was glad and well begoon!<sup>o</sup>
For overall, where I min eyen<sup>o</sup> caste,
Were trees clad with leaves that ay<sup>o</sup> shall laste,
Each in his kinde,<sup>o</sup> of colour fresh and green
As emerald, that joye was to seen:
175

The builder<sup>o</sup> oak, and eek<sup>o</sup> the hardy ash;
The piler<sup>5</sup> elm, the cofre<sup>o</sup> unto careine;<sup>o</sup>
The boxtree piper;<sup>6</sup> holm<sup>o</sup> to whippes lash;
The sailing fir;<sup>7</sup> the cipres, death to pleine;<sup>o</sup>
The sheter ew,<sup>8</sup> the asp for shaftes pleine<sup>o</sup>;
180 The olive of peace, and eek<sup>o</sup> the drunken vine,
The victor palm, the laurer to devine.<sup>o9</sup>

A garden saw I, full of blosmy<sup>o</sup> boughs,

Upon a river, in a grene mead,<sup>o</sup>
 There as sweetness evermore ynow<sup>o</sup> is, 185 With flowers white, blue, yellow, and red;
 And colde welle-stremes, nothing dead,<sup>o</sup>
 That swommen full of smale fisshes lighte,
 With finnes red and scales silver-brighte.

On every bough the birdes heard I sing,
 190 With voice of angel in their harmonie,
 Som busied them<sup>o</sup> their birddes<sup>o</sup> forth to bring;
 The little conies<sup>o</sup> to their play gunne hie.<sup>o</sup>
 And further all aboute I gan espie
 195 The dreadful roe, the buck,<sup>1</sup> the hart and hinde<sup>o</sup>
 Squirrels, and bestes small of gentle kinde.<sup>o</sup>

Of instruments of stringes in accord<sup>o</sup>
 Heard I so play and ravissing sweetness,
 That God, that maker is of all and lord
 Ne heard never better, as I guess;
 200 Therewith a wind, unnethe<sup>o</sup> it might be less<sup>o</sup>
 Made in the leves grene a noise so softe
 Acordaunt to<sup>o</sup> the briddes songe onlofte.<sup>o</sup>

The air of that place so attempre<sup>o</sup> was
 That never was grevaunce<sup>o</sup> of hot ne cold;
 205 There wex<sup>o</sup> eek<sup>o</sup> every holsome spice and grass,<sup>o</sup>
 Ne no man may there wexe<sup>o</sup> sick ne old;
 Yet was ther joy more than a thousand fold
 Than man can tell; ne never wolde it night,<sup>o</sup>
 210 But ay<sup>o</sup> clear day to any mannes sight.

Under a tree, beside a well,<sup>o</sup> I say<sup>o</sup>
 Cupide<sup>2</sup> our lord his arrows forge and file;
 And at his feet his bow all ready lay,
 And Wille<sup>o</sup> his doghter tempered all this while
 The hedes<sup>o</sup> in the welle, and with her file

215 She couched them after as they should serve,<sup>3</sup>
Some for to slay, and some to wounde and kerve.°

Then was I war° of Plesaunce anonright,°
And of Array,° and Lust,<sup>4</sup> and Courtesy,
And of the Craft° that can and hath the might 220 To doon° by force a wight° to do folie—
Disfigurat° was she, I nil not° lie;
And by himself, under an oak, I guess,
Saw I Delight, that stood with Gentleness.°

225 I saw Beauty, withouten any attire,
And Youthe, ful of game and jolity,
Foolhardiness, Flattery, and Desire,
Messagerie,° and Mede,° and other three—
Their names shall not here be told for° me—
And upon pillars great of jasper° longe°
230 I saw a temple of brass yfounded stronge.°

About the temple daunceden alway°
Wommen ynowe,° of whiche some there were Faire of herself,° and some of them were gay;°
In kirtels,<sup>5</sup> all disshevele,° went they there—
235 That was their office° always, year by year—
And on the temple, of doves white and faire
Saw I sittinge many a hundred paire.

Before the temple door full soberly
240 Dame Peace sat, with a curtain in her hond;
And by her side, wonder discreetly,° Dame Pacience sitting there I fond°
With face pale, upon an hille of sond;°
And aldernext,° within and eek withoute,° Behest° and Art, and of their folke a route.°
245

Within the temple, with sighes° hot as fire

I heard a swogh<sup>o</sup> that gan aboute renne;<sup>o</sup>
Which sighes were engendred with<sup>o</sup> desire,
That maden every altar for to brenne<sup>o</sup>
Of newe flame; and well aspied I thenne
250 That all the cause of sorrow that they drie<sup>o</sup>
Came of the bitter goddess Jealousy.

The god Priapus saw I,<sup>6</sup> as I wente,
Within the temple, in sovereign<sup>o</sup> place stonde,
In such array<sup>o</sup> as when the ass him shente<sup>o</sup>
255 With cry by night, and with septr<sup>o</sup> in honde;
Full busily men gan assaye and fonde<sup>o</sup>
Upon his head to set, of sundry hewe<sup>o</sup>
Garlands full of flowers fresshe newe.

260 And in a privy corner, in desporte,<sup>o</sup>
Found I Venus and her porter<sup>o</sup> Richesse,
That was full noble and hautein of hir porte.<sup>o</sup>
Dark was that place, but afterward lightness
I saw a little, unnethe<sup>o</sup> it might be less,
And on a bed of gold she lay to reste,
265 Til that the hote sonne gan to weste.<sup>o</sup>

Her gilte<sup>o</sup> hairs with a golden thread
Ybounden were untressed<sup>o</sup> as she lay,
And naked from the breast up to the head
Men might her see; and, sothly<sup>o</sup> for to say,
270 The remenant was well covered to my pay<sup>o</sup>
Right with a subtle kerchief<sup>o</sup> of Valence,<sup>7</sup>
Ther was no thicker cloth of no defence.<sup>8</sup>

The place gave a thousand savours swote,<sup>o</sup>
And Bachus,<sup>9</sup> god of wine, sat her beside, 275 And Ceres next,<sup>1</sup> that doth of hunger bote;<sup>2</sup>
And, as I said, amiddes lay Cipride,<sup>3</sup>
To whom on knees two yonge folkes cried

To ben their help; but thus I let her lie,
 And further in the temple I gan espie
 280
 That, in dispite of Diane the chaste,<sup>4</sup>
 Ful many a bowe ybroke<sup>o</sup> hung on the wall
 Of maidens, such as gan their times waste
 In her servise; and painted over all Full many a story, of which I touche shall 285
 A fewe, as of Calixte<sup>5</sup> and Athalante,<sup>6</sup>
 And many a maide, of which the name I wante;<sup>o</sup>

 290
 Eleine, Cleopatre,<sup>7</sup> and Troilus,<sup>8</sup>
 Silla,<sup>9</sup> and eek<sup>o</sup> the moder of Romulus<sup>1</sup>—
 Alle these were painted on that other side,
 And all their love, and in what plight they died.

 When I was come again unto the place
 295
 That I of spoke, that was so sweet and green,
 Forth walked I then, myselven to solace.<sup>o</sup>
 Then was I war<sup>o</sup> where that there sat a queen
 That, as of light the summer sonne sheen
 Passeth the star, right so over mesure
 300
 She fairer was than any creature.

 And in a launde,<sup>o</sup> upon an hill of flowers,
 Was set this noble goddess of Nature;
 Of branches were her halles and her bowers,<sup>o</sup>
 305
 Ne ther nas fowl<sup>o</sup> that cometh of engendrure,<sup>o</sup>
 That they ne were all prest<sup>o</sup> in her presence,
 To take her doom<sup>o</sup> and give her audience.<sup>o</sup>

For this was on Seint Valentines day,<sup>2</sup>
When every bird cometh there to choose his make,<sup>o</sup>
310 Of every kinde, that men thenke may;
And that so huge a noise gan they make,
That earth and air, and tree, and every lake
So full was, that unnethe<sup>o</sup> was there space
315 For me to stand, so full was all the place.

And right as Alain,<sup>3</sup> in the Pleint of Kinde,<sup>o</sup>
Deviseth<sup>o</sup> Nature in array and face,
In such array men mighten her there finde.
This noble emperesse, full of grace
320 Bade every fowl to take his owne place,
As they were wont<sup>o</sup> always from year to year,
Seint Valentines day, to stonden there.

That is to say, the foules of ravine<sup>o</sup>
Were highest set; and thanne foules smale,
325 That eten as them Nature would encline,<sup>o</sup>
As worm or thing of whiche I tell no tale;<sup>o</sup>
And water-foul sat loweste in the dale;
But fowl that liveth by seed sat on the green,
And that so fele,<sup>o</sup> that wonder was to seen.

There mighte men the royal eagle find,
330 That with his sharpe look pearceth the sonne;
And other egles of a lower kind,<sup>o</sup>
Of which that clerkes well devisen cunne.<sup>o</sup>
Ther was the tyrant with his feathers dunne<sup>o</sup>
335 And greye, I mene the goshawk, that doth pine<sup>o</sup>
To briddes for his outrageous ravine.<sup>o</sup>

The gentle<sup>o</sup> falcon, that with feet distreineth<sup>o</sup>
The kinges hand; the hardy sperhawk<sup>o</sup> eke
The quailles foe; the merlin<sup>o</sup> that paineth

340 Himself full ofte, the larke for to seek;
There was the dove, with hir eyen<sup>o</sup> meek;
The jealous swan, ayens<sup>o</sup> her death that singeth;
The owle eek, that of death the bode<sup>o</sup> bringeth;

The crane giant, with his trumpes soun<sup>e</sup>;
The thief the chogh;<sup>o</sup> and eek the jangling pie;<sup>o</sup>
345 The scorning jay; the eles<sup>o</sup> foo, heroun<sup>e</sup>;
The false lapwing, ful of treachery;
The starling, that the counseil<sup>o</sup> can bewreie;<sup>o</sup>
The tame ruddok;<sup>o</sup> and the coward kite;<sup>o</sup>
The cock, that orloge<sup>o</sup> is of thorpes lite;<sup>o</sup>
350

The sparrow, Venus son; the nightingale,
That clepeth<sup>o</sup> forth the grene leves<sup>o</sup> newe;
The swallow, morder<sup>o</sup> of the flies<sup>o</sup> smale
That maken hony of flowers fresshe of hewe;<sup>o</sup>
The wedded turtle,<sup>o</sup> with hir herte trewe;
355 The peacok, with his angels feathers bright;
The fesaunt,<sup>o</sup> scorner of the cock by night;

The waker<sup>o</sup> goose; the cuckoo most unkinde;<sup>4</sup>
The popinjay, ful of delicacy;<sup>o</sup>
The drake, stroyer<sup>o</sup> of his owne kinde;<sup>o</sup>
360 The stork, the wreker<sup>o</sup> of avouterie;<sup>o</sup>
The hote<sup>o</sup> cormeraunt of gluttony;
The raven wise, the crow with voice of care;<sup>o</sup>
The thrustle<sup>o</sup> old; the frosty feldefare.<sup>o</sup>

What should I say? of foules every kind
365 That in this world han feathers and stature,<sup>o</sup>
Men mighten in that place assembled find
Before the noble goddess of Nature
And everich<sup>o</sup> of them did his busy cure<sup>o</sup>
Benignely<sup>o</sup> to choose or for to take,
370 By hir acord, his formel<sup>o</sup> or his make.<sup>o</sup>

But to the point—Nature held on hir hond<sup>o</sup>
A formel eagle, of shape the gentlest<sup>o</sup>
That ever she among her workes fonde,<sup>o</sup>
The most benigne and the goodliest;
375 In her was every vertue at his reste,<sup>o</sup>
So ferforth,<sup>o</sup> that Nature herself had blisse
To look on her, and ofte her beak to kisse.

Nature, the vicarie<sup>o</sup> of th'almighty lorde,
That hot, cold, heavy, light, and moist and dreie<sup>o</sup>
380 Hath knit with even number of accorde,<sup>o</sup>
In easy voice gan for to speak and seye,
"Foules, take heed of my sentence,<sup>o</sup> I pray,
And, for your ease, in furthering of your<sup>o</sup> need,
385 As faste as I may speak, I will me speed.<sup>5</sup>

You know well how, Saint Valentines day,
By my statute and through my governaunce,
You come for to choose—and flee your way—
Your makes,<sup>o</sup> as I prick<sup>o</sup> you with plesaunce.<sup>o</sup>
But nonetheless, my rightful ordenaunce<sup>o</sup>
390 May I not break, for all this world to win,<sup>o</sup>
That he that most is worthy shall begin.

The tercel<sup>o</sup> eagle, as that you know full well,
The foul<sup>o</sup> royal above you in degree,
395 The wise and worthy, secree,<sup>o</sup> trewe as steel,
The which I formed have, as you may see,
In every part as it best liketh me,<sup>o</sup>
It nedeth not his shape<sup>o</sup> you to devise,<sup>o</sup>
He shall first choose and speken in his guise.<sup>o</sup>

And after him, by order shall you choose,
400 After your kind,<sup>o</sup> everich as you liketh,<sup>o</sup>
And, as your hap<sup>o</sup> is, shall you win or lose;

But which of you that love most entriketh,<sup>o</sup>
God sende him her that sorest for him siketh."<sup>o</sup>
And therewithal the tercel gan she call,
405 And said, "My son the choice is to you fall.

"But nonetheless, on this condition
Must be the choice of everich that is here,
That she agree to his election,<sup>o</sup>
410 Whatso he be<sup>o</sup> that shulde be her fere;<sup>o</sup>
This is our usage<sup>o</sup> always from year to year;
And who so may at this time have his grace,<sup>o</sup>
In blissful time he came into this place."

With head inclined and with full humble chere<sup>o</sup> 415 This royal tercel spoke and taried not:
"Unto my sovereign lady, and not my fere,<sup>6</sup>
I choose, and choose with will and heart and thought,
The formel<sup>o</sup> on your hand so well ywrought,<sup>o</sup>
Whose I am all and ever will her serve,
420 Do what hir list,<sup>7</sup> to do me live or sterve.<sup>o</sup>

Beseeching her of mercy and of grace,
As she that is my lady sovereigne;
Or let me die present<sup>o</sup> in this place.
For certes,<sup>o</sup> long I may not live in pain;
425 For in min heart is corven<sup>o</sup> every vein;
And haveinge only reward to<sup>8</sup> my truthe<sup>o</sup>
My dere heart, have on my woe some routhe.<sup>o</sup>

And if that I to her be founde untrue,<sup>o</sup>
Disobeisaunt,<sup>o</sup> or wilful<sup>o</sup> negligent,
Avauntour,<sup>o</sup> or in process<sup>o</sup> love a newe,
430 I pray to you this be my jugement,
That with<sup>o</sup> these foules I be all torent,<sup>o</sup>
That ilke<sup>o</sup> day that ever she me finde

To hir untrue, or in my guilt unkinde.°

435 And since that none loveth her so well as I,
All be she never of love me behette,<sup>9</sup>
Then oughte she be min through her mercy,
For other bond can I none on hir knet.°
For never, for no woe, ne shall I let° 440 To serven her, how far so that she wende;°
Sey what you list my tale is at an ende."

Right as the fresshe, rede rose newe
Ayen° the summer sonne colored is,
Right so for shame all wexen gan her hewe
445 Of this formel,° when that she heard all this;
She neither answered well ne said amiss
So sore abasshed was she, til that Nature
Said "Daughter, dread you noght, I you assure."

Another tercel eagle spoke anoon
450 Of lower kinde,<sup>1</sup> and said, "That shall not be;
I love her bet° than ye do, by Saint John,
Or at the least I love as well as ye;
And longer have her served, in my degree,°
And if she shulde have loved for long loving,
455 To me alone had been° the guerdoninge.°

I dare eek seyn, if she me finde false,
Unkinde, jangler,° or rebel in any wise,°
Or jealous, do me hongen° by the hals!°
And but I bear me° in her servise
460 As well as that my wit can me suffice,
From point to point,° her honor for to save,
Take she my life, and all the good I have."

The thridde tercel eagle answerd tho,°
"Now, sirs, ye seen the little leiser° here;

465 For every foul cryeth out to been ago
Forth with his make,o or with his lady dear;
And eek Nature herself ne will not hear,
For tarrying here, not half that I wold seye;
And but I speak, I must for sorrow deie.

470 Of long service avaunte I me nothing,o
But as possible is me to die today
For woe, as he that hath ben languisshing
These twenty winter, and well happen may
A man may serven bet and more to payo
In half a year, although it were no more,
475 Than some man doth that hath served full yore.o

I say not this by me,o for I ne can
Do no servise that may my lady please;
But I dare seyn, I am hir truest man
485 As to my dome,2 and faintest would her ease;o
At shorte wordes, til that death me seize,o
I will be hers, whether I wake or winke,o
And true in all that herte may bethinke."

Of all my life, since that day I was born,
485 So gentle pleao in love or other thing
Ne herde never no man me beforne,
Whoso that hadde leisure and cunningo
For to rehearseo their cheero and their speaking;
And from the morrow gan this speche laste
490 Til dounward drew the sonne wonder faste.

The noise of foules for to ben deliveredo
So loude rang, "Have done and let us wende!"o
That well wendeo I the wodeo had all toshivered.o
"Come off!"o they cried, "Allas! you will us shend!"o 495 When shall your cursed pleading have an end?
How should a judge either party leve,o

For yea or nay, withouten any preve?"<sup>o</sup>

The goose, the cuckoo, and the duck also
So criden, "Kek kek!" "Kukkow!" "Quek quek!" hie,<sup>o</sup>
That through min ears the noise wente tho.<sup>o</sup>
500 The goose said, "All this nis not worth a flie!
But I can shape<sup>o</sup> hereof a remedy,
And I will say my verdict faire and swithe<sup>3</sup>
For<sup>o</sup> water-foul, whoso be wrath or blithe."<sup>o</sup>

"And I for worm-foul," quod the fool<sup>o</sup> cuckoo, 505 "And I will, of min owne authority,
For common profit,<sup>o</sup> take the charge<sup>o</sup> now,
For to delivere<sup>o</sup> us is great charity."
"You may abide a while yet, parde<sup>o</sup>!"
Quod the turtel,<sup>o</sup> "If it be your will 510 A wight may speak him were as good be still."<sup>4</sup>

"I am a seed-foul, oon<sup>o</sup> the unworthieste
That wot I well, and little of kunning;<sup>o</sup>
But bet<sup>o</sup> is that a wightes<sup>o</sup> tonge reste
Than entermeten him of such doing<sup>5</sup>
515 Of which he neither rede<sup>o</sup> can nor sing.
And whoso doth, ful foule himself acloyeth,<sup>o</sup>
For office uncommitted<sup>6</sup> ofte anyoeth."

Nature, which that alway had an ear
To murmur of the lewednes<sup>o</sup> behinde, 520 With facound<sup>o</sup> voice said, "Hold your tonges there!
And I shall soon, I hope, a counseil<sup>o</sup> finde<sup>o</sup>
You to delivere, and from this noise<sup>o</sup> unbinde;
I judge, of every folk men shal one call
To seyn the verdict for you foules all."
525

Assented were to this conclusioun
The briddes alle; and foules of ravine<sup>o</sup>

530 Han chosen first, by plein<sup>o</sup> election,
The tercelet<sup>o</sup> of the falcon, to define
All their sentence and, as them list, termine;<sup>7</sup>
And to Nature him gonnen to present,
And she accepteth him with glad intent.

The tercelet said then in this manner:
"Full hard were it to prove by resoun
535 Who loveth best this gentle formel<sup>o</sup> here;
For everich<sup>o</sup> hath such replicacioun,<sup>o</sup>
That none by skilles<sup>o</sup> may be brought adoun;
I can not seen that arguments availe;
Then semeth it there moste be bataile."<sup>o</sup>

540 "All ready!" quod these eagles tercels tho.<sup>o</sup>
"Nay sirs!" quod he, "if that I dorste<sup>o</sup> it say,
You do me wrong, my tale<sup>o</sup> is not ydo!<sup>o</sup>
For sirs, ne taketh noght agrief,<sup>o</sup> I prey,
It may not gon, as you wolde, in this way;
Ours is the voice that han the charge on honde,<sup>o</sup>
545 And to the judges dome<sup>o</sup> you moten stonde;<sup>o</sup>

"And therefore, peace! I say, as to my wit
Me wolde think how that the worthiest
Of knighthood, and longest hath used it,
550 Moste of estate,<sup>o</sup> of blood the gentilest,<sup>o</sup>
Were sittingest<sup>o</sup> for her, if that her leste;<sup>o</sup>
And of these three she wot<sup>o</sup> herself, I trowe,<sup>o</sup>
Which that he be, for it is light<sup>o</sup> to knowe."

The water-foules han their heades laid
555 Together, and of a short avisement,<sup>o</sup>
When everich had his large golee<sup>o</sup> said,
They saiden sothly, all by one assent,
How that "The goose, with hir facounde gent,<sup>o</sup>
That so desireth to pronounce our need,<sup>o</sup>

560 Shal telle our tale" and preide "God her speed."

And for these water-foules tho<sup>o</sup> began
The goose to speak, and in her cakeling
She saide, "Peace! now take keep<sup>o</sup> every man,
And herkeneth<sup>o</sup> which a reason I shall bring;
My wit is sharp, I love no tarryinge;
565 I say, I rede<sup>o</sup> him, though he were my brother,
But<sup>o</sup> she will love him, let him take another!"

"Lo here! a perfect reason of a goose!"
Quod the sperhawk; "Never mot she thee!<sup>o</sup>
Lo, such it is to have a tonge loose!
570 Now parde,<sup>o</sup> fool, yet were it bet<sup>o</sup> for thee
Have hold thy peace, than shewen thy nicete!<sup>o</sup>
It lith not in his wit nor in his will,
But sooth is said, 'A fool can not be still.' "

575 The laughter arose of gentle<sup>o</sup> foules alle,
And right anoon the seed-foul chosen had
The turtel<sup>o</sup> trewe, and gunne her to them calle,
And preiden<sup>o</sup> her to say the sothe sad<sup>o</sup>
Of this matter, and asked what she rad;<sup>o</sup>
And she answered, that plainly her intent 580 She would it show, and sothly what she meant.

"Nay, God forbide a lover shulde chaunge!"<sup>o</sup>
The turtle said, and wex<sup>o</sup> for shame all red;
"Though<sup>o</sup> that his lady evermore be strange,<sup>o</sup>
Yet let him serve hir, til that he be dead;
585 For sothe, I praise not the gooses reed;<sup>o</sup>
For though she died, I would<sup>o</sup> none other make,<sup>o</sup>
I will ben hers, til that the death me take."

"Well bourded!"<sup>o</sup> quod the duck, "By my hat!
590 That men should loven always causeles,<sup>o</sup>

Who can a reason find or wit in that?
Daunceth he merry that is mirthelless?
Who shoulde recche<sup>o</sup> of that is reccheles?"<sup>o</sup>
"Quek, quek!" yet seith the duck, full well and faire,
"There been mo<sup>o</sup> stars, God wot, than a pair!"
595

"Now fie, churl!"<sup>o</sup> quod the gentle tercelet,<sup>o</sup>
"Out of the dunghill came that word full right,
Thou canst noght see what thing is well beset:<sup>o</sup>
Thou farest by love as owles<sup>o</sup> doon by light,
The day them blent,<sup>o</sup> but well they see by night;
600 Thy kind<sup>o</sup> is of so low a wretchedness,
That what love is, thou canst nat see ne guess."

Tho gan the cuckoo put him forth in press<sup>o</sup>
For fowl that eteth worm and seide blive,<sup>o</sup>
"So<sup>o</sup> I," quod he, "may have my make<sup>o</sup> in peace, 605 I recche not<sup>o</sup> how longe that ye strive;
Let each of them be solein<sup>o</sup> all their lyve,
This is my reed,<sup>o</sup> sin<sup>o</sup> they may not acorde;
This shorte lesson nedeth not recorde."<sup>o</sup>

"Ye! have the glutton filled enough his paunche,<sup>8</sup> 610 Then are we well!" seid then a merlion;<sup>o</sup>
"Thou murderer of the heisugge<sup>o</sup> on the branche
That brought thee forth, thou ruthelless glutton!
Live thou solein, wormes corruption!<sup>o</sup>
For no fors is of lack of thy nature;<sup>9</sup> 615 Go, lewed<sup>o</sup> be thou, while the world may dure!"<sup>o</sup>

"Now peace," quod Nature, "I comaunde here;
For I have heard all your opinioun,
And in effect yet be we not the nere;<sup>o</sup>
But finally, this is my conclusion,
620 That she herself shall han the election
Of whom her list,<sup>o</sup> whoso be wrath or blythe,<sup>o</sup>

Him that she cheest,o he shall her have as swithe.o

For since it may not here discussed be
Who loveth her best, as said the tercelet, 625 Then will I do her this favor, that she Shall have right him on whom her heart is set,
And he her that his heart hath on hir knet.o
Thus judge I, Nature, for I may not lie;
630 To none estate I have none other ye.o

But as for counseil for to chese a make,o
If I were Reason, certes,o then would I
Counsel you the royal tercel take,
As said the tercelet full skilfully,
635 As for the gentilesto and most worthy,
Which I have wroughto so well too my plesance;
That to you ought to been a suffisance."o

With dreadfulo voice the formelo her answered,
"My rightful lady, goddess of Nature,
640 Sotho is that I am ever under your yarde,o
Like as is everiche other creature,
And mooto be yours while that my life may dure;o
And therefore granteth me my firste bone,o
And min intento that will I say well soon."

"I graunte it you," quod she; and right anon
645 This formel eagle spoke in this degree,o
"Almighty queen, untoo this year be gon
I ask respite for to avisen me.o
And after that to have my choice all free;
This all and sum, that I will speak and seye;
650 Ye gete no more, although ye do me deie.o

"I wol not serven Venus ne Cupide
For sotho as yet, by no manner way."

655 "Now since it may none other wise betide,"
Quod tho<sup>o</sup> Nature, "here is no more to say;
Then would I that these foules were away
Each with his make, for<sup>o</sup> tarrying longer here"—
And saide them<sup>o</sup> thus, as ye shall after hear.

660 "To you speak I, you terceletts," quod Nature,
"Beth of good heart and serveth, alle three;
A year is not so longe to endure,
And each of you pain him,<sup>o</sup> in his degree,
For to do well; for, God wot, quit<sup>o</sup> is she
From you this year; what after so befall<sup>o</sup>, 665 This entremes<sup>o</sup> is dressed<sup>o</sup> for you alle."

And when this work all brought was to an end
To every foule Nature gave his make
By even acorde,<sup>o</sup> and on their way they wend.<sup>o</sup>
But Lord! the bliss and joye that they make!
For each gan other in his winges take,
670 And with their nekkes each gan other winde,<sup>o</sup>
Thanking always the noble queen of kinde.<sup>o</sup>

But first were chosen foules for to sing,
As year by year was always the usaunce<sup>o</sup>
675 To sing a roundel<sup>1</sup> at their departing,
To do to Nature honor and plesaunce.
The note,<sup>o</sup> I trowe,<sup>o</sup> ymaked<sup>o</sup> was in Fraunce;
The wordes were such as you may here find,
The nexte verse, as I now have in mind.

680 "Now welcome summer, with thy sonne softe,
That hast this winters weathers overshake,<sup>o</sup>
And driven away the longe nightes blake!
"Saint Valentin, that art full high onlofte;<sup>o</sup>—
Thus singen smale foules for thy sake—
Now welcom summer, with thy sonne softe,

685 That hast this winters weathers overshake.

“Well han they cause for to gladen ofte,
 Sith<sup>o</sup> each of them recovered hath his make;
 Full blissful may they singen when they wake;
 690 Now welcom summer, with thy sonne softe,
 That hast this winters weathers overshake,
 And driven away the longe nightes blake.”<sup>o</sup>
 And with the shouting, when the song was do,<sup>o</sup>

695 That foules maden at their flight away
 I woke, and other bokes took me to
 To read upon, and yet I read alway;
 In hope, ywis,<sup>o</sup> to read so some day
 That I shal mete<sup>2</sup> som thing for to fare
 The bet;<sup>3</sup> and thus to read I will not spare.<sup>o</sup>

- Note 2: Middle English rendering of a Latin proverb (Ars longa, vita brevis). Chaucer probably encountered it in the Roman Stoic Seneca’s essay “On the Brevity of Life” (1.1), but Seneca himself was quoting the Greek physician Hippocrates’ Aphorisms (1). Chaucer’s translation, “craft,” makes explicit the classical and medieval conception of poetic art as a skill comparable to practical skills like medicine or carpentry.Return to reference 2

- Note 2: The Dream of Scipio is the closing episode of Marcus Tullius Cicero's De re publica, composed in 51 B.C.E. It is told from the point of view of Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus the Younger, who traveled to Carthage in North Africa as part of his duties as a military tribune. There, he visits King Masinissa, an old friend of his grandfather, Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus the Elder (Chaucer calls him "African" here). During his visit, Scipio's grandfather visits him in a dream. Taking him up into the sky, Scipio the Elder shows his grandson the nine planetary spheres of classical cosmography and exhorts him to stoic civic virtue. The Dream was known in the Middle Ages through an influential late 4th-century commentary by Macrobius, which uses the Ciceronian text to discourse on a number of topics in natural history, astronomy, and dream theory.Return to reference 2

- Note 8:
Chaucer is alluding to Macrobius's theory of dreams put forth in his commentary on The Dream of Scipio. Macrobius proposes that nightmares (insomnia) are a category of dream that contain no prophetic significance and instead result from mental reactions to the events of the day. Another category of dream that Macrobius describes is the oracle (oraculum), in which a trusted authority figure appears and offers advice. The Dream of Scipio is an oracular dream. Chaucer is also aware of a more refined, 12th-century categorization of nonpredictive dreams, the so-called animal dream, according to which many dreams simply replicate what the dreamer has been doing during the day. Chaucer here is equivocating about what kind of dream the Parliament of Birds might be.

- Note 7: Thin, fine, openwork cloth from Valence (in southern France) or Valenciennes (in northern France), towns known for fine clothmaking. Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, there was no thicker cloth to provide defense. Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Bacchus, Roman god of wine. Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Ceres, Roman goddess of the harvest Return to reference 1
- Note 2: That is, cures hunger. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: In the center lay Venus. "Cipride" is another name for Venus. Return to reference 3
- Note 4: In order to spite Diana the chaste. Diana, Roman goddess of the hunt, archery, and the moon, was associated with strict virginity. She was said to have a retinue of virginal huntresses. Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Callisto, a member of Diana's retinue of huntresses. She was raped by Jove and became pregnant; when Diana discovered this, she banished her. Meanwhile, Juno, Jove's wife, turned her and her son into bears. To save them, Jove swept them into the sky, where they became the constellations Ursa Major and Ursa Minor. See Ovid, Metamorphoses 2.409–507. Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Atalanta, a gifted runner who vowed she would never marry unless a man bested her in a footrace. With Venus's help, Hippomenes tricked Atalanta by distracting her during the race

- with golden apples and so married her. See Ovid, Metamorphoses 10.560–707.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Semiramis, an Assyrian queen, believed to have built Babylon and an emblem of sexual perversion in the Middle Ages. See Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.59, and Dante, Inferno 5.52–60.Return to reference 7
  - Note 8: Probably Canace, the daughter of the Roman god of wind, Aeolus, whom he forced to commit suicide after she became pregnant by her brother. See Ovid, Heroides 11.Return to reference 8
  - Note 9: Hercules. Though famous for his twelve labors, he died when his wife, attempting to regain his affection, sent him a cloak soaked in the blood of a centaur he had killed, not knowing he had killed the creature with a poisoned arrow. He died in agony when he put on the poison-soaked cloak. See Ovid, Metamorphoses 9.198–238.Return to reference 9
  - Note 1: Byblis, a classical figure who fell in love with her brother and went insane when he rejected her. See Ovid, Metamorphoses 9.454–655.Return to reference 1
  - Note 2: Dido, queen of Carthage. She fell in love with Aeneas and committed suicide when he abandoned her to fulfill his destiny as the founder of Rome. See Virgil, Aeneid 4, and Ovid, Heroides 7.Return to reference 2
  - Note 3: Piramus and Thisbe, tragic lovers on whom the story of Romeo and Juliet is based. See Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.55–106.Return to reference 3
  - Note 4: Tristram and Isoude, tragic adulterous lovers in Arthurian legend. See, for instance, Thomas, Le Roman de Tristan (12th century), pp. 192–95.Return to reference 4
  - Note 5: Paris and Helen (here spelled “Eleine”) set off the Trojan War when they eloped. See Ovid, Heroides 16 and 17.Return to reference 5
  - Note 6: Achilles, famous in the Middle Ages for dying of love for Polyxena. See Chaucer, Book of the Duchess, lines 1067–71.Return to reference 6

- Note 7: Cleopatra, queen of Egypt. She had love affairs first with Julius Caesar and then with Mark Anthony; she committed suicide after Mark Anthony's death. See Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Troilus, the hero of Chaucer's major poem Troilus and Criseyde, died after he was betrayed by his lover, Criseyde, during the Trojan War.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Scylla, daughter of Nisus, king of Megara. When King Minos of Crete besieged the city, she betrayed Megara for love of him. When Minos discovered what she had done, he spurned her in disgust at her unfilial behavior. She was then transformed into a bird. See Ovid, Metamorphoses 14.1–74.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Rhea Silvia. Romulus was the founder of Rome, who, according to Ovid, was fathered by Mars. She was killed by her uncle after giving birth. See Ovid, Fasti 3.9–45.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Saint Valentine's Day, February 14. Saint Valentine was an early Christian martyr; the modern association between Valentine's Day and romantic love almost certainly begins with this poem.Return to reference 2
- Note 3:
Alan of Lille, in The Complaint of Nature. The 12th-century Latin poem describes Nature allegorically as a goddess of luminous and sensual (though modest) beauty, wearing a golden crown with jewels representing the constellations of the zodiac and the seven planetary spheres. She is dressed in a finely woven garment with shifting colors (representing air) that resolve into images of birds, a mantle representing water covered with images of aquatic animals, and a tunic representing earth with images of land animals, including humankind.
Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Unnatural. The cuckoo was often a symbol during the Middle Ages of unfaithfulness, fickleness, or dishonesty, due in part to its habit of laying eggs in other birds' nests.Return to reference 4

- Note 5: That is, I will speak as quickly as I can.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Wife. The contrast here is between a sovereign lady, above the speaker in rank, and an espoused wife, who was seen as theologically as well as socially subordinate to her husband.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Regardless of her doing whatever she wants.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Taking only into consideration.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Even though she never vowed her love to me.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Lower birth (that is, a less noble species).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: According to my judgment.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Eloquent and without delay.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: If it is your (the Cuckoo's) desire that a person might speak, it would be preferable that he stay silent.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: For him to interfere in such proceedings.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A fulfilled but unassigned duty.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: To declare their collective judgment and, as they wished, conclude.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: As long as the glutton has filled his stomach.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: (It would be) no matter if there were none of your kind.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: A short poem on two rhymes, with the opening line(s) serving as refrain in the middle and at the end. The form originated in France and was often set to music.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Chaucer puns here on the double meaning of "mete" (both "to meet" and "to dream").Return to reference 2
- Note 3: That I shall find (or dream) something so that I may fare better.Return to reference 3

ROBERT HENRYSON

Robert Henryson (ca. 1425–ca. 1500) is perhaps the greatest of a set of exceptionally accomplished late fifteenth- and early sixteenth-century Scots poets.

Little is known for certain about Henryson's life. Because he is spoken of as "master," he probably held a master's degree, and evidence points to his having been a schoolmaster in a grammar school founded by monks in the town of Dunfermline, just to the north of Edinburgh. He is the author of three major works: Orpheus and Eurydice, Moral Fables, and The Testament of Cresseid. Together, they reveal an author skilled in legal, literary, and philosophical traditions; they also reveal a great and ambitious literary artist capable of trenchant comedy within a larger vision that is dark, austere, and commanding. His intense poem The Testament of Cresseid, for example, is a sequel to Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde. It imagines the fate of Criseyde/Cresseid as she becomes sexually promiscuous in the Greek camp, stricken with both leprosy and, finally, remorse. In sixteenth-century editions of Chaucer's works, this text was routinely printed at the end of Troilus and Criseyde as its sixth book.

As a schoolmaster, Henryson would have taught schoolboys how to read Latin; one of the texts would have been a collection of animal fables (probably the so-called late twelfth-century elegiac Romulus) (see p. 644). Henryson took up the challenge of these simple school texts to transform them into a work of extraordinary range, from the cute and comic, to the savagely satirical, to the philosophically dark and bleak. He drew on previous works of animal literature (especially Chaucer's Nun's Priest's Tale, in his The Cock and the Fox). His particular contribution, however, is to extend the philosophical and rhetorical range of the fables and to press their interpretive challenges to the limit. Fable traditions generally present animals as reduced and recognizable humans, designed to guide human behavior in simple ways. Not so for Henryson, and not so in this opening fable of the collection, The Cock and the Jasper.

Fables can be thought of as the dunghill of literature, the place of worthless scraps and sweepings. Only the moral interpretation, outside and attached to the animal narrative, invests the low story with high significance. The Cock and the Jasper begins in precisely the locus of the dunghill in the farmyard. But just as fables might in fact hide rich literary treasure, so too does the cock find a jewel in the filth. And so far from dismissing it, the cock exercises discretion to know both what's for him and what's not (a standard kind of practical advice enjoined by fables). The cock is even a rhetorical master in his crafted apostrophe to the jasper. We might seem to have a complete fable here, since the cock would seem to have persuasively moralized the narrative from within, even before we reach the Moralitas in the concluding stanzas.

Animal stories are, however, full of sudden jolts as we shift from the animal to the human perspective. Henryson does not want us to settle for easy treasure and instead surprises us with an unexpected morality in the appended interpretation of the apparently wise cock. As an animal, he might be wise; as a human, he's missed the point of fables.

The Cock and the Jasper<sup>1</sup>

A cock one time, with feathers pert and bright,
Canty<sup>o</sup> and bold, although he was dirt poor,
Rose and flew to a dunghill at first light,
An early bird, already to the fore,
5 Scraping away, when the next thing in the stour<sup>o</sup>
He finds this gemstone under dust and ashes, Swept out by chance with sweepings from the house.

Giddy young ones, with their minds on nothing
But swanking in the street and being seen
Have little interest in their besoming.<sup>o</sup>
10 They birl the brush<sup>o</sup> to make the floor look clean.
So precious items dropped are very often
Swept from the doorstep out into the yard.
Something like that, in this case, had occurred.

He marvels at the stone and then says he,
15 'O jewel rare, O rich and noble thing,
I may have found you, but you're not for me.
You are a gemstone for a lord or king.
For you to be interred here in the dung
Is a great pity, down in the muck and mold,
20 And you so lovely and worth so much gold.

'And a pity I should find you, who could never Make clear hues like yours more sheer and clear
Nor prove your great worth any worthier:
Little about you gives me heart or cheer.
25 Let great lords cherish you and hold you dear.
Lesser things are better fit to tempt me,

Like corn or hogwash when my gizzard's empty.

30 'I'd rather be here scraping with my nails
In dust and dirt for dear life, hunting food—
The dregs and dross and little worms and snails
Or any grub at all that does me good—
I'd rather them than gems by the cartload.
While you, for your part, are uninterested
35 In anything that I desire or need.

'You don't have corn, and corn is what I covet.
Your color calms the eye and feeds the sight
But color's never going to feed my gullet.
I'm foraging from morning until night
40 And on the lookout always. But that's it!
How can I live on looks? It's food I need,
Not cooked or even hot: I'd eat dry bread.

'But where, gemstone, should be your habitation?
Where should you dwell but in a royal tower?
Where should you sit but on a royal crown
45 Exalted and installed in honor there?<sup>2</sup>
Arise, Sir Jasper, fairest of the fair,
Shake off this filth and go where you should be.
I was not meant for you, nor you for me.'

50 Leaving the jewel lying on the ground,
This cock went foraging upon his way.
But when or how or by whom it was found
I have no sure report, so cannot say.
But the inner point and import and idea
Behind the fable in the original
55 I shall rehearse in plain and homely style.

The properties of this fair gem are seven:
First, as to color, it is marvelous,
Like fire partly, partly like the heaven.
It makes a man strong and victorious,
60 Preserves him too when things turn dangerous.
Whoever has this stone, good luck will favor:
No need for him to fear the fire or water.

This noble jasper, with its changing hue,
Signifies true wisdom and true learning
65 Perfected by the exercise of virtue
And far excelling any earthly thing.
This is what inclines men to good living
And makes them glad to strive, and fit to conquer
70 Every vice and spiritual danger.

Who's to be wealthy, kind, courageous?
Who is immune to chance and misadventure?
Who can take charge in home, town-hall or palace
And be a know-nothing? No one, for sure.
75 Knowledge is the wealth that will endure,
That rain won't ruin, nor moth nor rust devour.<sup>3</sup>
To man's soul it is sustenance forever.

This cock, so obsessed with ordinary corn
He scorned a jasper, may in his ignorance
Be likened to a fool, who will scoff and scorn
80 At learning; impervious, thick, a dunce,
He takes a scunner at<sup>o</sup> wise arguments,
The same as a sow that snotters in her gruel,
And spurns pearls in the trough, preferring swill.<sup>4</sup>

85 Ignoramuses are the enemy
Of knowledge and of learning, and possess
No understanding of a thing so worthy,
So noble it is past all earthly price.

90       The luckiest man is one who spends his days
In study of the knowledge of the good:
A man like that fulfils his every need.

95       But now, alas, this jewel is lost and hid;
No one looks for it, no one pursues
The study of it. We make our wealth our god<sup>5</sup>
And turn our souls to paupers, gain to lose.
But talk of this is like the wind that blows.
Therefore I conclude. I have said my say.
Look for the jewel who will, for there it lay.

England came late to the Renaissance. It was in the fourteenth century that Italy had begun its "Renaissance," the word meaning "rebirth." What was reborn in Italy was a fascination with its own classical past, including its Latin literature, philosophy, and art. England, however, reached its Renaissance only a century later, and in fact this was a new birth rather than a rebirth. An island, England was slow to adopt Italy's focus on the classics.

As the Renaissance swept across Europe, Latin became the international language: all significant schooling was in Latin, and Latin was the language for international trade. The English language, by contrast, was not very useful. There were those at home who thought it too primitive ever to serve as a suitable medium for serious, elevated, or elegant discourse—or, consequently, writing. One of the first works in this anthology's selection of English Renaissance literature, Thomas More's Utopia, for instance, was not first written in English: More, who began his great book in 1515 when he was on a diplomatic mission in the Netherlands, was intending his work for an international intellectual community, and so his language of choice was the European one, Latin. His work, though it became famous throughout Europe, was not even translated into English until the 1550s. Yet by the end of that same century, English had developed and grown beyond recognition: it had been fashioned into the powerful expressive medium whose cadences in the works of Marlowe, Shakespeare, and the translators of the Bible continue to thrill readers after more than four centuries.

How did it come about that so many remarkable poems, plays, and prose works were written in English by the end of the sixteenth century? The answer lies in part in the spectacular creativity of a succession of brilliant writers, the best of whom are represented in these pages. Still, a vital literary culture is the product of complex processes, involving thousands of more modest, half-hidden creative acts sparked by a wide range of motives, some of which will briefly be explored over the following pages.

THE COURT AND THE CITY

The development of the English language in the sixteenth century is linked at least indirectly to the consolidation and strengthening of the English state. Through most of the previous century, the English had been preoccupied by violent clashes between the militarized servants of rival barons and had had limited time and inclination to cultivate rhetorical skills. The social and economic health of the nation had been further damaged by the so-called Wars of the Roses, a vicious, decades-long struggle for royal power between the noble houses of York, whose symbol was a white rose, and Lancaster, whose symbol was a red rose. The struggle was resolved by the establishment of what was called the Tudor dynasty, named for Owen Tudor, an ambitious Welshman who himself had no claim to the throne but who married Catherine of Valois, widow of the Lancastrian king Henry V. Their grandson, the Earl of Richmond, became the first Tudor monarch: he won the crown by leading the army that defeated and killed the reigning Yorkist king, Richard III, at the battle of Bosworth Field. When the victorious Richmond, descendent of the house of Lancaster, was crowned King Henry VII in 1485, he married Elizabeth of the house of York. The result was a Tudor dynasty that united the two rival factions of York and Lancaster. Their union was symbolized in a floral device, the "Tudor rose," which consists of a red rose of Lancaster enclosing a white rose of York.

Because they had been impoverished and divided by their own wars, England's barons could not effectively oppose the new power of the Tudor Crown. Moreover, the leaders of the Church also supported royal power. So Henry VII was able to counter the multiple and competing power structures characteristic of feudal society and impose a much stronger central authority and order on the nation. By the reign of the last Tudor—Henry's granddaughter, Elizabeth I—even though the ruler still needed the consent of Parliament on crucial matters (including the all-important one of levying taxes), the royal court had concentrated in itself much of the nation's power.

The court was a center of culture as well as power: court entertainments such as theater and masque (a sumptuous, elaborately costumed performance of dance, song, and poetry); court fashions in dress and speech; court tastes in painting, music, and poetry—all shaped the taste and the imagination of the country as a whole. Culture and power were not, in any case, easily separable in Tudor England. In a society with little freedom of speech (as we understand it) and with mass communication limited to word of mouth and the announcing and hanging up of official proclamations (newspapers, called “corantoës,” were not to be published until the 1620s), important public issues were often aired indirectly, through what we might now regard as entertainment.

Whereas in the Middle Ages noblemen had guarded their power by keeping their distance from London and the king, in the Tudor era the route to power lay in proximity to royalty. (One of the coveted positions in the court of Henry VIII was Groom of the Stool, “close stool” being the Tudor term for toilet.) The monarch's chief ministers and favorites dispensed favors to courtiers who competed for offices in the court, the government bureaucracies, the royal household, the army, the Church, and the universities or who sought titles or grants or leases of land. But proximity to royalty had dangers of its own. Festive evenings with the likes of the ruthless Henry VIII were not occasions for relaxation. The court was a place of competition, even paranoia, with an accompanying obsession with secrecy, spying, duplicity, and betrayal.

Tudor courtiers were torn between the needs to protect and to display themselves. For lessons in the art of intrigue, many turned to the Italian Machiavelli's notorious Il Principe (The Prince), with its cool guidance on how power may be gained and kept. For advice on the cultivation and display of the self, they could resort to the still more influential Italian book Il Cortegiano (The Courtier) by Count Baldassare Castiglione. It was particularly important, Castiglione wrote, to conceal the effort that lay behind elegant accomplishments, so that they would seem natural. (Sprezzatura was the name for this invaluable skill.) In this anxious atmosphere, courtiers became highly practiced at implementing what these Italian writers recommended and at crafting and coining new and graceful words with double or triple meanings. The English language expanded as a result, not least because a habit of Anglifying Latin quickly doubled the number of words available in English (“sweat” and “perspiration,” “drink” and “beverage”—the frank Anglo-Saxon vying with the ponderous Latin). And, hardly surprisingly, several of the best poets in the period—Sir Thomas Wyatt, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Walter Raleigh, and others—were courtiers.

Other forces in Tudor England pulled toward a more public sphere. Markets expanded significantly, international trade flourished, and cities throughout the realm experienced a rapid surge in size and importance. London’s population soared, from 60,000 in 1520, to 120,000 in 1550, to 375,000 a century later, making it the largest and fastest-growing city not only in England but in all of Europe. Every year in the first half of the seventeenth century about 10,000 people migrated to London from other parts of England—wages in London tended to be around 50 percent higher than in the rest of the country—and it is estimated that one in eight English people lived in London at some point in their lives. Elderly Londoners in the 1590s could barely recognize the city of their childhood; London’s boom was one factor among many contributing to the sense of a culture moving with increasing swiftness away from its historical roots. That expansion, too, found its voice in literature, in songs celebrating markets and trade, and fueled the import of merchandise from overseas like tobacco and spices.

About a decade before Henry VII won his throne, the art of printing, a German invention, had been introduced into England by William Caxton (ca. 1422–1491). Caxton, who was an author and a translator as well as a printer, attempted to cater to courtly tastes by producing works whose tone was more medieval than modern. As often in an age of alarming novelty, many people looked back to an idealized past. Indeed the great innovations of the Tudor era—intellectual, governmental, and religious—were all presented, at the time, as attempts to restore ancient traditions. Printing made books cheaper and more plentiful, providing more opportunity to read and more incentive to learn. Though reliable statistics are impossible to come by, literacy seems to have increased during the fifteenth century and still more during the sixteenth as printed texts became more widely accessible. The greater availability of books may also have reinforced the trend toward silent reading, a practice that gradually transformed what had been a communal experience into a more intimate encounter with a text, though communal singing ensured that certain varieties of lyric remained shared—some of which are included in this volume.

Social class often determined writers' attitude to print. As Sir Thomas Smith explained in 1583, "We in England divide our men commonly into four sorts, gentlemen, citizens or burgesses, yeomen artificers, and laborers." But while citizens, artificers, and laborers bought and increasingly wrote texts, leading to a flourishing trade in plays, ballads, romances, sermons, jests, and a rich range of other books and pamphlets, court poets were wary of the "stigma of print" that might mark their verse as less exclusive. Among "gentlemen"—the elite—manuscripts retained considerable prestige, and court texts often circulated in notebooks and commonplace books without ever reaching print.

RENAISSANCE HUMANISM

To Renaissance intellectuals and artists, the achievements of the pagan philosophers of ancient Greece and Rome came to seem compelling, and the medieval submission of the human spirit to penitential discipline gave way to unleashed curiosity, individual self-assertion, and a powerful conviction that man was the measure of all things. In Italy, in the brilliant, intensely competitive, and vital world of the artists Leonardo da Vinci and Michelangelo, the human figure was placed at the center of the Renaissance worldview. "We have made thee neither of heaven nor of earth, neither mortal nor immortal," God tells Adam, in the Florentine Pico della Mirandola's Oration on the Dignity of Man (1486), "so that with freedom of choice and with honor, as though the maker and molder of thyself, thou mayest fashion thyself in whatever shape thou shalt prefer." "As though the maker and molder of thyself": this vision of self-fashioning may be glimpsed too in the works of other artists—the poetry of Petrarch, the sculpture of Donatello, and the statecraft of Lorenzo de' Medici.

Tudor Schoolroom. In this woodcut from the sixteenth century, the pupils sit on "forms," or benches, with few if any desks. As an early school statute explains, "When they have to write, let them use their knees for a table." All the lessons, for the different age groups, are taught in the same room: the younger boys (left) are learning their letters, while the students at the upper right are studying music. The schoolmaster, seated, holds a birch, while the usher, or assistant master, is beating a student. The windows of the schoolroom are set high in the walls, to cut down on distractions. Next to the far pillar is an hourglass used in marking time for various lessons. The school's valuable books are kept in a locked chest, behind the schoolmaster.

But in England it was not until the accession of Henry VIII that the Renaissance began to flower—and not, as in Italy, in painting, sculpture, and architecture. It came rather in the intellectual program and literary vision known as humanism (from the Italian name for an educator of classical literature, umanista). In England, Renaissance humanism was bound up with struggles over the purposes of education and curriculum reform. English humanists, including John Colet (who, as dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, recast its grammar school on humanist principles), Roger Ascham (tutor to Princess Elizabeth), and Sir Thomas Elyot, wrote treatises on education to promote the kind of learning they regarded as the most suitable preparation for public service. That education shifted from training for the Church to the general acquisition of "literature," in the sense both of literacy and of cultural knowledge. For some of the more intellectually ambitious humanists, that knowledge extended to ancient Greek (largely lost in the West between the fourth and thirteenth centuries), whose enthusiastic followers began to challenge the preeminence of Latin.

Still, at the core of the curriculum remained the study of Latin. The purpose was to train the sons (and, very occasionally, daughters) of the nobility and gentry to speak and write good Latin, the language of diplomacy, of the professions, and of all higher learning. Women were primarily educated at home or in other noble houses, where they chiefly learned modern languages, religion, music, and needlework. While women seldom received the thorough training in the ancient languages and classical literature so central to the dominant culture, some, including Elizabeth I and Mary Sidney Herbert—and the daughters of Sir Thomas More—were able to play central roles in the translation and production of literary texts. Through Latin-based training, Elizabethan schoolmasters sought to impart rhetorical elegance, but the books their students laboriously pored over—from the Sententiae Pueriles (Maxims for Children) for beginners to the dramatists Terence, Plautus, and Seneca; the poets Virgil and Horace; and the orator Cicero—also offered moral, political, and philosophical wisdom and cultural capital. Though originating in pagan times, ancient truths could, in the opinion of many humanists, be reconciled to the moral vision of Christianity. The result, perplexing for some modern readers, is that pagan gods and goddesses flourish on the pages of even such a devoutly Christian poem as Edmund Spenser's Faerie Queene.

Humanists committed to classical learning were faced with the question of whether to write in Latin or in English. To many learned men, influenced both by the humanist elevation of the classical languages and by a Renaissance desire for eternal fame, national languages seemed unstable and impermanent in a way that Latin did not. Works by English scientists such as William Gilbert, William Harvey, and Francis Bacon easily joined those by such Continental writers as Nicolaus Copernicus, Johannes Kepler, and Andreas Vesalius in the common linguistic medium of Latin. But throughout Europe, nationalism and the expansion of the reading public were steadily strengthening the power and allure of native languages. The famous English schoolmaster Richard Mulcaster (ca. 1530–1611), teacher of the poet Spenser, captured this emergent sense of national identity when he compared Latin to his native tongue:

Is it not . . . a marvelous bondage, to become servants to one tongue for learning's sake the most of our time, with loss of most time, whereas we may have the very same treasure in our own tongue, with the gain of more time? our own bearing the joyful title of our liberty and freedom, the Latin tongue remembering us of our thralldom and bondage? I love Rome, but London better; I favor Italy, but England more; I honor the Latin, but I worship the English.

These two impulses within learned writers—humanist reverence for the classics and English pride in their native language—gave rise to many distinguished translations throughout the century: Homer's Iliad and Odyssey by George Chapman, Plutarch's Lives of the Noble Grecians and Romans by Sir Thomas North, and Ovid's Metamorphoses by Arthur Golding. Translators also sought to make available in English the most notable literary works in the modern languages: Castiglione's Il Cortegiano by Sir Thomas Hoby, Ariosto's Orlando furioso (Orlando Mad) by Sir John Harington, and Montaigne's Essais by John Florio. The London book trade of the sixteenth century was a thoroughly international affair.

"How You Ought to Hold Your Pen." Humanist concern with literacy led to a proliferation of writing books. These books typically explained how to cut and shape a goose quill to make a pen, how to hold that pen (and how not to), and how to write in both "secretary" and "Italian" (italic) hand.

THE REFORMATION

Officially, England in the early sixteenth century had a single religion, Catholicism. Because its acknowledged head was the pope in Rome, England was bound to Italy in terms of religion as well as language and culture. The most sacred Catholic ritual was Mass, a ceremony performed in Latin during which the congregation could regularly witness a miracle: the priest held up bread and wine, which his words transformed into the body and blood of God. This act gave the male priests great power, at once spiritual and material, over their largely illiterate flocks—power conveyed through systems of confession, pardons, penance, absolution, indulgences, sacred relics, and ceremonies. The Bible, the church services, and most of the theological discussions were in Latin, which few laypeople could understand. However, religious doctrine and spirituality were mediated to them by the priests, by beautiful church art and music, and by the liturgical ceremonies of daily life: festivals, holy days, baptisms, marriages, exorcisms, and funerals.

In the past, heretical movements had occasionally emerged and were suppressed, but a more serious threat arose in the sixteenth century. In November 1517, an Augustinian monk and a professor of theology at the University of Wittenberg, named Martin Luther, began to question several of the key doctrines and practices of the Catholic Church. What began in November 1517 as an academic disputation grew with amazing speed into a bitter, far-reaching, and bloody revolt that forever ruptured the unity of Western Christendom.

A person of formidable intellectual energy, eloquence, and rhetorical violence, Luther rose up against the ancient Catholic Church, in the name of private conscience enlightened by a personal reading of the scriptures. He maintained that the Church had degenerated and was a corrupt, worldly conspiracy; that it exploited its credulous believers and subverted nonreligious authority; and that the pope and his hierarchy were the servants of Satan. Luther argued that all people should have direct access to the word of God and be able to make their own analyses of the Bible: he therefore also thought the Bible should be translated out of Latin and into native languages. The movement Luther sparked, the Reformation as it came to be known (because it aimed to reform the Catholic Church), was governed by the terms sola scriptura and sola fide, according to which only the scriptures (not the Church or tradition or the clerical hierarchy) have authority in matters of religion and should determine what an individual must believe and practice; and only the faith of the individual (not good works or the scrupulous observance of religious rituals) can effect a Christian's salvation.

These tenets, heretical in the eyes of the Catholic Church, spread and gathered force, especially in northern Europe, where major leaders like the Swiss pastor Ulrich Zwingli in Zurich and the French theologian John Calvin in Geneva, elaborating various and sometimes conflicting doctrinal principles, organized the populace to overturn the existing church and established new institutional structures. In England, in contrast, the Reformation began less with popular discontent and theological disputation than with politics and royal greed. Henry VIII, who had received from Pope Leo X the title Defender of the Faith for writing a diatribe against Luther, craved a legitimate son to succeed to the throne, and his queen, Catherine of Aragon, failed to give him one. (Catherine had borne six children, but only a daughter, Mary, survived infancy.) After lengthy negotiations, the pope, under pressure from Catherine's powerful Spanish family, refused to grant the king the divorce he sought in order to marry Anne Boleyn, who, he hoped, might finally bear him a son.

A series of momentous events followed, as England lurched away from the Church of Rome. In 1531 Henry forced the entire clergy of England to beg pardon for having administered canon law (which governed such matters as divorce), which, he claimed, should be understood as a royal prerogative, not controlled by Rome. Two years later Henry's marriage to Catherine was officially declared null and void and Anne Boleyn was crowned queen. The king was promptly excommunicated by the pope, Clement VII. In the following year, all adult male subjects were required by a parliamentary "Act of Succession" to accept as "undoubted, true, sincere and perfect" the king's marriage to Anne. Thomas More and John Fisher, the bishop of Rochester, were among the small number who stuck to their Catholic beliefs and refused. The Act of Supremacy, passed later in the year, formally declared the king to be "Supreme Head of the Church in England" and again required an oath to this effect. In 1535 and 1536 further acts made it treasonous to refuse the oath of royal supremacy or, as More had tried to do, to remain silent. Three monks of the Catholic Carthusian order who rejected the oath—"How could the king, a layman," said one of them, "be Head of the Church of England?"—in May 1535 were hanged, drawn (tied to a horse and dragged), and quartered (torn apart by four horses pulling in different directions). A few weeks later Fisher and More were convicted and beheaded. Between 1536 and 1539, under the direction of Henry's powerful secretary of state, Thomas Cromwell, England's Catholic monasteries were suppressed. Their vast wealth was seized by the Crown and transferred, by either gift or sale, to the king's followers.

The Pope as Antichrist. In this satirical woodcut, the pope, riding the seven-headed Beast of the Apocalypse, holds in his hand a banner on which he urges his followers to be traitors and kill their princes. His message, carried by three froglike devils, flies into the gaping mouths of a knight, a bishop, and a monk. The devils are a reference to Revelation 16:13: "And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet." From Fierie Tryall of God's Saints (1611; author unknown).

Royal defiance of the authority of Rome was a key element in the English Reformation. But in the same year that Fisher and More were martyred for their adherence to Roman Catholicism, twenty-five Protestants (a label applied to adherents of any form of Christianity that "protested" or rejected Catholicism), members of a sect known as Anabaptists, were also burned for heresy on a single day. Through most of his reign, Henry remained an equal-opportunity persecutor, pitiless to Catholics loyal to Rome and hostile to many of those who espoused Reformation ideas, though these ideas, aided greatly by the printing press, gradually established themselves on English soil.

Having produced only a daughter, Elizabeth, the marriage between Henry and Anne Boleyn ended in disaster: the king had his wife beheaded on charges of treason and adultery. Henry's third wife, Jane Seymour, finally gave birth to the son he craved, and this son, Edward, succeeded to the throne upon the king's death in 1547. Both the ten-year-old Edward and his successive Protectors, the dukes of Somerset and Northumberland, were Protestants. Reformers hastened to transform the English Church accordingly. During Edward's brief reign, Thomas Cranmer, the archbishop of Canterbury, formulated the forty-two articles of religion that became the core of English Protestantism and wrote the first Book of Common Prayer, which was officially adopted in 1549 as the basis of English worship services.

The sickly Edward VI died in 1553, only six years after his accession to the throne. He was succeeded by his half-sister Mary (Henry VIII's daughter by his first wife, Catherine), who immediately took steps to return her kingdom to Roman Catholicism. Though she was unable to get Parliament to agree to return Church lands seized under Henry VIII, she restored the Catholic Mass, once again affirmed the authority of the pope, and subdued a rebellion that sought to depose her. With her ardently Catholic husband, Philip II, king of Spain, she initiated a series of bloodthirsty religious persecutions—she had almost three hundred Protestants burned “at the stake” (that is, tied to posts and burned)—that earned her (from her enemies) the name “Bloody Mary.” Hundreds of Protestants, including John Jewel and Anne Vaughan Locke, took refuge abroad in cities like Calvin's Geneva. Yet for thousands of English men and women, Mary's reign came as a liberation; the return of old Catholic ornaments to parish churches all over England indicates that they had not been confiscated or destroyed as ordered, but hidden away, in hopes of a return to the true faith.

Mary died childless in 1558, and her younger half-sister, Elizabeth, became queen. Elizabeth's succession had been by no means assured. For if Protestants regarded as invalid Henry VIII's Catholic marriage to Catherine and hence deemed Mary illegitimate, so Catholics regarded as invalid his Protestant marriage to Anne Boleyn and hence deemed her daughter illegitimate. Moreover, though Elizabeth outwardly complied with the official Catholic religious observances throughout her sister's reign, Mary and her advisers rightly suspected her of Protestant leanings and set traps for her: her life was often in danger. When Elizabeth ascended the throne, the country's future religious course was once again in question. During her coronation procession, when a girl in an allegorical pageant presented her with a Bible in English translation—banned under Mary's reign—Elizabeth kissed the book, held it up reverently, and laid it to her breast. By this simple yet profound (and carefully choreographed) gesture, Elizabeth signaled England's return to Protestantism, as well as the central role the Book, and books in general, would play in her court.

Many English men and women, of all classes, remained loyal to the old Catholic faith, but English authorities under Elizabeth demanded at least the appearance of conformity to Protestantism. Recusants (those who refused to attend regular Sunday services in their parish churches) were heavily fined. Anyone who wished to receive a university degree, to be ordained as a priest in the Church of England, or to be named as an officer of the state had to swear an oath to the ruler's supremacy as head of the church. Bishops were directed to investigate whether parish clergy had, as commanded, "removed, abolished, and destroyed" all images that were thought superstitious. Commissioners were sent throughout the land to confirm that religious services were following the officially approved liturgy and to investigate any reported backsliding into Catholic practice. At the other extreme were the Protestant exiles who returned to England eager to carry the Reformation much further than it had gone. A minority, whom their enemies called Puritans—for their attempts to "purify" the Church from any vestige of Catholicism—sought to purge the church service of ritual practices deemed to have no basis in scripture, to dress the clergy in simple garb, and to smash "idolatrous" statues, crucifixes, and altarpieces. They also objected to the calendar of "pagan" folk customs, including dancing around the maypole to mark the start of summer, and "mumming"—dressing up in disguise and performing plays and antics at friends' houses—to mark the Christmas period. Throughout her long reign, however, Elizabeth remained cautiously conservative and determined to hold Puritanism as well as Catholicism in check.

In the space of a single lifetime, England's official religion had changed from Roman Catholicism, to Catholicism under the supreme headship of the English king, to a guarded Protestantism, to a more radical Protestantism, to a renewed and aggressive Roman Catholicism, and finally to Protestantism again. Each of these shifts was accompanied by danger, persecution, and death. It was enough to make people wary. Or skeptical. Or extremely agile.

QUEEN ELIZABETH I

In the last year of Mary's reign, the Scottish minister John Knox, who was a Calvinist—a follower of the extreme French Protestant reformer Calvin—thundered against what he called “the monstrous regiment of women.” After the Protestant Elizabeth came to the throne the following year, Knox and his religious brethren were less inclined to denounce all female rulers; but in England, as elsewhere in Europe, there remained a widespread conviction that women were unsuited to wield power over men. Many men seem to have regarded rational thought as exclusively male; women, they assumed, were led only by their passions. While gentlemen mastered the arts of rhetoric and warfare, gentlewomen were expected to display the virtues of silence and good housekeeping. Among upper-class males, the will to dominate others was acceptable and indeed admired; the same will in women was condemned as a grotesque and dangerous aberration.

Admirers of Queen Elizabeth countered these prejudices by pointing out that history offered inspiring examples of just female rulers—notably Deborah, the biblical prophetess who had judged Israel. In the legal sphere, Crown lawyers advanced the theory of “the king's [or, in this instance, queen's] two bodies.” As England's crowned head, Elizabeth had a mortal “body natural” and an immortal “body politic.” While the queen's natural body was subject to decay and death, the office of monarch was eternal. In political terms, therefore, Elizabeth's sex was a matter of no consequence.

Elizabeth, who had received a fine humanist education and an extended, dangerous lesson in the art of survival, made it immediately clear that she intended to rule in more than name only. Though she assembled a group of trustworthy advisers, foremost among them William Cecil (later created Lord Burghley), she insisted on making many of the crucial decisions herself. Like many Renaissance monarchs, Elizabeth was drawn to the theory that ultimate power was quite properly concentrated in her person and indeed that God had appointed her to be his deputy in the kingdom. Opposition to her rule, in this view, was against the will of God and therefore blasphemous. Supporters of "absolutism" maintained that God commands that the people obey even wicked rulers (whom he has sent to punish the sinfulness of humankind). Such arguments were routinely made in speeches and political tracts and from the pulpits of churches, where they were incorporated into the Book of Homilies that clergymen were required to read out to their congregations.

In reality, Elizabeth's power was not absolute. The government had a network of spies, informers, and agents provocateurs, but it lacked a standing army, a national police force, an efficient system of communication, and an extensive bureaucracy. Above all, the queen had limited financial resources and needed to turn periodically to an independent Parliament, which had the sole right to levy taxes and to grant subsidies. Members of the House of Commons were elected from their towns (known as "boroughs"), not appointed by the monarch, and the queen could not dictate their policies. Under these constraints, Elizabeth ruled through a combination of political maneuvering and imperious command, while establishing an extraordinary, and largely literary, cult of love with her at the center.

"We all loved her," Elizabeth's godson Sir John Harington wrote, with just a touch of irony, a few years after the queen's death, "for she said she loved us." Ambassadors, courtiers, and parliamentarians all submitted to Elizabeth's cult of love, in which the queen's sex was cunningly transformed from a potential liability into a significant asset. Those who approached her generally did so on their knees and were expected to address her with the most extravagant compliments; she in turn spoke, when it suited her to do so, in a comparable language of love. The court favored an atmosphere of romance, with music, dancing, plays, and the elaborate fancy dress entertainments called masques. The queen adorned herself in dazzling clothes and rich jewels. When she went on one of her summer "progresses," ceremonial journeys through her land, she looked like an exotic, sacred image in a religious cult of love, and her noble hosts virtually bankrupted themselves to lavish upon her the costliest pleasures. England's leading artists, such as the poet Edmund Spenser and the painter Nicholas Hilliard, celebrated Elizabeth's mystery by likening her to the goddesses of mythology and the heroines of the Bible: Diana, Astraea, Cynthia, Deborah. The cultural sources of the cult of Elizabeth were both secular (her courtiers could pine for her as the cruelly chaste mistress celebrated in love poetry) and sacred (the veneration that under Catholicism had been due to the Virgin Mary could now be directed toward England's semidivine queen).

There was a sober, even grim aspect to these poetical fantasies: Elizabeth was brilliant at playing off one dangerous faction against another, now turning her gracious smiles on one favorite, now honoring his hated rival, now suddenly looking elsewhere and raising an obscure upstart to royal favor. And when she was disobeyed or when she felt that her prerogatives had been challenged, she was capable of an anger that, as Harington put it, with a reference to Henry VIII, "left no doubtings whose daughter she was." Thus when Sir Walter Raleigh, one of the queen's glittering favorites, married without her knowledge and consent, he found himself imprisoned in the Tower of London. Or when the controversial Protestant writer John Stubbes published a pamphlet denouncing the queen's proposed marriage to the French Catholic Duke of Anjou, he and his publisher were arrested and had their right hands chopped off. (After receiving the blow, the now prudent Stubbes lifted his hat with his remaining hand just before he fainted and cried, "God save the Queen!")

THE KINGDOM IN DANGER

Beset by Catholic and Protestant extremists, Elizabeth's careful compromises enabled her realm to avert the massacres and civil wars that poisoned France and other countries on the Continent. But menace was never far off, and there were continual fears of conspiracy, rebellion, and assassination. Suspicion swirled around Elizabeth's second cousin the Catholic Mary, Queen of Scots, who had been driven from Scotland in 1568 and had taken refuge in England. The presence, under a kind of house arrest, of a Catholic queen with a plausible claim to the English throne was the source of widespread anxiety. There were recurrent rumors that Mary was plotting to seize the English throne. Some of these were real enough, others imaginary, still others fabricated by the secret agents of the government's intelligence service under the direction of Elizabeth's spymaster, Sir Francis Walsingham. Fears of Catholic conspiracies intensified greatly after imperial armies of Catholic Spain invaded the Netherlands to stamp out Protestant rebels (1567), after the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre of Huguenots (French Protestant followers of Calvin) in France (1572), and after the assassination of Europe's other major Protestant leader, William of Orange (1584).

Elizabeth's life seemed to be in even greater danger after Pope Gregory XIII's proclamation in 1580 that, as she was a great heretic (she had been excommunicated a decade before), her assassination would not constitute a mortal sin. The immediate effect of the proclamation was to make life more difficult for English Catholics, most of whom were loyal to the queen but who fell under grave suspicion. Suspicion was heightened by the presence of English Jesuits, a militant religious order of the Catholic Church, who had been trained abroad and smuggled back into England to serve the Roman Catholic cause. When, after several botched conspiracies had been disclosed, Walsingham unearthed another plot to assassinate Elizabeth in the letters between the Queen of Scots and the Catholic Anthony Babington, the wretched Mary's fate was sealed. After a public display of indecision and perhaps with genuine regret, Elizabeth signed the death warrant, and her cousin was beheaded.

The long-anticipated military confrontation with Catholic Spain was now unavoidable. Elizabeth learned that Philip II of Spain, her former brother-in-law and onetime suitor, was preparing to send an enormous fleet against her island realm. The Spanish Armada was to sail first to the Netherlands, where a Spanish army would be waiting to embark and invade England. Barring its way was England's small fleet of well-armed and highly maneuverable fighting vessels, backed up by ships from the merchant navy. The Armada reached English waters in July 1588, but, in one of the most famous and decisive naval battles in European history, it was defeated. Then, in what many viewed as an act of God on behalf of Protestant England, the Spanish fleet was dispersed and all but destroyed by violent storms.

As England braced for an invasion that, as it turned out, never materialized, Elizabeth appeared in person to review some of her soldiers who had assembled at Tilbury, on the Thames estuary. Dressed in a white gown and a silver breastplate, she declared that though some among her councillors had urged her not to appear before a large crowd of armed men, she would never fail to trust the loyalty of her faithful and loving subjects. Nor did she fear the Spanish armies. "I know I have the body but of a weak and feeble woman," Elizabeth declared, "but I have the heart and stomach [that is, valor] of a king, and of a king of England too." In this celebrated, widely publicized speech, Elizabeth displayed many of her most memorable qualities: her great personal courage, her subtle blending of magniloquent rhetoric and the language of love, her strategic appropriation of traditionally masculine qualities, and her self-consciously theatrical command of grand public occasions. "We princes," she once remarked, "are set on stages in the sight and view of all the world."

ENGLAND AND THE WORLD

In 1485 most English people would have devoted little thought to their national identity. If asked to describe their sense of belonging, they would probably have spoken of the international community of Christendom and of their local region, such as Kent or Cornwall. The extraordinary events of the Tudor era, from the encounter with the New World to the break with Rome, made many people more aware and proud of their Englishness. At the same time, they began to perceive those who lay outside the national community in new (and often negative) ways. Like most national communities, the English defined themselves largely in terms of what or who they were not. In the wake of the Reformation, the most prominent “others” were those who had until recently been more or less the same—that is, the Catholics of Western Christendom. But other groups were also instrumental in the project of English self-definition.

Elizabethan London had a large population of foreign residents, mainly artisans and merchants and their families, from Portugal, Italy, Spain, Germany, and, above all, France and the Netherlands. Many of these people were Protestant refugees, and they were accorded some legal and economic protection by the government. But they were not always welcomed by the local populace. Throughout the sixteenth century, London was the site of repeated demonstrations and, on occasion, bloody riots against the communities of foreign artisans, who were accused of taking jobs away from Englishmen. There was widespread hostility as well toward other people occupying the same island as England, the Welsh and Scots, and the island opposite, the Irish, whom the English had for centuries been unsuccessfully struggling to subdue. The kings of England claimed to be rulers of Ireland, but in reality they effectively controlled only a small area known as the Pale, extending north from Dublin. The great majority of the Irish population remained stubbornly Catholic and, despite English burning of villages, destruction of crops, seizure of land, and massacres, fiercely independent.

Medieval England's Jewish population, the recurrent object of persecution, extortion, and massacre, had been officially expelled by King Edward I in 1290—the earliest such mass expulsion in Europe—but Elizabethan England harbored a small number of Jews or Jewish converts to Christianity. They were the objects of suspicion and hostility. Elizabethans appear to have been fascinated by Jews and Judaism but quite uncertain whether the terms referred to a people, a foreign nation, a set of strange practices, a living faith, a defunct religion, a villainous conspiracy, or a messianic inheritance. Protestant Reformers brooded deeply on the Hebraic origins of Christianity; government officials ordered the arrest of those “suspected to be Jews”; villagers paid pennies to traveling fortune-tellers who claimed to be descended from Abraham or masters of kabbalistic mysteries; and London playgoers enjoyed the spectacle of the downfall of the wicked Barabas in Christopher Marlowe's The Jew of Malta and the forced conversion of Shylock in Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice. Jews were not officially permitted to resettle in England until the middle of the seventeenth century, and even then their legal status was ambiguous.

Of equal fascination was “the Turk”: Muslims from the Ottoman Empire. The phrase “to turn Turk” originates from this period and signified Christians who converted to Islam, sometimes through enforced slavery, but sometimes by choice. Eager for trade, Queen Elizabeth would not vilify the Ottoman Empire entirely, though she worried about its expansionist aggression (so similar to her own) and was fearful of the compelling nature of its religion. Plays about Muslims stage this conflicted approach. Characters such as Marlowe's Tamberlaine in the play of that name are magnificent, eloquent, and sensual—as well as displaying overweening pride and cruelty.

Sixteenth-century England also had a small African population, brought into the country by mariners and merchants, who worked as servants, entertainers, and craftspeople. Their skin color was the subject of pseudoscientific speculation and theological debate. Some Elizabethans believed that Africans' blackness resulted from the climate of the regions where they lived, where, as one traveler put it, they were "so scorched and vexed with the heat of the sun, that in many places they curse it when it riseth." Others held that blackness was a curse inherited from their forefather Cush, the son of Ham (who had, according to the first book of the Bible, Genesis, wickedly exposed the nakedness of his drunken father, Noah). George Best, a proponent of this theory of inherited skin color, reported that "I myself have seen an Ethiopian as black as coal brought into England, who taking a fair English woman to wife, begat a son in all respects as black as the father was, although England were his native country, and an English woman his mother: whereby it seemeth this blackness proceedeth rather of some natural infection of that man."

Etching of a Black Woman, 1645, by Wenceslaus Hollar. The Bohemian-born Hollar lived and worked for most of his career in Antwerp and in London. He drew portraits of many men and women, including this depiction of a Black woman, probably a servant.

As the word infection suggests, Elizabethans frequently regarded blackness as a physical defect; though some of the Black people who lived in England and Scotland throughout the sixteenth century were accepted, others were treated as exotic curiosities. At his marriage to Anne of Denmark, James VI of Scotland (the son of Mary, Queen of Scots; as James I of England, he succeeded Elizabeth, in 1603) entertained his bride and her family by commanding four naked Black youths to dance before him in the snow. (The youths died of pneumonia shortly afterward.) In 1594, in the festivities celebrating the baptism of James's son, a "Black-Moor" entered pulling an elaborately decorated chariot that was, in the original plan, supposed to be pulled by a lion. In England there was a Black trumpeter in the courts of Henry VII and Henry VIII, while Elizabeth, who drafted a proclamation saying that Black people should be deported (though she may never have promulgated it), had at least one male Black servant, and a female servant, perhaps a midget, called Ipolyta the Tartarian (Tartary being the name for much of central and north Asia).

The legal status of slavery in England was ambiguous. In 1569 a man called Cartwright claimed that he should be allowed to beat an enslaved person he had brought over from Russia, but the court ruled "that England was too Pure an Air for Slaves to breathe in." Nevertheless, by the mid-sixteenth century the English had become involved in the profitable trade that carried African slaves to the New World. In 1562 John Hawkins embarked on his first slaving voyage, transporting some three hundred Africans from the Guinea coast to Hispaniola, where they were sold for ten thousand pounds. Elizabeth is reported to have said that this venture was "detestable and would call down the vengeance of Heaven upon the undertakers." She did, however, invest profitably in Hawkins's subsequent voyages and loaned him ships.

Elizabeth also invested in other enterprises that combined aggressive nationalism and the pursuit of profit in enslaved people. In 1493 the pope had divided the New World between the Spanish and the Portuguese by drawing a line from pole to pole (hence Brazil is a Portuguese-speaking country today and the rest of Latin America is Spanish-speaking): the English were not in the picture. But by the end of Edward VI's reign, the Company of Merchant Adventurers had been founded, and Englishmen had begun to explore Asia and North America. Some were looking for new lands in which to live, or new sources of gold, or simply new commodities to be sold. These people were fascinated, worried, and sometimes—they hinted—impressed by their encounters with other nations and cultures that seemed to function so well and without Christianity. Several of these adventurers turned to piracy, preying on Spanish ships that were returning laden with wealth extracted by enslaved natives from Spain's New World possessions. (The pope had ruled that the native peoples were human beings—and hence could be converted to Christianity—but the ruling did nothing to prevent their enslavement and brutal exploitation.) English acts of piracy soon became a private undeclared war, with the queen and her courtiers covertly investing in the raids but accepting no responsibility for them. The greatest of many astounding exploits was the voyage of Francis Drake (1577–80): he sailed through the Strait of Magellan, pillaged Spanish towns on the Pacific, reached as far north as San Francisco, crossed to the Philippines, and returned around the Cape of Good Hope; he came back with a million pounds in treasure, and his investors earned a dividend of 5,000 percent. Queen Elizabeth knighted him on the deck of his ship, The Golden Hind. His was the first English voyage to pass through the Magellan Straits from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean, and only the second circumnavigation in history. Yet, during the circumnavigation, Drake executed his sometime friend and fellow commander Thomas Doughty in dubious circumstances, and abandoned a pregnant Black woman, Maria, on an island in Indonesia.

WRITERS, PRINTERS, AND PATRONS

Printers, who owned printing presses, and publishers, who had the right to print texts, were all known by one name, “stationer.” A “stationer” might be a man or, sometimes, his widow—for women had the right to take over their dead husband’s business. When in 1557 the Worshipful Company of Stationers, formed in 1403, received a royal charter, the tasks of printers and publishers were defined. Printers were only to print those texts formally licensed by the stationers: for which the publisher would have to pay. In 1559 the process of licensing was further formalized: books had to be approved by either six privy councilors or the archbishop of Canterbury and the bishop of London. There was, then, no notion of the freedom of the press.

Despite the strict regulations of the Stationers’ Company, “scandalous, malicious, schismatical, and heretical” works were never effectively suppressed. Though there were occasional show trials and horrendous punishments—the printer William Carter was hanged for treason in 1584 because he had published a Catholic pamphlet; the Protestant separatists John Penry, Henry Barrow, and John Greenwood were executed in 1593 under a statute that made it a capital offense to “devise and write, print or set forth, any manner of book . . . letter, or writing containing false, seditious, and slanderous matter to the defamation of the Queen’s Majesty”—active censorship was not as frequent or thorough as we might expect.

The censors largely focused their attention on works of history, which often had political implications for the present, and on religious treatises. In this, they shared the public’s taste. Plays and secular poetry occasionally sold well (Shakespeare’s Henry IV, Part 1, was printed seven times in twenty-five years), but they could not compete with publishing blockbusters such as The Plain Man’s Pathway (sixteen editions in twenty-five years), let alone The Psalms in English Meter (published 124 times between 1583 and 1608). Publishers were largely interested in profit margins, and the predominance of devotional texts among the surviving books from the period attests to their greater marketability. The format in which works of literature were usually published is also telling. We normally find plays and poetry in quartos (or octavos), small volumes that had four (or eight) pages printed on each side of a sheet that was then folded twice (or three times) and stitched together with other such folded sheets to form the book. The more imposing folio format (in which the paper was folded only once, at two pages per side of a sheet) tended to be reserved not just for longer works but for those regarded as needing especially respectful treatment. In 1577 Raphael Holinshed's massive history The Chronicles of England, Scotlande, and Irelande appeared in a woodcut-illustrated folio; ten years later, a second edition was published, again in the large format. In contrast, Edmund Spenser's huge poem The Faerie Queene was printed as a quarto both in 1590 and in 1596. A decade after his death, though, as the poet's reputation grew, his epic appeared again (1609), this time as a folio.

Printed books were mainly to be purchased from the bookshops that filled the churchyard of St. Paul's Cathedral. Dissolved chapels—chantries—were taken over by bookshops in the 1540s; church officials leased out their residences near the church's north door to members of the Stationers' Company; and eventually bookstores two stories high and more filled the bays between the cathedral's buttresses. St. Paul's was also the main center of business in the capital. The church itself served as a meeting place and its columns as bulletin boards; publishers would post there, and elsewhere in the city, the title pages of new books as advertisements. Those title pages listed the wholesaler for the work, but customers could have bought popular books too at most of the shops in St. Paul's Yard. The location ensured the trade's connection with the heart of English Protestantism and its values.

It is a mistake, however, to imagine that most texts were printed or that most writers dreamed of print permanence. Poetry in particular frequently circulated in manuscript, copied by reader after reader, often into commonplace books where individual works were categorized by subject rather than author. The texts that have come down to us in printed form often bear an uncertain relation to authorial manuscripts and were frequently published only after their actual authors were dead. That is because the career of professional writer in sixteenth-century England was almost impossible: there was no such thing as author's copyright, no royalties paid to an author when books were sold, and virtually no notion that anyone could make a decent living through the creation of works of literature. Writers sold their manuscripts to the publisher outright, for what now seem like ridiculously low prices, or kept them for private circulation in manuscript, without ever sending them to the press at all.

Elizabethan writers of exalted social standing, like the Earl of Surrey or Sir Philip Sidney, who thought of themselves as courtiers, statesmen, and landowners, did not view writing as a profession but a social (and political) grace—a deeply pleasurable, exalted form of game. Only people of lower rank, such as Samuel Daniel and Michael Drayton, sought careers as writers—or, rather, as civil servants, secretaries, tutors, and clerics; they might take up more or less permanent residence in a noble household or, more casually, offer their literary work to actual or prospective patrons, in the hope of protection, career advancement, or financial reward. Ambitious authors eager to rise from penniless obscurity often looked to the court for notice and encouragement, and sometimes hoped for jobs there too: but their great expectations were not generally met. “A thousand hopes, but all nothing,” wailed John Lyly, alluding to his long wait to be given the exalted office of Master of the Revels, the organizer of royal entertainments, “a hundred promises but yet nothing.”

Financial rewards for writing prose or poetry came mostly in the form of support or gifts from wealthy patrons, who sought to enhance their status and gratify their vanity through the achievements and lavish praises of their clients. Some Elizabethan patrons, though, were well-educated humanists motivated by aesthetic interests, and with them patronage extended beyond financial support to the creation of lively literary and intellectual circles. Poems by Samuel Daniel, as well as prose by Thomas Nashe, bear witness to the sustaining intelligence and sophistication, as well as the generosity, of their benefactors. But the experience of Robert Greene is equally revealing: he had sixteen different patrons for seventeen books, suggesting that he did not find much favor or support from any one of them. Indeed, a practice grew up, among those who printed texts, of writing different dedications to be inserted into particular copies of a book so that an author in need of money could deceive several patrons into thinking that they in particular had been honored by the volume.

In addition to patronage from the court and great families, the city of London and the only universities at the time, Oxford and Cambridge, also had a substantial impact on the period's literature. London was the center of the book trade, and the home of the public theaters. Before Elizabeth's time, the universities were mainly devoted to educating the clergy, and that remained an important part of their function. But in the second half of the century, the sons of the gentry and the aristocracy began going in increasing numbers to the universities and the Inns of Court (law schools), not to take religious orders or to practice law but to prepare for public service or the management of their estates. Other, less affluent students, such as Marlowe and Spenser, attended Oxford or Cambridge on scholarship. A group of graduates, including Thomas Nashe, Robert Greene, and George Peele, enlivened the literary scene in London in the 1590s, but the precarious lives of these so-called university wits testify to the difficulties they encountered in their attempt to survive by their writing skill. The diary of Philip Henslowe, a leading theatrical manager, has entry after entry showing university graduates who were playwrights for his company in prison or in debt or eking out a meagre existence by adding new passages into old plays.

Margaret Roper, Thomas More's eldest child, was educated at home by William Gonnell, who found her so impressive that he suggested she publish a book. More, however, warned that for a woman to publish would be "vain and low." Despite her father's disapproval, Roper did eventually become the first non-royal woman to have one of her translations printed.

Women had no access to grammar schools, the universities, or the Inns of Court, and tended not to have the education, patronage, or income to write or publish work. Occasionally, however, women in great houses were privately educated following a model adopted by Sir Thomas More. He had tried having his daughters schooled in Latin alongside his son as an experiment: the result was that his eldest daughter, Margaret, became not only one of the most learned women in the land, but also one of the first to publish a book (a translation of a Latin work by Erasmus, Precatio Dominica). Female literacy improved in the sixteenth century more generally, aided by Protestantism with its emphasis on reading scripture, and women translators ultimately made a crucial print contribution to the humanist movement—though they had to show their skills obliquely through the way in which they rendered into English texts by men. Often adopting what was called a “modesty topos,” in which they asked to be forgiven for a lack of rhetorical skill (while actually displaying it, of course), women also still seem to have felt obliged, like Anne Dowriche, to apologize for their sex itself: “if anything . . . fits not your liking, remember, I pray, that it is a woman’s doing.”

TUDOR STYLE: ORNAMENT, PLAINNESS, AND WONDER

Renaissance literature is the product of a rhetorical culture whose members were steeped in the arts of persuasion and trained to process complex verbal signals. (The contemporary equivalent would be the ease with which we deal in movies with complex visual signals, effortlessly processing such devices as fade-out, montage, crosscutting, and morphing.) In 1512, Erasmus published a work called De copia that taught its readers how to cultivate “copiousness,” verbal richness, in discourse. The work obligingly provides, as an example, a list of 144 different ways of saying “Thank you for your letter.”

In Renaissance England certain forms or patterns of words known as “figures” (also called “schemes”) were shaped and repeated to confer verbal beauty or heighten expressive power. Figures were usually known by their Greek and Latin names, though in an Elizabethan rhetorical manual, The Arte of English Poesie, George Puttenham made a valiant attempt to give them English equivalents, such as “Hyperbole, or the Overreacher” and “Ironia, or the Dry Mock.” Those who received a grammar school education throughout Europe at almost any point between the Roman Empire and the eighteenth century probably knew by heart the names of up to one hundred such figures, just as they knew by heart their multiplication tables. According to one scholar’s count, William Shakespeare knew and made use of about two hundred.

Lessons from De copia and similar rhetorical guides could make for very wordy texts. Elizabethans had a taste for elaborate ornament in language as in clothing, jewelry, and furniture; and if we are to appreciate their accomplishments, it helps to set aside the modern preference, particularly in prose, for simplicity and directness. When, in one of the age’s most fashionable works of prose fiction, John Lyly wishes to explain that the virtues of his young hero, Euphues, are being offset by his vices, he offers a series of synonymous images: "The freshest colors soonest fade, the teenest [keenest] razor soonest turneth his edge, the finest cloth is soonest eaten with moths." Lyly's multiplication of balanced rhetorical figures sparked a small literary craze known as "Euphuism," which was soon ridiculed by Shakespeare and others for its excesses. Yet such devices were a source of deep-rooted pleasure in rhetorical culture, and most of the greatest Renaissance writers used them to extraordinary effect. Consider, for example, the succession of images in Shakespeare's sonnet 73:

That time of year thou may'st in me behold
When yellow leaves, or none, or few, do hang Upon those boughs which shake against the cold,
Bare ruined choirs, where late the sweet birds sang.
In me thou seest the twilight of such day
As after sunset fadeth in the west;
Which by and by black night doth take away,
Death's second self that seals up all in rest.
In me thou seest the glowing of such fire
That on the ashes of his youth doth lie,
As the deathbed whereon it must expire,
Consumed with that which it was nourished by.
This thou perceiv'st, which makes thy love more strong,
To love that well, which thou must leave ere long.

Here, the perception of decay is carried through a succession of images from winter (or late fall) to twilight to the last glow of a dying fire. Each of these images is sensitively explored, so that, for example, the season is figured by bare boughs that shiver, as if they were human, and then these anthropomorphized tree branches in turn are refigured as the ruined choirs of a church where services were once sung. No sooner is the image of singers in a church choir evoked than these singers are instantaneously transmuted back into the songbirds who, in an earlier season, had sat upon the boughs, while these sweet birds in turn conjure up the poet's own vanished youth. And this nostalgic gaze extends, at least glancingly, to the chancels of the Catholic abbeys reduced to ruins by Protestant iconoclasm and the dissolution of the monasteries. All of this within the first four lines: here and elsewhere Shakespeare, along with other poets of his time, contrives to give the small compass and tight formal constraints of the sonnet—fourteen lines of rhymed iambic pentameter, with a “volta,” or turn, before the final couplet—remarkable emotional intensity, psychological nuance, and imagistic complexity.

Elizabethans were certainly capable of admiring plainness of speech—in King Lear Shakespeare contrasts the severe directness of the virtuous Cordelia to the “glib and oily art” of her wicked sisters—and such poets as George Gascoigne, Thomas Nashe, and, in the early seventeenth century, Ben Jonson, wrote restrained, aphoristic, moralizing lyrics in a plain style whose power depends precisely on the avoidance of figurative verbal games. This power is readily apparent in the wintry sparseness of Nashe’s “A Litany in Time of Plague,” with its grim refrain of “Lord, have mercy on us,” the warning words written on the nailed-shut front doors of those who were dying of the plague:

Wit with his wantonness
Tasteth death’s bitterness;
Hell’s executioner
Hath no ears for to hear
What vain art can reply.
I am sick, I must die.
Lord, have mercy on us!

Here linguistic playfulness—the “wit” beloved by Elizabethan culture—is scorned as an ineffectual “vain art” to which the executioner, death, is utterly indifferent.

Even plain poetry referred to or negotiated with more complex poetry, and all poetry was, writes Puttenham, “more delicate to the ear than prose is, because it is more current and slipper upon the tongue [that is, more flowing and easily pronounced], and withal tunable and melodious, as a kind of Music, and therefore may be termed a musical speech or utterance.” The sixteenth century was an age of superb vocal music. The renowned composers William Byrd, Thomas Morley, and John Dowland, as well as others scarcely less distinguished, wrote a rich profusion of madrigals (part songs for two to eight voices, unaccompanied) and airs (songs for solo voice, generally accompanied by the lute). These works, along with hymns, catches, and other forms of song, enjoyed immense popularity, not only in the royal court, where musical skill was regarded as an important accomplishment, and in aristocratic households, where professional musicians were employed as entertainers, but also in less exalted social circles. Fairgrounds, marketplaces, ale houses, milking sheds—all encouraged group singing of known songs, often with a rousing chorus. Widespread genteel musical literacy is reflected in a splendid array of music for the lute, viol, recorder, harp, and virginal as well as vocal music; popular music is reflected in ballad texts, airs, catches, glees, and rounds—though intriguingly the same music often doubles for both art and popular forms.

Notation Knives. These knives have a pre-meal blessing inscribed on one side and a post-meal grace on the other. As each represents a part for a singer, perfect harmony will only occur when a set of knives is “performed” at the same time. Presumably such knives were sung from at banquets, fusing music and feasting with prayer.

Many sixteenth-century poems were written to be set to music; others were written to already-known tunes. The division between musical lyric and poem was not always clear. In poetry and music, as in gardens, architecture, and dance, Elizabethans had a taste for elaborate, intricate, but perfectly regular designs. They admired form, valued the artist's manifest control of the medium, and took pleasure in the highly patterned surfaces of things. Modern responses to art often show a suspicion of surfaces, impatience with order, the desire to rip away the mask to discover a hidden core: these responses are far less evident in Renaissance aesthetics than is a delight in pattern. Indeed, many writers of the time expressed the faith that the universe itself had in its basic construction the beauty, concord, and harmonious order of a poem or a piece of music. "The world is made by Symmetry and proportion," wrote Thomas Campion, who was both a poet and a composer, "and is in that respect compared to Music, and Music to Poetry." The design of an exquisite work of art is deeply linked in this view to the design of the cosmos.

Such an emphasis on conspicuous pattern might seem to encourage an art as stiff as the starched ruffs that, on special occasions, ladies and gentlemen wore around their necks, but the period's fascination with order came with a profound interest in the movements of the mind and heart. Syntax in the sixteenth century was looser, more flexible than our own, and punctuation less systematic. If the effect is sometimes confusing, it also enabled writers to follow the twists and turns of thought or perception. Consider, for example, Roger Ascham's account, in his book on archery, of a day when he saw the wind blowing the new-fallen snow:

That morning the sun shone bright and clear, the wind was whistling aloft, and sharp according to the time of the year. The snow in the highway lay loose and trodden with horse feet: so as the wind blew, it took the loose snow with it, and made it so slide upon the snow in the field which was hard and crusted by reason of the frost overnight, that thereby I might see very well, the whole nature of the wind as it blew that day. And I had a great delight and pleasure to mark it, which maketh me now far better to remember it. Sometime the wind would be not past two yards broad, and so it would carry the snow as far as I could see. Another time the snow would blow over half the field at once. Sometime the snow would tumble softly, by and by it would fly wonderful fast. And this I perceived also, that the wind goeth by streams and not whole together. . . . And that which was the most marvel of all, at one time two drifts of snow flew, the one of the West into the East, the other out of the North into the East: And I saw two winds by reason of the snow the one cross over the other, as it had been two highways. . . . The more uncertain and deceivable the wind is, the more heed must a wise Archer give to know the guiles [cunning] of it.

What is delightful here is not only the author's happy moment of sharpened perception but his confidence that this moment—a glimpse of baffling complexity and uncertainty—can be captured in the restless succession of sentences and then neatly summed up in the pithy conclusion. (This effect parallels that of the couplet that sums up the complexities of a Shakespearean sonnet.) A similar confidence emanates from Sir Walter Raleigh's deeply melancholy, deeply ironic address to Death at the close of The History of the World, written when he was a prisoner in the Tower of London:

O eloquent, just, and mighty Death! Whom none could advise, thou hast persuaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised; thou hast drawn together all the far-stretched greatness, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with these two narrow words: Hic jacet! [Here lies!]

Death is triumphant here, but so is Raleigh's eloquent, just, and mighty language.

The sense of wonder in both of these prose passages—as if the world were being seen clearly and distinctly for the first time—characterizes much of the period’s poetry as well. The mood need not always be solemn. For example, one can sense laughter rippling just below the surface of Marlowe’s admiring description of the beautiful maiden Hero’s boots:

Buskins of shells all silvered used she,
And branched with blushing coral to the knee,
Where sparrows perched, of hollow pearl and gold,
Such as the world would wonder to behold;
Those with sweet water oft her handmaid fills;
Which, as she went, would chirrup through the bills.

Seashells were beloved by Renaissance collectors because their intricate designs, functionally inexplicable, seemed the work of an ingenious, infinitely playful craftsman. Typically, the shells did not simply stand by themselves in cabinets but were gilded or silvered and then turned into other objects: cups, miniature ships, or, in Marlowe’s fantasy, boots further decorated with coral and mechanical sparrows made of precious materials and designed, as he puts it deliciously, to “chirrup.” The poet knows perfectly well that the boots would be implausible footwear in the real world, but he invites us into an imaginary world in which the heroine’s costume includes a skirt “whereon was many a stain, / Made with the blood of wretched lovers slain” and a veil of “artificial flowers and leaves, / Whose workmanship both man and beast deceives.” The veil reflects an admiration for an art of successful imitation—bees are said to look in vain for honey amid the artificial flowers—but it is cunning illusion rather than realism that excites Marlowe’s wonder. Renaissance poetry is interested not in reality or accuracy but in the magical power of exquisite workmanship to draw its readers into fabricated worlds.

In his Defense of Poesy, the most important work of literary criticism in sixteenth-century England, Sidney claims that this magical power is also a moral power. All other arts, he argues, are constrained by fallen, imperfect nature, but the poet alone is free to range “within the zodiac of his own wit” and create a second nature, superior to the one we are condemned to inhabit: nature’s “world is brazen, the poets only deliver a golden.” The poet’s golden world in this account is not an escapist fantasy: it is a model to be emulated in actual life. It is difficult to say, of course, how seriously this project of realization was taken—though Sidney’s own battlefield death (he is said, when mortally wounded, to have given his water to a fellow soldier, saying, “Thy necessity is yet greater than mine”)—suggest that he was maintaining to the end the golden ideal of Protestant chivalry. His sister Mary Sidney Herbert advised Queen Elizabeth to model herself on poetry; if the queen could “sing what God doth”—in particular, the psalms that the Sidneys had translated—she would be enabled to “do what men may sing,” that is, perform the triumphant acts that people write poetry about. Other Elizabethan poets too believed that poetry could mark the way to a more virtuous and fulfilled existence. And not only mark the way: poetry, Sidney, his sister, and others argue, has a unique persuasive force that impels readers toward the good they glimpse in its ravishing lines.

This force, attributed to the energy and vividness of figurative language, made poetry a fitting instrument for such high-minded enterprises as moral exhortation, prayer, and praise; for such uplifting narratives as the legends of religious and national heroes and also for such verbal actions as cursing, lamenting, flattering, and seducing. Conventions in the period defined the major literary modes (or “kinds,” as Sidney terms them): pastoral, heroic, lyric, satiric, elegiac, tragic, and comic. They helped shape subject matter, attitude, tone, and values, and in some cases—sonnet, verse epistle, epigram, funeral elegy, and masque, to name a few—they also governed formal structure, meter, style, length, and occasion. We can glimpse some of the ways in which these literary codes worked by looking briefly at two that are, for modern readers, among the least familiar: pastoral and heroic.

In the pastoral mode, the idyllic fictional world is inhabited by shepherds and shepherdesses, often with Greek names, who tend their flocks, fall in love, and engage in friendly singing contests. The mode celebrated leisure, humility, and contentment, exalting the country life over the city and its business, the military camp and its violence, the court and its burdens of rule. Pastoral songs commonly expressed the joys of the shepherd's life or his disappointment in love. Pastoral dialogues between shepherds might conceal serious, satiric comment on abuses in the great world under the guise of homely, local concerns. There were pastoral funeral elegies, pastoral dramas, pastoral prose fictions called "romances," and even pastoral episodes within epics. The most famous pastoral poem of the period is a song (it was even published as a broadsheet ballad), Marlowe's "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love," but the shepherd who woos his potential love with promises of gold buckles, coral clasps, and amber studs serves to remind us that the mode is only superficially of the country and is really sophisticated and urban.

With its rustic characters, simple concerns, and modest scope, the pastoral mode was regarded as situated at the opposite extreme from the heroic, with its values of honor, martial courage, loyalty, leadership, and endurance, as well as its glorification of a nation or people. The chief genre that employed the heroic was the epic: typically a long, ambitious poem in the high style, based on a story from the nation's distant past and imitating Homer and Virgil in structure and motifs. Renaissance poets throughout Europe undertook to honor their nations and their vernacular languages by writing this most prestigious kind of poetry. In sixteenth-century England the major success in heroic poetry is Spenser's Faerie Queene. Yet the success of The Faerie Queene owes much to the fact that the poem is a generic hybrid, in which the conventions of classical epic mingle with those of romance, medieval allegory, pastoral, satire, mythological narrative, comedy, philosophical meditation, and many others in a strange, wonderful blend. The spectacular mixing of genres in Spenser's poem is only an extreme instance of a general Elizabethan indifference to the generic purity admired by writers on the Continent. English poets tended to approach the different genres in the spirit of Sidney's inclusivism: "if severed they be good, the conjunction cannot be hurtful."

THE ELIZABETHAN THEATER

While Sidney welcomed the experimental intertwining of genres in his own Arcadia, there was one place where he found it absurd: the theater. He condemned the conjunction of high and low characters in “mongrel” tragicomedies that mingled “kings and clowns.” Moreover, he had the belief, whose origin was attributed to Aristotle, that plays should keep to what were called the three “dramatic unities” of action (plays should have one principal action), time (the events in plays should happen within a day), and place (plays should be set in one location). For Sidney, then, the action on the bare stage “where you shall have Asia of the one side and Afric of the other” violated the laws of time and place. “Now you shall have three ladies walk to gather flowers,” he writes in The Defense of Poesy, “and then we must believe the stage to be a garden. By and by we hear news of shipwreck in the same place: and then we are to blame if we accept it not for a rock.” The irony is that this mocking account, written probably in 1579, anticipates by a few years the stupendous achievements of Marlowe and Shakespeare, whose plays joyously break every rule that Sidney thought it essential to observe.

A permanent, freestanding public theater in England dates only from Shakespeare’s own lifetime. A London playhouse, the Red Lion, is first mentioned in 1567, and James Burbage’s round playhouse, The Theatre, was built in 1576. Before the construction of these theaters, people in late medieval England had mounted elaborate cycles of plays (sometimes called “mystery plays”) in the towns and villages of the land, depicting the great biblical stories, from the creation of the world to Christ’s Passion and its miraculous aftermath. Many of these plays have been lost, but among those that survive are several magnificent and complex works of art. At once civic and religious festivals, the cycles were performed into the reign of Elizabeth, but their close links to popular Catholic piety led Protestant authorities in the later sixteenth century to suppress them.

Early English theater was not restricted to these annual festivals. Performers acted in town halls and the halls of guilds and aristocratic households, on scaffolds erected in town squares and marketplaces, on pageant wagons in the streets, and in innyards. By the fifteenth century, and probably earlier, there were organized companies of players traveling under noble patronage. Such companies earned a precarious living providing amusement, while enhancing the prestige of the patron whose livery they wore and whose protection they enjoyed. (Actors without a patron or another, ordinary trade risked being classified as vagabonds and whipped or branded.) When theatre was professionalized in the latter half of the sixteenth century, the acting companies still attached themselves to a nobleman and remained technically servants. The company for which Christopher Marlowe wrote was the Lord Admiral's Men; Shakespeare wrote for the Lord Chamberlain's Men, and so on. The only exception was children's companies, which arose from boy choirs and consisted almost entirely of pre-adolescent boys; they were typically named after their place of performance, like the Children of Paul's and the Blackfriars' Children.

Before the construction of the public theaters, the playing companies often performed short plays called "interludes" that were, in effect, staged dialogues on religious, moral, and political themes. Henry Medwall's Fulgens and Lucrece (ca. 1490–1501), for example, pits a wealthy but dissolute nobleman against a virtuous public servant of humble origins, while John Heywood's The Play of the Weather (ca. 1525–33) stages a debate among social rivals, including a gentleman, a merchant, a forest ranger, and two millers. The structure of such plays reflects the training in argumentation that students received in Tudor schools and, in particular, the sustained practice in examining both sides of a difficult question. Some of Shakespeare's amazing ability to look at critical issues from multiple perspectives may be traced back to this practice and the dramatic interludes it helped inspire.

Another major form of theater that flourished in England in the fifteenth century and continued into the sixteenth was the morality play, a dramatization of the spiritual struggle of the Christian soul. As

Everyman (included in Volume A, "The Middle Ages") demonstrates, these dramas derived their power from the poignancy and terror of an individual's encounter with death. Often this somber power was supplemented by the extraordinary comic vitality of the evil character, or Vice.

If such plays sound more than a bit like sermons, it is because they were. The Church was a profoundly different institution from the theater, but its professionals shared some of the same rhetorical skills. It would be grossly misleading to regard churchgoing and playgoing as comparable entertainments, but clerical attacks on the theater sometimes make it sound as if ministers thought themselves to be in direct competition with professional players. The players, for their part, were generally too discreet to present themselves in a similar light, yet they almost certainly understood their craft as relating to sermons, with an uneasy blend of emulation and rivalry. When, in 1610, the theater manager Philip Rosseter was reported to have declared that plays were as good as sermons, he was summoned before the bishop of London to recant; but Rosseter had said no more than what many players must have privately thought.

The “Long View” of London, 1647, by Wenceslaus Hollar. In this detail from Hollar’s engraving of London, one can glimpse, on the south bank of the Thames, the Globe Theater and an arena for bearbaiting. The labels were accidentally transposed in the original: the Globe is the round structure on the left.

By the later sixteenth century, many churchmen, particularly those with Puritan leanings, were steadfastly opposed to the theater, but some early Protestant Reformers, such as John Bale, tried their hand at writing plays. Thomas Norton, who with a fellow lawyer, Thomas Sackville, wrote the first English tragedy in blank verse, Gorboduc, or Ferrex and Porrex (1561), was also a translator of the great Reformer John Calvin. There is no evidence that Norton felt a tension between his religious convictions and his theatrical interests, nor was his play a private exercise. The five-act tragedy, a grim vision of faction-driven Britain descending into civil war, was performed at the Inner Temple (one of London's law schools) and subsequently acted before the queen.

Gorboduc was closely modeled on the works of the Roman playwright Seneca, and Senecan influence—including violent plots, resounding rhetorical speeches, and ghosts thirsting for blood—remained pervasive in the Elizabethan theater, giving rise to the subgenre we now call revenge tragedy (the term itself is modern), in which a wronged protagonist plots and executes revenge, destroying himself or herself in the process. An early, highly influential example is Thomas Kyd's Spanish Tragedy (1592); and, despite its unprecedented psychological complexity, Shakespeare's Hamlet is another instance. A related but distinct kind is the villain tragedy, in which the protagonist is blatantly evil: in his Poetics, Aristotle had advised against attempting to use a wicked person as the hero of a tragedy, but Shakespeare's Richard III and Macbeth amply justify the general English indifference to classical rules. Some Elizabethan tragedies, such as Arden of Feversham (whose author is unknown), are concerned not with the fall of great men but with domestic violence; others, such as Christopher Marlowe's Tamburlaine, are concerned with "overreachers," larger-than-life heroes who challenge the limits of human possibility. Certain tragedies in the period, such as Richard III, intersect with another Elizabethan genre, the history play, in which dramatists staged the great events, most often conspiracies, rebellions, and wars, of the nation. Not all of the events commemorated in history plays were tragic, but they tend to circle around the act that epitomized what for this period was the ultimate challenge to authority: the killing of a king. When the English cut off the head of their king in 1649, they were performing a deed that they had been rehearsing, literally, for most of a century.

English schoolboys would read and occasionally perform comedies by the great Roman playwrights Plautus and Terence. Shortly before midcentury, a schoolmaster, Nicholas Udall, used these as a model for a comedy in English, Ralph Roister Doister. At about the same time, another comedy, Gammar Gurton's Needle, which put vivid, native English material into classical form, was amusing the students at Cambridge; a song from that play is included in this volume. From the classical models English playwrights derived some elements of structure and content: plots based on intrigue, division into scenes, and type characters such as the rascally servant and the miles gloriosus (cowardly braggart soldier). The latter type appears in Ralph Roister Doister and is a remote ancestor of Shakespeare's Sir John Falstaff in the two parts of Henry IV and The Merry Wives of Windsor. But early plays such as Gorboduc and Ralph Roister Doister are, in terms of both dramatic structure and style, comparatively crude.

Around 1590, when most commercial theater had come to be concentrated in London, an extraordinary change overcame the English drama, transforming it almost overnight into a vehicle for unparalleled poetic and dramatic expression. Many factors contributed to this transformation, but probably the chief was the eruption onto the scene of Christopher Marlowe. Here are the lines in Marlowe's Doctor Faustus (ca. 1592–93) with which Faustus greets the conjured figure of the most beautiful woman who has ever lived, Helen of Troy:

Was this the face that launched a thousand ships,
And burnt the topless towers of Ilium?
Sweet Helen, make me immortal with a kiss:
Her lips sucks forth my soul, see where it flies!
Come Helen, come, give me my soul again.
Here will I dwell, for heaven be in these lips,
And all is dross that is not Helena! (scene 12, lines 81–87)

Marlowe had mastered a new theatrical language—a superb unrhymed iambic pentameter, or blank verse.

Playacting, whether of tragedies, comedies, or any of the other Elizabethan genres, took its place alongside other forms of public expression and entertainment as well. Perhaps the most important, from the perspective of the theater, were music and dance, because these surrounded the theaters—ballad singers/sellers were situated directly outside—and were repeatedly incorporated into plays. Moreover, virtually all plays in the period, including Shakespeare's, apparently ended with a jig—a ballad in the form of a dance and song, often comic.

Plays, music, and dancing were by no means the only shows in town. There were jousts, tournaments, royal entries, religious processions, pageants in honor of newly installed civic officials or ambassadors arriving from abroad; wedding masques, court masques, and costumed entertainments known as disguisings or mummings; exhibitions of swordsmanship, mountebanks, folk healers, storytellers, magic shows; bearbaiting, bullbaiting, cockfighting, and other blood sports. For several years, Elizabethan Londoners were delighted by a trained animal—Banks's Horse—that could, it was thought, do arithmetic, answer questions, and dance a brisk galliard. And there was always the grim but compelling spectacle of public shaming, mutilation, and execution.

Most English towns had stocks and whipping posts. Drunks, fraudulent merchants, adulterers, and quarrelers could be placed in carts or mounted backward on asses and paraded through the streets for crowds to jeer and throw refuse at. Women accused of being scolds could be publicly muzzled by an iron device called a branks or tied to a "cucking stool" and dunked in the river. Convicted criminals could have their ears cut off, their noses slit, their bodies branded. Ben Jonson the playwright, for instance, was branded with a "T" on his left thumb, for "Tyburn": the place where he might otherwise have been executed for killing an actor in a duel. Public beheadings and hangings were common. In the worst cases, felons were sentenced to be "hanged by the neck, and being alive cut down, and your privy members to be cut off, and your bowels to be taken out of your belly and there burned, you being alive." In the B text of Doctor Faustus, Faustus's limbs are, after his death, "torn asunder" and scattered over the stage, so the audience witnessed the theatrical equivalent of the execution of criminals and traitors that they could have also watched in the flesh, as it were, nearby.

Doctor Faustus was performed by the Lord Admiral's Men at the Rose Playhouse, one of four major public playhouses that by the mid-1590s were feverishly competing for crowds of spectators. These playhouses (including Shakespeare's famous Globe, owned by Shakespeare's company, which opened in 1599) each accommodated some two thousand spectators and generally followed the same design: they were round in shape, with an unroofed yard in the center around which stood the people who paid least, the "groundlings" (apprentices, servants, and others of the lower classes) and three rising tiers around the yard for men and women who chose to pay a higher price for places to sit with a roof over their heads. A large platform stage thrust out into the yard, surrounded on three sides by spectators (see the conjectural drawing of an Elizabethan playhouse in the appendixes to this volume). These financially risky ventures relied on admission charges—it was an innovation of this period to have money advanced in the expectation of pleasure rather than offered afterward as a reward—and counted on habitual playgoing.

Scold's Bridge, or Branks. First recorded in Scotland, the scold's bridge was a device to humiliate and torture women who were regarded as "riotous" or "troublesome" in speech. The metal gag was designed to inflict maximum pain if the victim attempted to speak. In England, unruly women were also humiliated by being dragged through the streets in chairs known as "cucking stools," to be dunked.

The public playhouses were all located in “liberties”: generally areas outside the city walls or opposite the city on the other side of the Thames; they were thus outside the legal jurisdiction of the city of London, which was generally hostile to dramatic spectacles. Eventually, expensive indoor theaters, lit by candles and patronized by a more select audience, were built; they too were in “liberties,” though often inside the city itself. The Blackfriars Playhouse, for instance—occupied by a boy company and later, when rebuilt nearby, by the King’s Men, Shakespeare’s company—was constructed inside a former monastery and retained its exemption from London’s puritanical rules.

About forty plays might be put on in a season, and typically a different play was performed every day (there were no play runs); thus although popular plays were regularly repeated, a steady supply of new plays was also essential. The fact that many plays had to be learned in a short period of time affected rehearsal, performance, and the way plays were written in the first place. Actors learned their roles not from full copies of plays but from what were called “parts” (they were just part of the play), consisting of the lines that they would speak and a cue of, generally, the one to three words preceding their speeches. Given the time constraints under which they performed, actors focused on learning their parts by heart, but did not always have a full grasp of the whole of the play. Playwrights who were actors, like Shakespeare, wrote with “parts” in mind, and parts were often an aspect of their creative writing and thinking too.

The response to what we now regard as one of the undisputed glories of the age was often hostility. But why? One answer, curiously enough, is traffic: plays drew large audiences, and nearby residents objected to the crowds, the noise, and the crush of carriages. Other, more serious concerns were public health and crime. It was thought that many diseases, including the dreaded bubonic plague, were spread by noxious odors, and the packed playhouses were obvious breeding grounds for infection. (Patrons often tried to protect themselves by sniffing nosegays or stuffing cloves in their nostrils.) And the large crowds drew pickpockets, cutpurses, and other scoundrels. On one memorable afternoon, recalls Shakespeare’s clown William Kemp, a cutpurse was caught in the act and tied for the duration of the play to one of the posts that held up the canopy above the stage. The theater was, moreover, a well-known haunt of prostitutes and, it was alleged, a place where innocent maids were seduced and respectable matrons corrupted or lured to the taverns, disreputable inns, and brothels that were close at hand.

There were other charges as well. Plays were performed in the afternoon and therefore drew people, especially the young, away from their work. They were schools of idleness, luring apprentices from their trades, law students from their studies, housewives from their kitchens, and potentially pious souls from the sober meditations to which they might otherwise devote themselves. Moralists warned that the theaters were nests of sedition, and religious polemicists, especially Puritans, obsessively focusing on the use of boy actors to play the female parts, charged that theatrical transvestism was ungodly—the Bible held that dressing to deceive as to one's sex was an "abomination"—and that, additionally, it excited illicit sexual desires, both heterosexual and homosexual.

But the playing companies had powerful allies. Queen Elizabeth kept many companies alive by agreeing to the notion that public performance was a necessary "rehearsal" for private performance in front of her at court; a surprisingly large number of women as well as men with money became playhouse investors and shareholders; and people of all classes attended theaters. One theater historian has estimated that between the late 1560s and 1642, when the playhouses were shut down by the English Civil War, well over fifty million visits were paid to the London theater, an astonishing figure for a city that had, by our standards, a very modest population of 220,000 (it is now over 8 million). Plays were performed without the act breaks and intermissions to which we are accustomed; there was little scenery—handheld props often had to substitute (jingling keys for a jailor and hence a jail; a spade for a gravedigger and hence a churchyard)—but costumes were usually costly and elaborate, often hand-me-downs from the nobility or court. The players formed what would now be called repertory companies—that is, they filled the roles of each play from members of their own group, not employing outsiders beyond “hirelings” who were paid by the day to take on tiny roles. Sometimes principal actors were, like Shakespeare, shareholders in the profits of the company. An actor who was a freeman of the city—a status acquired by completing an apprenticeship in one of the guilds—could take on apprentices, so boys were effectively apprenticed to actors. As a result, boys apprenticed to a livery company like the haberdashers or the goldsmiths might actually be taught acting. They took the women’s parts in plays, at least until their voices changed and sometimes afterwards.

The plays performed might be bought for the company from freelance writers; or, as in Shakespeare’s company, the group might include an actor-playwright who could supply it with some (though by no means all) of its plays. The script remained the property of the company, but a popular play was eagerly sought by readers; and the companies, which sometimes tried to keep their plays from appearing in print, at other times seem to have released them to the press, particularly if a corrupt version had come out already. A market developed for playbooks in print, though major libraries remained wary of accepting them: Thomas Bodley, planning which books should be accepted for Oxford’s new great library, warned against such “riff-raffs” and “baggage books” as almanacs and plays. The status of plays and playwrights started to rise, however, as a result of the fact that people could read and analyze the texts they had seen performed. As an unsigned note to Ben Jonson’s Every Man Out of His Humour put it in 1600, publishing a play gave readers “leave and leisure to judge with distinction.” We have been doing so ever since.

SURPRISED BY TIME

All of the ways we cut up time into units are inevitably distortions. The dividing line between centuries was not, as far as we can tell, a highly significant one for people in the Renaissance, and many of the most important literary careers cross into the seventeenth century without a self-conscious moment of reflection. But virtually everyone must have been aware, by the end of the 1590s, that the long reign of Queen Elizabeth was nearing its end, and this impending closure occasioned considerable anxiety. Childless, the last of her line, Elizabeth had steadfastly refused to name a successor. She continued to make brilliant speeches, to receive the extravagant compliments of her flatterers, and to exercise her authority—in 1601, she had her favorite, the headstrong Earl of Essex, executed for attempting to raise an insurrection. But, as her seventieth birthday approached, she was clearly, as Raleigh put it, “a lady surprised by time.” She suffered from bouts of ill health and melancholy; her godson Sir John Harington was dismayed to see her pacing through the rooms of her palace, striking at the tapestries with a sword. Her more astute advisers—among them Lord Burghley’s son, Sir Robert Cecil, who had succeeded his father as her principal councillor—secretly entered into correspondence with the likeliest claimant to the throne, James VI of Scotland. Though the English queen had executed his Catholic mother, Mary, Queen of Scots, the Protestant James had continued to exchange polite letters with Elizabeth. It was at least plausible, as officially claimed, that in her dying breath, on March 24, 1603, Elizabeth designated James as her successor. A jittery nation that had feared a possible civil war at her death lit bonfires to welcome its new king. But in just a very few years, the English began to express nostalgia for the rule of “Good Queen Bess” and to look back on her reign as a magnificent high point in the history and culture of their nation.

JOHN SKELTON

ca. 1460–1529

John Skelton was not a tame poet. There was something wild about him that continues to provoke, baffle, and fascinate readers. It is difficult to fit the varied pieces of his life together: gifted rhetorician, translator, Latin tutor to the young prince who became Henry VIII, disgruntled courtier, political pamphleteer, visionary, biting satirist, and ordained priest. He was also the major English poet of the first quarter of the sixteenth century, with the title of poet laureate from both Oxford and Cambridge. His poetic achievement, remarkable though it is, is equally difficult to place; as C. S. Lewis observes, Skelton had “no real predecessors and no important disciples” in the history of English verse. His poetry draws, to be sure, on a long tradition of medieval anticlerical satire and carnivalesque parody, but Skelton brings to his mature works a fresh, often extremely eccentric voice.

His early works were more routinely conventional—ornate compliments, dutiful elegies, occasional verses, and the like—but in a satire written at the end of the fifteenth century, The Bowge of Court, Skelton gave unusually powerful expression to the anxiety of living in the dangerous, viciously competitive precincts of royal power. (The poem’s main character is called “Dread.”) A few years later, whether self-exiled or sent away by his enemies, Skelton was living far from the court: about 1503 he became the rector of the parish church at Diss, in Norfolk, where he remained for some eight years. By 1512 he had returned to court, having been appointed orator regius, or “the king’s orator.” He moved to a house in the sanctuary of Westminster Abbey in 1518 and shortly thereafter, in a series of satires including Speak, Parrot; Colin Clout; and Why Come Ye Not to Court? (1521–22), began vituperative attacks on Cardinal Wolsey, the great prelate-statesman. Wolsey had Skelton briefly imprisoned but released him and promptly hired his services for himself.

Skelton’s poems gain their most startling effects by mixing high and low styles and by playing bawdy and scatological verbal games with some of his culture’s most respected and authoritative texts: the ancient classics, the poetry of Chaucer, the canonical works of logic and rhetoric taught at Oxford and Cambridge, and even the Catholic liturgy. The latter games were not necessarily sacrilegious—the Catholic Church, before the challenge of the Reformation, was capable of tolerating a wide range of expression—but they seem deliberately risk-taking, provocative, and obstreperous, an impression heightened by the way they are written. In the satires, Skelton rejects the ornate rhetorical devices and grandiloquent language that characterized his period’s most ambitious poetry; he writes in short rhymed lines, having from two to five beats, and the lines can keep on rhyming helter-skelter until the resources of the language give out. To many of his poems, with their aggressive and restless energies, this strange verse form is singularly appropriate. “The Tunning of Elinour Rummyng,” for example, is a wonderfully clattering, apparently disordered portrait of an alewife, and the “skeltonics,” as this way of writing has come to be called, contribute to the effect of disorder. The voice of the narrator of the satires has a breathless urgency that was much admired by twentieth-century poets, while to contemporary ears its attention to detail, madcap rhymes, and brash tone are strikingly reminiscent of rap.

The English Reformation, which was set in motion shortly after Skelton’s death, would drastically alter the context in which his work was received. English Protestants later in the century had trouble knowing what to make of the “rude railing rhymers,” as the Elizabethan critic George Puttenham called Skelton. On the one hand, his satires of Cardinal Wolsey made him ripe for inclusion (with William Langland and others) in the honor roll of supposedly proto-Protestant poets. Yet on the other hand, as a foul-mouthed and frivolous priest, Skelton could serve equally well as an emblem of the alleged corruption of the Catholic clergy. He also became associated with various tales and jests that seemed nostalgically to recall the innocence and "merriment" of pre-Reformation England. (In one of these, Skelton proudly ascends the pulpit to show off his naked illegitimate baby to his astonished parishioners.) For English society, as for English poetry, Skelton quickly came to represent the path not taken.

"By God, ye be a pretty pode,<sup>o</sup>
And I love you an whole cartload."
Straw, James Foder, ye play the fode,<sup>o</sup>
10      I am no hackney<sup>o</sup> for your rod:<sup>o</sup>
Go watch a bull, your back is broad!
Gup, Christian Clout, gup, Jack of the Vale!
With Mannerly Margery milk and ale.

Ywis<sup>o</sup> ye deal uncourteously;
15      What, would ye frumple<sup>o</sup> me? now fie!
"What, and ye shall not be my pigsny?"<sup>6</sup>
By Christ, ye shall not, no hardily:
I will not be japed<sup>o</sup> bodily!
20      Gup, Christian Clout, gup, Jack of the Vale!
With Mannerly Margery milk and ale.

"Walk forth your way, ye cost me naught;
Now have I found that<sup>o</sup> I have sought:
The best cheap flesh that ever I bought."
Yet, for his love that hath all wrought,
25      Wed me, or else I die for thought.<sup>o</sup>
Gup, Christian Clout, your breath is stale!

With Mannerly Margery milk and ale!
Gup, Christian Clout, gup, Jack of the Vale!

With lullay, lullay, like a child,
Thou sleepest too long, thou art beguiled.°
"My darling dear, my daisy flower,
Let me," quod° he, "lie in your lap."
"Lie still," quod she, "my paramour,° 5 Lie still, hardily,° and take a nap."
His head was heavy, such was his hap,°
All drowsy dreaming, drowned in sleep,
That of his love he took no keep.°
With hey lullay, lullay, like a child,
10 Thou sleepest too long, thou art beguiled.

With ba, ba, ba! and bas,<sup>1</sup> bas, bas!
She cherished him, both cheek and chin,
That he wist° never where he was;
He had forgotten all deadly sin.
15 He wanted wit<sup>2</sup> her love to win,
He trusted her payment and lost all his prey;
She left him sleeping and stale° away,
With hey lullay, lullay, like a child,
20 Thou sleepest too long, thou art beguiled.

The rivers rowth,° the waters wan,
She sparèd not to wet her feet;
She waded over, she found a man
That halsèd° her heartily and kissed her sweet—
Thus after her cold she caught a heat.
25 "My lief,"° she said, "routeth° in his bed;
Ywis° he hath an heavy head."
With hey lullay, lullay, like a child,

From The Tunning of Elinour Rumming*<sup>1</sup>

Secundus Passus*<sup>2</sup>

Some have no money
That thither comey,
For their ale to pay;
That is a shrewd array!°
Elinour sweared, "Nay,
5 Ye shall not bear away
My ale for nought,
By Him that me bought."°
With, "Hey, dog, hey,
Have these hogs away!"
10 With, "Get me a staff,
The swine eat my draff!°
Strike the hogs with a club,
They have drunk up my swilling-tub!"°
For, be there never so much prese,°
15 These swine go to the high dese;<sup>3</sup>
The sow with her pigs;
The boar his tail wrigs,°
His rump also he frigs°
Against the high bench!
20 With, "Fo, there is a stench!
Gather up, thou wench;
Seest thou not what is fall?°
Take up dirt° and all,
And bear out of the hall:
25 God give it ill preving°
Cleanly as evil cheving!"°
But let us turn plain

There<sup>o</sup> we left<sup>o</sup> again.
For as ill a patch<sup>o</sup> as that 30 The hens run in the mash-fat;<sup>o</sup>
For they go to roost
Straight over the ale-joust,<sup>o</sup>
And dung, when it comes,
In the ale tuns.<sup>o</sup>
35 Then Elinour taketh
The mash-bowl, and shaketh
The hens' dung away,
And skommeth<sup>o</sup> it in a tray
Whereas the yeast is,
40 With her mangy fistis,<sup>o</sup>
And sometime she blens
The dung of her hens
And the ale together;
And saith, "Gossip,<sup>o</sup> come hither,
45 This ale shall be thicker,
And flower<sup>o</sup> the more quicker;
For I may tell you,
I learned it of a Jew,
When I began to brew,
50 And I have found it true;
Drink now while it is new;
And ye may it brook,<sup>4</sup>
It shall make you look
Younger than ye be,
55 Years two or three,
For ye may prove it by me.
Behold," she said, "and see
How bright I am of ble!<sup>o</sup>
Ich<sup>o</sup> am not cast away,
60 That can my husband say,
When we kiss and play
In lust and in liking;

He calleth me his whiting,<sup>5</sup>
 His mulling and his miting,
 65 His nobs<sup>o</sup> and his cony,<sup>o</sup>
 His sweeting and his honey,
 With, 'Bas,<sup>o</sup> my pretty bonny,
 Thou art worth good<sup>o</sup> and money!
 Thus make I my falyre fonny,<sup>o</sup>
 70 Till that he dream and dronny,<sup>o</sup>
 For after all our sport,
 Then will he rout<sup>o</sup> and snort;
 Then sweetly together we lie
 As two pigs in a sty."
 75 To cease meseemeth best,
 And of this tale to rest,
 And for to leave this letter,<sup>o</sup>
 Because it is no better,
 And because it is no sweeter;
 80 We will no farther rhyme
 Of it at this time,
 But we will turn plain
 Where we left again.<sup>6</sup>

SIR THOMAS MORE

1478–1535

Sir Thomas More, a brilliant, compelling, and disturbing figure, has been the hero of people who hated each other: the Catholic Church, Communists, and liberals. Each of these groups has also been deeply troubled by aspects of More's life and writings: the Catholic bishops of sixteenth-century Spain and Portugal placed Utopia on their list of banned prohibited books; Karl Marx reserved his most bitter scorn for impractical socialists he branded "utopian"; and liberals have noticed uneasily that More embraced the idea of the forced labor camp. Robert Bolt's play (and film) A Man for All Seasons celebrates More for his integrity and humanity, while Hilary Mantel's novels Wolf Hall and Bring Up the Bodies depict him as a dangerous, wily fanatic.

Born in London, More was the son of a prominent lawyer. As a youth he served as a page in the grand household of the archbishop of Canterbury, John Morton, who was also King Henry VII's lord chancellor. At Christmastime, when plays were performed at the archbishop's palace, the boy would join in and improvise a part for himself. This early talent for improvisation characterized More throughout his life, as did a lingering sense that he was never quite at home in any of the parts he played. (In the famous portrait of More by Hans Holbein the Younger—included in the color insert in this volume—More may well have been wearing a hair shirt, designed to lacerate his skin, under his rich robe of office.)

After studying at Oxford, More was trained in the law, but he was torn between law as a career, with its promise of wealth and access to power, and a life of religious devotion. He lived, for a while, as a layman among the ascetic monks in London's Charterhouse; but deciding that he wanted to marry and have a family, he turned toward a career in public affairs. Still, amid his busy engagements in law, diplomacy, and government, More constantly reserved some part of himself for other realms. One of those realms was his growing family, to whom he was a devoted and loving father, though he complained to a friend that it took him away from the life of the mind. Shortly after the completion of his law studies, he gave a series of public lectures on Saint Augustine's monumental work The City of God, whose religious vision continued to fascinate him until his death. He also had a passion for ancient literature, the Greek and Latin classics that lay at the heart of the cultural movement known as Renaissance humanism. He shared this passion with his close friend Desiderius Erasmus of Rotterdam (ca. 1466–1536), the greatest humanist scholar of the Northern Renaissance.

Erasmus and More also shared an ardent Christian piety, a suspicion of the philosophical distinctions drawn by generations of scholastic theologians, a delight in rhetoric, and a lively interest in experimental, unsettling wit. For Erasmus this interest bore fruit in his most enduring work, Moriae Encomium—whose punning title meant both In Praise of More and In Praise of Folly (1511)—which he completed as a guest in More's London house and dedicated to him. More's love of playful, subversive wit culminated in his book Utopia, which he began in 1515 while in the Netherlands on a diplomatic mission for Henry VIII and finished the next year. Both works, written in Latin and quickly circulated among humanists throughout Europe, daringly question the period's most cherished assumptions.

Utopia follows Plato's Republic in proposing a radically communal society, but it also reflects more contemporary influences: communities of monks, which forbade private property and required everyone to labor; emerging market societies, with their emphasis on education and social mobility and their dislike of inherited privilege and the old warrior aristocracy; the outcries of peasant rebels demanding a more just distribution of wealth; and, explicitly, Amerigo Vespucci's published accounts of his voyages to the newly encountered lands across the Atlantic Ocean. Those voyages revealed countries organized on principles utterly unlike those that governed European societies, and seemingly free of the inequality, economic exploitation, dynastic squabbles, and legal trickery that More observed everywhere around him.

The lands that the Europeans called "America," in honor of Vespucci, had entirely changed the view of the world. Vespucci's letters, part factual, part wild fantasy, helped More imagine an alternative to the familiar social and political order. Book II of Utopia (the part of the work More composed first) describes in detail the laws and customs of an imagined country that bears some striking physical resemblances to England. But, in other ways, how unlike England it is! The abolition of money and private property has prevented any attachment to goods and status, and the hated ruling classes—nobles, lawyers, idle priests, rapacious soldiers—have been eliminated. In Utopia, a well-ordered political democracy, education is free and universal. Instead of the misery of oppressed peasants, there are prosperous collective farms. Instead of stench and suffering in crowded, crooked streets, there are gleaming, rational cities, with free hospitals and child care. Since everyone works, no one is overburdened; and there is ample time for all citizens to pursue the arts of peace and the pleasures of the mind and the body.

The picture of England in Book I of Utopia—beggars in the streets, convicted small-time thieves hanging from the gallows, hungry farmers displaced from lands fenced off for more profitable sheep rearing, cynical flatterers encouraging the king to embark on imperialistic wars—makes the sharpest contrast imaginable with the ordered and peaceable state described in Book II. Yet Book I is not directly a call for revolutionary social reform. It is a dialogue on the question of whether intellectuals should involve themselves in politics. The speakers are a traveler named Raphael Hythloday and someone named Thomas More, who closely resembles (but perhaps should not be identified precisely with) the real More. More argues that Hythloday should offer his services as a councillor to one of the great monarchs of Europe. Hythloday replies that kings, who want only flattery from their councillors, would never dream of adopting the policies that might lead to a good society, such as the abandonment of warfare and the abolition of private property. In the dialogue, Hythloday is the detached idealist, unwilling to dirty his hands in a pointless cause; More is the practical one, prepared to compromise with the system and seek to change it from within rather than give up on any possibility of action.

Hythloday's account of his visit to Utopia, which takes place in Book II, is also in some sense a dialogue, a complex meditation on the nature of the ideal commonwealth. The dialogue structure employed throughout Utopia not only allows the author some cover for critiques of the social policy of his own country but also encourages the reader to notice the disturbing underside of the imaginary society: Utopia employs slavery, including enslavement for social deviance. There is no variety in dress or housing or cityscape, and no privacy. Citizens are encouraged to value pleasure, but they are constantly monitored, to make sure their pursuit of pleasure doesn't pass the strict bounds set by "nature" or "reason." There are the state guarantees of freedom of thought and toleration of religious diversity, but people who fail to believe in divine providence and the afterlife are regarded as subhuman and, accordingly, not treated as citizens. The Utopians officially despise war, but they nevertheless appear to fight a good many of them. It is very difficult to gauge More's attitude toward his imaginary commonwealth; perhaps he himself could not have said with any absolute certainty what it was.

If there is deep ambivalence in More's attitude toward Utopia, there is no similar ambivalence in the writings on theology, moral philosophy, and religious controversy that occupied much of his life. (A representative excerpt is included in the section "Faith in Conflict.”) Though his characteristic wit and irony are visible everywhere in these writings, they are part of an increasingly desperate struggle. The struggle was against Lutheranism, which began to make inroads into England precisely during the period of More’s rise to great power. More, an ardent Catholic, hated the main beliefs of the Protestant Reformation and fought their advocates with every means at his disposal, including book burnings, imprisonment, torture, and execution. As Henry VIII’s trusted friend and, finally, lord chancellor (1529–32), he played for a time a significant role in the war on heresy. He resigned his high office when the king, seeking a divorce in order to marry Anne Boleyn, broke away from the Roman Catholic Church. When More was required to take the oath for the Act of Succession, acknowledging that the claim to the throne would lie with Henry’s children by his new wife Anne, and to state his approval of the Act of Supremacy, affirming that the king rather than the pope was the supreme head of the Church in England, he declined. He attempted to remain silent on the matter, but the king treated silence as refusal and refusal as treason. More maintained his silence, choosing, as he put it, “to die the king’s good servant, but God’s first.” In 1535 he was beheaded. Four hundred years later he was made Saint Thomas More by the Catholic Church.

COMMONWEALTH AND THE NEW ISLAND OF UTOPIA

A Truly Golden Handbook No Less Beneficial Than Entertaining by the Most Distinguished and Eloquent Author
THOMAS MORE Citizen and Undersheriff<sup>2</sup> of the Famous City of London

Thomas More to Peter Giles,<sup>3</sup> Greetings

My very dear Peter Giles, I am almost ashamed to be sending you after nearly a year this little book about the Utopian commonwealth, which I'm sure you expected in less than six weeks. For, as you were well aware, I faced no problem in finding my materials, and had no reason to ponder the arrangement of them. All I had to do was repeat what you and I together heard Raphael<sup>4</sup> describe. There was no occasion, either, for labor over the style, since what he said, being extempore and informal, couldn't be couched in fancy terms. And besides, as you know, he's a man not so well versed in Latin as in Greek; so that my language would be nearer the truth, the closer it approached to his casual simplicity. Truth in fact is the only quality at which I should have aimed, or did aim, in writing this book.

I confess, friend Peter, that having all these materials ready to hand left hardly anything at all for me to do. Otherwise, thinking through a topic like this from scratch and disposing it in proper order might have demanded no little time and work even if a man were not entirely deficient in talent and learning. And then if the matter had to be set forth with eloquence, not just factually, there's no way I could have done that, however hard I worked, for however long a time. But now when I was relieved of all these problems, over which I could have sweated forever, there was nothing for me to do but simply write down what I had heard. Well, little as it was, that task was rendered almost impossible by my many other obligations. Most of my day is given to the law—pleading some cases, hearing others, compromising others, and deciding still others. I have to visit this man because of his official position and that man because of his business; and so almost the whole day is devoted to other people's business and the rest to my own; and then for myself—that is, my studies—there's nothing left.

For when I get home, I have to talk with my wife, chatter with my children, and consult with the servants. All these matters I consider part of my business, since they have to be done, unless a man wants to be a stranger in his own house. Besides, you are bound to bear yourself as agreeably as you can toward those whom nature or chance or your own choice has made the companions of your life. But of course you mustn't spoil them with your familiarity, or by overindulgence turn the servants into your masters. And so, amid these concerns, the day, the month, and the year slip away.

What time do I find to write, then? especially since I still have taken no account of sleeping or even of eating, to which many people devote as much time as to sleep itself, which consumes almost half of our lives.<sup>5</sup> My own time is only what I steal from sleeping and eating. It isn't very much, but it's something, and so I've finally been able to finish Utopia, even though belatedly, and I'm sending it to you now. I hope, my dear Peter, that you'll read it over and let me know if you find anything that I've overlooked. Though I'm not really afraid of having forgotten anything important—I wish my judgment and learning were up to my memory, which isn't half bad—still, I don't feel so sure of it that I would swear I've missed nothing.

For my servant John Clement<sup>6</sup> has raised a great doubt in my mind. As you know, he was there with us, for I always want him to be present at conversations where there's profit to be gained. (And one of these days I expect we'll get a fine crop of learning from this young sprout, who's already made excellent progress in Greek as well as Latin.) Anyhow, as I recall matters, Hythloday said the bridge over the Anyder at Amaurot<sup>7</sup> was five hundred yards long; but my John says that is two hundred yards too much—that in fact the river is not more than three hundred yards wide there. So I beg you, consult your memory. If your recollection agrees with his, I'll yield to the two of you, and confess myself mistaken. But if you don't recall the point, I'll follow my own memory and keep my present figure. For, as I've taken particular pains to avoid having anything false in the book, so, if anything is in doubt, I'd rather say something untrue than tell a lie. In short, I'd rather be honest than clever.

But the whole matter can easily be cleared up if you'll ask Raphael about it—either face to face or else by letter. And I'm afraid you must do this anyway, because of another problem that has cropped up—whether through my fault, or yours, or Raphael's, I'm not sure. For it didn't occur to us to ask, nor to him to say, in what area of the New World Utopia is to be found. I wouldn't have missed hearing about this for a sizable sum of money, for I'm quite ashamed not to know even the name of the ocean where this island lies about which I've written so much. Besides, there are various people here, and one in particular, a devout man and a professor of theology, who very much wants to go to Utopia. His motive is not by any means idle curiosity, a hankering after new sights, but rather a desire to foster and further the growth of our religion, which has made such a happy start there. To do this properly, he has decided to arrange to be sent there by the pope, and even to be named bishop to the Utopians. He feels no particular scruples about applying for this post, for he considers it a holy ambition, arising not from motives of glory or gain, but simply from religious zeal.<sup>8</sup>

Therefore I beg you, my dear Peter, to get in touch with Hythloday—in person if you can, or by letters if he's gone—and make sure that my work contains nothing false and omits nothing true. It would probably be just as well to show him the book itself. If I've made a mistake, there's nobody better qualified to correct me; but even he cannot do it, unless he reads over my book. Besides, you will be able to discover in this way whether he's pleased or annoyed that I have written the book. If he has decided to write out his own story himself, he may not want me to do so; and I should be sorry, too, if, in publicizing the Utopian commonwealth, I had robbed him and his story of the flower of novelty.

But to tell the truth, I'm still of two minds as to whether I should publish the book at all. For the tastes of mortals are so various, the tempers of some are so severe, their minds so ungrateful, their judgments so foolish, that there seems no point in publishing something, even if it's intended for their advantage, that they will receive only with contempt and ingratitude. Better simply to follow one's own natural inclinations, lead a merry life, and ignore the vexing problems of publication. Most people know nothing of learning; many despise it. The clod rejects as too difficult whatever isn't cloddish. The pedant dismisses as mere trifling anything that isn't stuffed with obsolete words. Some readers approve only of ancient authors; many men like only their own writing. Here's a man so solemn he won't allow a shadow of levity, and there's one so insipid of taste that he can't endure the salt of a little wit. Some dullards dread satire as a man bitten by a rabid dog dreads water;<sup>9</sup> some are so changeable that they like one thing when they're seated and another when they're standing.

These people lounge around the taverns, and as they swill their ale pass judgment on the intelligence of writers. With complete assurance they condemn every author by his writings, just as they think best, plucking each one, as it were, by the beard. But they themselves remain safe and, as the proverb has it, out of harm's way. No use trying to lay hold of them; they're shaved so close, there's not so much as a hair of their heads to catch them by.

Finally, some people are so ungrateful that even though they're delighted with a work, they don't like the author any better because of it. They are like rude guests who, after they have stuffed themselves with a splendid dinner, go off, carrying their full bellies homeward without a word of thanks to the host who invited them. A fine task, providing at your own expense a banquet for men of such finicky palates and such various tastes, who will remember and reward you with such thanks!

At any rate, my dear Peter, will you take up with Hythloday the points I spoke of? After I've heard from him, I'll take a fresh look at the whole matter. But since I've already taken the pains to write up the subject, it's too late to be wise. In the matter of publication, I hope we can have Hythloday's approval; after that, I'll follow the advice of my friends—and especially yours. Farewell, my dear Peter Giles. My regards to your excellent wife. Love me as you have always done; I am more fond of you than ever.

- Note 1:
More coined the word “Utopia” from Greek ou (not) + topos (place): “Noplace”; perhaps with a pun on eu + topos, “Happy” or “Fortunate” Place. The book was written in Latin and published—elaborately titled, as shown—on the European continent under the supervision of More's friend the great Dutch humanist Desiderius Erasmus (ca. 1466–1536). This translation is by Robert M. Adams, as published in the Norton Critical Edition of Utopia (3rd ed., 2011), with revisions by George M. Logan.

THE BEST STATE OF A COMMONWEALTH A DISCOURSE BY THE EXTRAORDINARY
RAPHAEL HYTHLODAY AS RECORDED BY THE NOTED THOMAS MORE CITIZEN AND UNDERSHERIFF OF LONDON THE FAMOUS
CITY OF GREAT BRITAIN

The most invincible king of England, Henry, the eighth of that name, a prince adorned with the royal virtues beyond any other, had recently some differences of no slight import with Charles, the most serene prince of Castille,<sup>1</sup> and sent me into Flanders as his spokesman to discuss and settle them. I was companion and associate to that incomparable man Cuthbert Tunstall,<sup>2</sup> whom the king has recently created master of the rolls, to everyone's great satisfaction. I will say nothing in praise of this man, not because I fear the judgment of a friend might be questioned, but because his integrity and learning are greater than I can describe and too well known everywhere to need my commendation—unless I would, according to the proverb, "light up the sun with a lantern."

Those appointed by the prince to deal with us, all excellent men, met us at Bruges by prearrangement. Their head and leader was the mayor of Bruges, a most distinguished person. But their main speaker and guiding spirit was Georgius de Theimseke, the provost of Cassel, a man eloquent by nature as well as by training, very learned in the law, and most skillful in diplomatic affairs through his ability and long practice. After we had met several times, certain points remained on which we could not come to agreement; so they adjourned the meetings and went to Brussels for some days to learn their prince's pleasure.

Meanwhile, since my business required it, I went to Antwerp.<sup>3</sup> Of those who visited me while I was there, no one was more welcome than Peter Giles. He was a native of Antwerp, a man of high reputation, already appointed to a good position and worthy of the very best: I hardly know whether the young man is more distinguished in learning or in character. Apart from being cultured, virtuous, and courteous to all, with his intimates he is so open-hearted, affectionate, loyal, and sincere that you would be hard-pressed to find anywhere a man comparable to him in all the points of friendship. No one is more modest or more frank; none better combines simplicity with wisdom. His conversation is so pleasant, and so witty without malice, that the ardent desire I felt to see again my native country, my wife, and my children (from whom I had been separated more than four months) was much eased by his agreeable company and delightful talk.

One day after I had heard mass at Nôtre Dame, the most beautiful and most popular church in Antwerp, I was about to return to my quarters when I happened to see him talking with a stranger, a man of quite advanced years. The stranger had a sunburned face, a long beard, and a cloak hanging loosely from his shoulders; from his appearance and dress, I took him to be a ship's captain. When Peter saw me, he approached and greeted me. As I was about to return his greeting, he drew me aside, and, indicating the stranger, said, "Do you see that fellow? I was just on the point of bringing him to you."

"He would have been very welcome on your behalf," I answered.

"And on his own too, if you knew him," said Peter, "for there is no mortal alive today can tell you so much about unknown peoples and lands; and I know that you're always greedy for such information."

"In that case," said I, "my guess wasn't a bad one, for at first glance I supposed he was a skipper."

"Then you're far off the mark," he replied, "for his sailing has not been like that of Palinurus, but more that of Ulysses, or rather of Plato.<sup>4</sup> This man, who is named Raphael—his family name is Hythloday—knows a good deal of Latin, and is particularly learned in Greek. He studied Greek more than Latin because his main interest is philosophy, and in that field he found that the Romans have left us nothing very valuable except certain works of Seneca and Cicero.<sup>5</sup> Being eager to see the world, he left to his brothers the patrimony to which he was entitled at home (he is a native of Portugal) and took service with Amerigo Vespucci.<sup>6</sup> He was Vespucci's constant companion on the last three of his four voyages, accounts of which are now common reading everywhere; but on the last voyage, he did not return home with the commander. After much persuasion and expostulation he got Amerigo's permission to be one of the twenty-four men who were left in a fort at the farthest point of the last voyage.<sup>7</sup> Being marooned in this way was altogether agreeable to him, as he was more anxious to pursue his travels than afraid of death. He would often say, 'The man who has no grave is covered by the sky,' and 'The road to heaven is the same length from all places.'<sup>8</sup> Yet this frame of mind would have cost him dear, if God had not been gracious to him. After Vespucci's departure, he traveled through many countries with five companions from the garrison. At last, by strange good fortune, he got, via Ceylon, to Calicut, where he opportunely found some Portuguese ships; and so, beyond anyone's expectation, he returned to his own country."<sup>9</sup>

When Peter had told me this, I thanked him for his great kindness in wishing to introduce me to a man whose conversation he hoped I would enjoy, and then I turned to Raphael. After we had greeted each other and exchanged the usual civilities of strangers upon their first meeting, we all went off to my house. There in the garden we sat down on a bench covered with turf, to talk together.

He told us that when Vespucci sailed away, he and his companions who had stayed behind in the fort often met with the people of the countryside, and by ingratiating speeches gradually won their friendship. Before long they came to dwell with them safely and even affectionately. The prince (I have forgotten his name and that of his country) also gave them his favor, furnishing Raphael and his five companions not only with ample provisions but with means for traveling—rafts when they went by water, wagons when they went by land. In addition, he sent with them a most trusty guide, who was to conduct them to other princes to whom he heartily recommended them. After many days' journey, he said, they came to towns and cities, and to commonwealths that were both very populous and not badly governed.

To be sure, under the equator and as far on both sides of the line as the sun moves, there lie vast empty deserts, scorched with perpetual heat. The whole region is desolate and squalid, grim and uncultivated, inhabited by wild beasts, serpents, and also by men no less wild and dangerous than the beasts themselves. But as you go on, conditions gradually grow milder. The sun is less fierce, the earth greener, the creatures less savage. At last you reach people, cities, and towns which not only trade among themselves and with their neighbors but even carry on commerce by sea and land with remote countries. After that, he said, they were able to visit different lands in every direction, for he and his companions were welcome as passengers aboard any ship about to make a journey.

The first vessels they saw were flat-bottomed, he said, with sails made of stitched papyrus-reeds or wicker, or elsewhere of leather. Farther on, they found ships with pointed keels and canvas sails, in every respect like our own.<sup>1</sup> The seamen were not unskilled in managing wind and water; but they were most grateful to him, Raphael said, for showing them the use of the compass, of which they had been ignorant. For that reason, they had formerly sailed with great timidity, and only in summer. Now they have such trust in the compass that they no longer fear winter at all, and tend to be overconfident rather than cautious. There is some danger that through their imprudence this device, which they thought would be so advantageous to them, may become the cause of much mischief.

It would take too long to repeat all that Raphael told us he had observed in each place, nor would it make altogether for our present purpose. Perhaps on another occasion we shall tell more about the things that are most profitable, especially the wise and sensible institutions that he observed among the civilized nations. We asked him many eager questions about such things, and he answered us willingly enough. We made no inquiries, however, about monsters, for nothing is less new or strange than they are. Scyllas, ravenous Celaenos, man-eating Lestrygonians,<sup>2</sup> and that sort of monstrosity you can hardly avoid, but well and wisely trained citizens you will hardly find anywhere. While he told us of many ill-considered usages in these new-found nations, he also described quite a few other customs from which our own cities, nations, races, and kingdoms might take example in order to correct their errors. These I shall discuss in another place, as I said. Now I intend to relate only what he told us about the customs and institutions of the Utopians,<sup>3</sup> first recounting the conversation that led him to speak of that commonwealth. Raphael had been talking very sagely about the faulty arrangements and also the wise institutions found in that hemisphere and this (many of both sorts in each), speaking as shrewdly about the manners and governments of each place he had visited as though he had lived there all his life. Peter was amazed.

"My dear Raphael," he said, "I'm surprised that you don't enter some king's service; for I don't know of a single prince who wouldn't be eager to employ you. Your learning and your knowledge of various countries and peoples would entertain him, while your advice and your supply of examples would be very helpful in the council chamber. Thus you might advance your own interests and be useful at the same time to all your relatives and friends."

"I am not much concerned about my relatives and friends," he replied, "because I consider that I have already done my duty by them. While still young and healthy, I distributed among my relatives and friends the possessions that most men do not part with till they are old and sick (and then only reluctantly, because they can no longer keep them). I think they should be content with this gift of mine, and not expect that for their sake I should enslave myself to any king whatever."

"Well said," Peter replied; "but I do not mean that you should be in servitude to any king, only in his service."

"The difference is only a matter of one syllable," said Raphael.

"All right," said Peter, "but whatever you call it, I do not see any other way in which you can be so useful to your friends or to the general public, in addition to making yourself happier."

"Happier indeed!" exclaimed Raphael. "Would a way of life so absolutely repellent to my spirit make my life happier? As it is now, I live as I please, and I fancy very few courtiers, however splendid, can say that. As a matter of fact, there are so many men soliciting favors from the powerful that it will be no great loss if they have to do without me and a couple of others like me."

Then I said, "It is clear, my dear Raphael, that you seek neither wealth nor power, and indeed I value and revere a man of such a disposition as much as I do the mightiest persons in the world. Yet I think if you would devote your time and energy to public affairs, you would do a thing worthy of a generous and philosophical nature, even if you did not much like it. You could best perform such a service by joining the council of some great prince and inciting him to just and noble actions (as I'm sure you would): for a people's welfare or misery flows in a stream from their prince, as from a never-failing spring. Your learning is so full, even if it weren't combined with experience, and your experience is so great, even apart from your learning, that you would be an extraordinary counselor to any king in the world."

"You are twice mistaken, my dear More," he replied, "first in me and then in the situation itself. I don't have the capacity you ascribe to me, and if I had it in the highest degree, the public would still not be any better off if I exchanged my contemplative leisure for this kind of action. In the first place, most princes apply themselves to the arts of war, in which I have neither ability nor interest, instead of to the good arts of peace. They are generally more set on acquiring new kingdoms by hook or by crook than on governing well those they already have. Moreover, the counselors of kings are all so wise already that they need no advice from anyone else (or at least that's the way they see it). At the same time, they approve and even flatter the most absurd statements of favorites through whose influence they seek to stand well with the prince. It is only natural, of course, that each man should think his own opinions best: the crow loves his fledgling, and the ape his cub.

"Now in a court composed of people who envy everyone else and admire only themselves, if a man should suggest something he had read of in other ages or seen in practice elsewhere, the other counselors would think their reputation for wisdom was endangered and they would look like simpletons, unless they could find fault with his proposal. If all else failed, they would take refuge in some remark like this: 'The way we're doing it was good enough for our ancestors, and I only hope we're as wise as they were.' And with this deep thought they would take their seats, as though they had said the last word on the subject—implying, of course, that it would be a very dangerous matter if anyone were found to be wiser in any point than his ancestors were. As a matter of fact, we have no misgivings about neglecting the best examples they have left us; but if something better is proposed, we eagerly seize upon the excuse of reverence for times past and cling to it desperately. Such proud, obstinate, ridiculous judgments I have encountered many times, and once even in England."

"What!" I said. "Were you ever in my country?"

"Yes," he answered, "I spent several months there. It was not long after the revolt of the Cornishmen against the king had been put down, with the miserable slaughter of the rebels.<sup>4</sup> During my stay I was deeply beholden to the reverend father John Cardinal Morton,<sup>5</sup> archbishop of Canterbury, and in addition at that time lord chancellor of England. He was a man, my dear Peter (for More knows about him, and can tell what I'm going to say), as much respected for his wisdom and virtue as for his authority. He was of medium height, not bent over despite his years; his looks inspired respect rather than fear. In conversation, he was not forbidding, though serious and grave. When suitors came to him on business, he liked to test their spirit and presence of mind by speaking to them sharply, though not rudely. He liked to uncover these qualities, which were those of his own nature, as long as they were not carried to the point of effrontery; and he thought such men were best qualified to carry on business. His speech was polished and pointed; his knowledge of the law was great; he had an incomparable understanding and a prodigious memory, for he had improved extraordinary natural abilities by study and practice. At the time when I was in England, the king relied heavily on his advice, and he seemed the chief support of the nation as a whole. He had been taken from school to court when scarcely more than a boy, had devoted all his life to important business, and had acquired from weathering violent changes of fortune and many great perils a supply of practical wisdom, which is not soon lost when so purchased.

"One day when I was dining with him, there was present a layman, learned in the laws of your country, who for some reason took occasion to praise the rigid execution of justice then being practiced upon thieves. They were being executed everywhere, he said, with as many as twenty at a time being hanged on a single gallows. And then he declared that he could not understand how so many thieves sprang up everywhere, when so few of them escaped hanging. I ventured to speak freely before the cardinal, and said, 'There is no need to wonder: this way of punishing thieves goes beyond the call of justice, and is not, in any case, for the public good. The penalty is too harsh in itself, yet it isn't an effective deterrent. Simple theft<sup>6</sup> is not so great a crime that it ought to cost a man his life, yet no punishment however severe can withhold those from robbery who have no other way to eat. In this matter not only you in England but a good part of the world seem to imitate bad schoolmasters, who would rather whip their pupils than teach them. Severe and terrible punishments are enacted against theft, when it would be much better to enable every man to earn his own living, instead of being driven to the awful necessity of stealing and then dying for it.'

"'Oh, we've taken care of that,' said the fellow. 'There are the trades and there is farming, by which men may make a living unless they choose deliberately to be rogues.'

"'Oh no you don't,' I said, 'you won't get out of it that way. We may disregard for the moment the cripples who come home from foreign and civil wars, as lately from the Cornish battle and before that from your wars with France. These men, who have lost limbs in the service of king and country, are too badly crippled to follow their old trades, and too old to learn new ones. But since wars occur only from time to time, let us, I say, disregard these men, and consider what happens every day. There are a great many noblemen who live idly like drones off the labor of others, their tenants whom they bleed white by constantly raising their rents. (This is the only instance of their tightfistedness, because they are prodigal in everything else, ready to spend their way to the poorhouse.) These noblemen drag around with them a great train of idle servants,<sup>7</sup> who have never learned any trade by which they could earn a living. As soon as their master dies, or they themselves fall ill, they are promptly turned out of doors, for lords would rather support idlers than invalids, and the son is often unable to maintain as big a household as his father had, at least at first. Those who are turned off soon set about starving, unless they set about stealing. What else can they do? Then when a wandering life has left their health impaired and their clothes threadbare, when their faces look pinched and their garments tattered, men of rank will not care to engage them. And country people dare not do so, for they don't have to be told that one who has been raised softly to idle pleasures, who has been used to swaggering about with sword and buckler, is likely to look down on the whole neighborhood and despise everybody else as beneath him. Such a man can't be put to work with spade and mattock; he will not serve a poor man faithfully for scant wages and sparse diet.'

"But we ought to encourage these men in particular," said the lawyer. 'In case of war the strength and power of our army depend on them, because they have a bolder and nobler spirit than workmen and farmers have.'

"You may as well say that thieves should be encouraged for the sake of wars," I answered, 'since you will never lack for thieves as long as you have men like these. In fact thieves don't make bad soldiers, and soldiers turn out to be pretty good robbers—so nearly are these two ways of life related. But the custom of keeping too many retainers is not peculiar to this nation; it is common to almost all of them. France suffers from an even more grievous plague. Even in peacetime—if you can call it peace—the whole country is crowded with foreign mercenaries, imported on the same principle that you've given for your noblemen keeping idle servants.<sup>8</sup> Wise fools think that the public safety depends on having ready a strong army, preferably of veteran soldiers. They think inexperienced men are not reliable, and they sometimes hunt out pretexts for war, just so they may have trained soldiers and experienced cutthroats—or, as Sallust neatly puts it, that "hand and spirit may not grow dull through lack of practice."<sup>9</sup> But France has learned to her cost how pernicious it is to feed such beasts. The examples of the Romans, the Carthaginians, the Syrians,<sup>1</sup> and many other peoples show the same thing; for not only their governments but their fields and even their cities were ruined more than once by their own standing armies. Besides, this preparedness is unnecessary: not even the French soldiers, practiced in arms from their cradles, can boast of having often got the best of your raw recruits.<sup>2</sup> I shall say no more on this point, lest I seem to flatter present company. At any rate, neither your town workmen nor your rough farm laborers—except for those whose physiques aren't suited for strength or boldness, or whose spirits have been cowed by inability to feed their families—seem to be much afraid of fighting the idle attendants of noblemen. So you need not fear that retainers, once strong and vigorous (for that's the only sort noblemen deign to corrupt), but now soft and flabby because of their idle, effeminate life, would be weakened if they were taught practical crafts to earn their living, and trained to manly labor. Anyway, I cannot think it's in the public interest to maintain for the emergency of war such a vast multitude of people who trouble and disturb the peace. You never have war unless you choose it, and peace is always more to be considered than war. Yet this is not the only circumstance that makes thieving necessary. There is another one, which, I believe, applies more especially to you Englishmen.'

"What is that?' asked the cardinal.

"Your sheep,' I replied, 'that used to be so meek and eat so little. Now they have become so greedy and fierce that they devour human beings themselves, as I hear.<sup>3</sup> They devastate and depopulate fields, houses, and towns. For in whatever parts of the land the sheep yield the softest and most expensive wool, there the nobility and gentry, yes, and even some abbots—holy men—are not content with the old rents that the land yielded to their predecessors. Living in idleness and luxury, without doing any good to society, no longer satisfies them; they have to do positive harm. For they leave no land free for the plow: they enclose every acre for pasture; they destroy houses and abolish towns, keeping only the churches, and those for sheep-barns. And as if enough of your land were not already wasted on woods and game-preserves, these worthy men turn all human habitations and cultivated fields back to wilderness. Thus one greedy, insatiable glutton, a frightful plague to his native country, may enclose many thousand acres of land within a single hedge. The tenants are dismissed; some are stripped of their belongings by trickery or brute force, or, wearied by constant harassment, are driven to sell them. By hook or by crook these miserable people—men, women, husbands, wives, orphans, widows, parents with little children, whole families (poor but numerous, since farming requires many hands)—are forced to move out. They leave the only homes familiar to them, and they can find no place to go. Since they cannot afford to wait for a buyer, they sell for a pittance all their household goods, which would not bring much in any case. When that little money is gone (and it's soon spent in wandering from place to place), what remains for them but to steal, and so be hanged—justly, you'd say!—or to wander and beg? And yet if they go tramping, they are jailed as idle vagrants. They would be glad to work, but they can find no one who will hire them. There is no need for farm labor, in which they have been trained, when there is no land left to be planted. One herdsman or shepherd can look after a flock of beasts large enough to stock an area that would require many hands if it were plowed and harvested.

“This enclosing has had the effect of raising the price of food in many places. In addition, the price of raw wool has risen so much that poor people who used to make cloth are no longer able to buy it, and so great numbers are forced from work to idleness. One reason is that after the enlarging of the pasture-land, a murrain killed a great number of sheep—as though God were punishing greed by sending a plague upon the animals, which in justice should have fallen on the owners! But even if the number of sheep should increase greatly, their price will not fall a penny. The reason is that the wool trade, though it can't be called a monopoly, because it isn't in the hands of one single person, is concentrated in few hands (an oligopoly, you might say), and these so rich that the owners are never pressed to sell until they have a mind to, and that is only when they can get their price.

“For the same reason other kinds of livestock also are priced exorbitantly, the more so because with so many farmhouses being pulled down, and farming in a state of decay, there are not enough people to look after the breeding of animals. These rich men will not breed other animals as they do lambs, but buy them lean and cheap, fatten them in their own pastures, and then sell them at a high price. I don’t think the full impact of this bad system has yet been felt. We know these dealers raise prices where the fattened animals are sold. But when, over a period of time, they keep buying beasts from other localities faster than they can be bred, then as the supply gradually diminishes where they are purchased, a severe shortage is bound to ensue. So your island, which seemed especially fortunate in this matter, will be ruined by the crass avarice of a few. For the high food prices cause everyone to dismiss as many retainers as he can from his household; and what, I ask, can these men do, but rob or beg? And a man of courage is more likely to steal than to cringe.

“To make this hideous poverty and scarcity worse, they exist side by side with wanton luxury.<sup>4</sup> Not only the servants of noblemen, but tradespeople, even some farmers, and people of every social rank are given to ostentatious dress and gluttonous greed. Look at the eating houses, the bawdy houses, and those other places just as bad, the wine bars and alehouses. Look at all the crooked games of chance, dice, cards, backgammon, tennis, bowling, and quoits, in which money slips away so fast. Don’t all these lead their habitués straight to robbery? Banish these blights, make those who have ruined farmhouses and villages restore them, or hand them over to someone who will rebuild. Restrict the right of the rich to buy up anything and everything, and then to exercise a kind of monopoly. Let fewer people be brought up in idleness. Let agriculture be restored and the wool manufacture revived as an honest trade, so there will be useful work for the whole crowd of those now idle—whether those whom poverty has already made into thieves, or those whom vagabondage and habits of lazy service are converting, just as surely, into the robbers of the future.

“If you do not find a cure for these evils, it is futile to boast of your justice in punishing theft. Your policy may look superficially like justice, but in reality it is neither just nor practical. If you allow young folk to be abominably brought up and their characters corrupted, little by little, from childhood; and if then you punish them as grownups for committing crimes to which their early training has inclined them, what else is this, I ask, but first making them thieves and then punishing them for it?”

“As I was speaking thus, the lawyer had made ready his answer, choosing the usual style of disputants who are better at summing up than at replying, and who like to show off their memory. So he said to me, ‘You have talked very well for a stranger, but you have heard about more things than you have been able to understand correctly. I will make the matter clear to you in a few words. First, I will summarize what you have said; then I will show how you have been misled by ignorance of our customs; finally, I will demolish all your arguments and reduce them to rubble. And so to begin where I promised, on four points you seemed to me—’

“Hold your tongue,’ said the cardinal, ‘for you won’t be finished in a few words, if this is the way you start. We will spare you the trouble of answering now, and reserve the pleasure of your reply till our next meeting, which will be tomorrow, if your affairs and Raphael’s permit it. Meanwhile, my dear Raphael, I am eager to hear why you think theft should not be punished with death, or what other punishment you think would be more in the public interest. For I’m sure even you don’t think it should go unpunished entirely. Even as it is, the fear of death does not restrain evildoers; once they were sure of their lives, as you propose, what force or fear could restrain them? They would look on a lighter penalty as an open invitation to commit more crimes—it would be like offering them a reward.’

“It seems to me, most kind and reverend father,’ I said, ‘that it’s altogether unjust to take someone’s life for taking money. Nothing in the world that fortune can bestow is equal in value to a human life.

If they say the thief suffers not for the money, but for violation of justice and transgression of laws, then this extreme justice should really be called extreme injury.<sup>5</sup> We ought not to approve of these fierce Manlian edicts<sup>6</sup> that invoke the sword for the smallest violations. Neither should we accept the Stoic view that considers all crimes equal,<sup>7</sup> as if there were no difference between killing a man and taking a coin from him. If equity means anything, there is no proportion or relation at all between these two crimes. God has said, "Thou shalt not kill"; shall we kill so readily for the theft of a bit of small change? Perhaps it will be argued that God's commandment against killing does not apply where human law allows it. But then what prevents men from making other laws in the same way—perhaps even laws legalizing rape, adultery, and perjury? God has taken from each person the right not only to kill another, but even to kill himself. If mutual consent to human laws on manslaughter entitles men freely to exempt their agents from divine law and allows them to kill those condemned by human decrees where God has given no precedent, what is this but preferring the law of man to the law of God? The result will be that in every situation men will decide for themselves how far it suits them to observe the laws of God. The law of Moses was harsh and severe, as for an enslaved and stubborn people, but it punished theft with a fine, not death.<sup>8</sup> Let us not think that in his new law of mercy, where he rules us with the tenderness of a father, God has given us greater license to be cruel to one another.

“These are the reasons why I think it is wrong to put thieves to death. But surely everybody knows how absurd and even harmful to the public welfare it is to punish theft and murder alike. If theft carries the same penalty as murder, the thief will be encouraged to kill the victim whom otherwise he would only have robbed. When the punishment is the same, murder is safer, since one conceals both crimes by killing the witness. Thus while we try to terrify thieves with extreme cruelty, we really invite them to kill the innocent.

“As for the usual question of what more suitable punishment can be found, in my judgment it would be much easier to find a better

one than a worse. Why should we question the value of the punishments long used by the Romans, who were most expert in the arts of government? They condemned those convicted of heinous crimes to work, shackled, for life, in stone quarries and mines. But of all the alternatives, I prefer the method which I observed in my Persian travels, among the people commonly called the Polylerites.<sup>9</sup> They are a sizable nation, not badly governed, free and subject only to their own laws, except that they pay annual tribute to the Persian king. Living far from the sea, they are nearly surrounded by mountains. Being contented with the products of their own land, which is by no means unfruitful, they do not visit other nations, nor are they much visited. According to their ancient customs, they do not try to enlarge their boundaries, and easily protect themselves behind their mountains by paying tribute to their overlord. Thus they have no wars and live in a comfortable rather than a showy manner, more contented than renowned or glorious. Indeed, I think they are hardly known by name to anyone but their next-door neighbors.

“In their land, whoever is found guilty of theft must make restitution to the owner, not (as elsewhere) to the prince; they think the prince has no more right to the stolen goods than the thief. If the stolen property has disappeared, its value is repaid from the thief’s possessions. Whatever remains of those is handed over to his wife and children, while the thief himself is sentenced to hard labor.

“Unless their crimes were compounded with atrocities, thieves are neither imprisoned nor shackled, but go freely and unconstrained about their work on public projects. If they shirk and do their jobs slackly, they are not chained, but they are whipped. If they work hard, they are treated without any indignities, except that at night after roll call they are locked up in their dormitories. Apart from constant work, they undergo no discomfort in living. As they work for the public good, they are decently fed out of the public stores, though arrangements vary from place to place. In some districts they are supported by alms. Unreliable as this support may seem, the Polylerites are so compassionate that no way is found more rewarding. In other places, public revenues are set aside for their support, or a special tax is levied on every individual for their use; and sometimes they do not do public work, but anyone in need of workmen can go to the market and hire some of them by the day at a set rate, a little less than that for free men. If they are lazy, it is lawful to whip them. Thus they never lack for work, and each one of them brings a little profit into the public treasury beyond the cost of his keep.

“They are all dressed in clothes of the same distinctive color. Their hair is not shaved but trimmed close about the ears,<sup>1</sup> and the tip of one ear is cut off. Their friends are allowed to give them food, drink, or clothing, as long as it is of the proper color; but to give them money is death, both to the giver and to the taker. It is just as serious a crime for any free man to take money from them for any reason whatever; and it is also a capital crime for any of these slaves (as the condemned are called) to carry weapons. In each district of the country they are required to wear a special badge. It is a capital crime to throw away the badge, to go beyond one's own district, or to talk with a slave of another district. Plotting escape is no more secure than escape itself: it is death for any other slave to know of a plot to escape, and slavery for a free man. On the other hand, there are rewards for informers—money for a free man, freedom for a slave, and for both of them pardon and amnesty. Thus it can never be safer for them to persist in an illicit scheme than to renounce it.

“Such are their laws and policies in this matter. It is clear how mild and practical they are, for the aim of the punishment is to destroy vices and save men. The criminals are treated so that they become good of necessity, and for the rest of their lives they atone for the wrong they have done before. There is so little danger of relapse that travelers going from one part of the country to another think slaves the most reliable guides, changing them at the boundary of each district. The slaves have no means of committing robbery, since they are unarmed, and any money in their possession is evidence of a crime. If caught, they would be punished, and there is no hope of escape anywhere. Since every bit of a slave's clothing is unlike the usual clothing of the country, how could a slave escape, unless he fled naked? Even then his cropped ear would give him away. Might not the slaves form a conspiracy against the government? Perhaps. But the slaves of one district could hardly expect to succeed unless they first involved in their plot the slave-gangs of many other districts. And that is impossible, since they are not allowed to meet or talk together or even to greet one another. No one would risk a plot when they all know joining is so dangerous to the participant and betrayal so profitable to the informer. Besides, no one is quite without hope of gaining his freedom eventually if he accepts his punishment in the spirit of obedience and patience, and gives promise of future good conduct. Indeed, every year some are pardoned as a reward for their submissive behavior.'

"When I had finished this account, I added that I saw no reason why this system could not be adopted even in England, and with much greater advantage than the 'justice' which my legal antagonist had praised so highly. But the lawyer replied that such a system could never be established in England without putting the commonwealth in serious peril. And so saying, he shook his head, made a wry face, and fell silent. And all the company sided with him.

"Then the cardinal remarked, 'It is not easy to guess whether this scheme would work well or not, since nobody has yet tried it out. But perhaps when the death sentence has been passed on a thief, the king might reprieve him for a time without right of sanctuary,<sup>2</sup> and thus see how the plan worked. If it turned out well, then he might establish it by law; if not, he could execute immediate punishment on the man formerly condemned. This would be neither less nor more unjust than if the condemned man had been put to death at once, and the experiment would involve no risk. I think vagabonds too might be treated this way, for though we have passed many laws against them, they have had no real effect as yet.'

"When the cardinal had concluded, they all began praising enthusiastically ideas which they had received with contempt when I suggested them; and they particularly liked the idea about vagabonds, because it was the cardinal's addition.

"I don't know whether it is worthwhile telling what followed, because it was silly, but I'll tell it anyhow, for there's no harm in it, and it bears on our subject. There was a hanger-on standing around, who was so good at playing the fool that you could hardly tell him from the real thing. He was constantly making jokes, but so awkwardly that we laughed more at him than at them; yet sometimes a rather clever thing came out, confirming the old proverb that a man who throws the dice often will sooner or later make a lucky cast. One of the company happened to say that in my speech I had taken care of the thieves, and the cardinal had taken care of the vagabonds, so now all that was left to do was to take care of the poor whom sickness or old age had reduced to poverty and kept from earning a living.

"Leave that to me," said the fool, "and I'll set it right at once. These are people I'm eager to get out of my sight, having been so often vexed with them and their woeful complaints. No matter how pitifully they beg for money, they've never whined a single penny out of my pocket. They can't win with me: either I don't want to give them anything, or I haven't anything to give them. Now they're getting wise; they know me so well, they don't waste their breath, but let me pass without a word or a hope—no more, by heaven, than if I were a priest. But I would make a law sending all these beggars to Benedictine monasteries, where the men could become lay brothers,<sup>3</sup> as they're called, and the women could be nuns."

"The cardinal smiled and passed it off as a joke; the rest took it seriously. But a certain friar, a theologian, took such pleasure in this jest at the expense of priests and monks that he too began to make merry, though generally he was grave to the point of sourness. 'Even so, you will not get rid of the beggars,' he began, 'unless you take care of us friars<sup>4</sup> too.'

"You have been taken care of already," retorted the fool. "The cardinal provided for you splendidly when he said vagabonds should be arrested and put to work, for you friars are the greatest vagabonds of all."

"When the company, watching the cardinal closely, saw that he admitted this jest like the other, they all took it up with vigor—except for the friar. He, as you can easily imagine, was stung by the vinegar,<sup>5</sup> and flew into such a rage that he could not keep from abusing the fool. He called him a knave, a slanderer, a sneak, and a 'son of perdition,'<sup>6</sup> quoting the meanwhile terrible denunciations from Holy Scripture. Now the joker began to jest in earnest, for he was clearly on his own ground.

"Don't get angry, good friar," he said, "for it is written, 'In your patience possess ye your souls.'"<sup>7</sup>

"In reply, the friar said, and I quote his very words, 'I am not angry, you gallows-bird, or at least I do not sin, for the psalmist says, 'Be ye angry, and sin not.'"<sup>8</sup>

"At this point the cardinal gently cautioned the friar to calm down, but he answered: 'No, my lord, I speak only from righteous zeal, as I ought to. For holy men have had great zeal. That is why Scripture says, 'the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up,'"<sup>9</sup> and we sing in church, "those who mocked Elisha as he went up to the house of God, felt the zeal of the baldhead,"<sup>1</sup> just as this mocker, this rascal, this guttersnipe may very well feel it.'

"Perhaps you mean well," said the cardinal, "but you would act in a holier, and certainly in a wiser way, if you didn't set your wit against a fool's wit and try to spar with a buffoon.'

"No, my lord," he replied, "I would not act more wisely. For Solomon himself, the wisest of men, said, 'Answer a fool according to his folly,'"<sup>2</sup> and that's what I'm doing now. I am showing him the pit into which he will fall if he does not take care. For if the many mockers of Elisha, who was only one bald man, felt the effects of his zeal, how much more effect shall be felt by a single mocker of many friars, who include a great many baldheads! And besides, we have a papal bull,<sup>3</sup> by which all who mock us are excommunicated.'

"When the cardinal saw there was no end to the matter, he nodded to the fool to leave, and turned the conversation to another subject. Soon after, he rose from table, and, going to hear petitioners, dismissed us.

"Look, my dear More, what a long story I have inflicted on you. I would be quite ashamed, if you had not yourself asked for it, and seemed to listen as if you did not want any part to be left out. Though I ought to have related this conversation more concisely, I did feel bound to recount it, so you might see how those who rejected what I said at first approved of it immediately afterward, when they saw the cardinal did not disapprove. In fact they went so far in their flattery that they indulged and almost took seriously ideas that he tolerated only as the jesting of a fool. From this episode you can see how little courtiers would value me or my advice."

To this I answered, "You have given me great pleasure, my dear Raphael, for everything you've said has been both wise and witty. As you spoke, I seemed to be a child and in my own native land once more, through the pleasant recollection of that cardinal in whose court I was brought up as a lad. Dear as you are to me on other accounts, you cannot imagine how much dearer you are because you honor his memory so highly. Still, my friend Raphael, I don't give up my former opinion: I think if you could overcome your aversion to court life, your advice to a prince would be of the greatest advantage to the public welfare. This, after all, is the chief duty of every good man, including you. Your friend Plato thinks that commonwealths will become happy only when philosophers become kings or kings become philosophers.<sup>4</sup> No wonder we are so far from happiness, when philosophers do not condescend even to assist kings with their counsels."

"They are not so ungracious," Raphael replied, "but that they would gladly do it; in fact, they have already done it in a great many published books, if the rulers would only read their good advice. But doubtless Plato was right in foreseeing that unless kings became philosophical themselves, they would never take the advice of real philosophers, drenched as they are and infected with false values from boyhood on. Plato certainly had this experience with Dionysius of Syracuse.<sup>5</sup> If I proposed wise laws to some king, and tried to root out of his soul the seeds of evil and corruption, don't you suppose I would be either banished forthwith, or treated with scorn?

"Imagine, if you will, that I am at the court of the king of France.<sup>6</sup> Suppose I were sitting in his royal council, meeting in secret session with the king himself presiding, and all the cleverest councillors were hard at work devising a set of crafty machinations by which the king might keep hold of Milan, recover Naples, which has proved so slippery;<sup>7</sup> then overthrow the Venetians and subdue all Italy; next add Flanders, Brabant, and the whole of Burgundy to his realm, besides some other nations he has in mind to invade. One man urges him to make an alliance with the Venetians for just as long as the king finds it convenient—perhaps to develop a common strategy with them, and even allow them some of the loot, which can be recovered later when things work out according to plan. While one recommends hiring German mercenaries, his neighbor proposes paying the Swiss to stay neutral.<sup>8</sup> A fourth voice suggests soothing the offended divinity of the emperor with an offering of gold.<sup>9</sup> Still another, who is of a different mind, thinks a settlement should be made with the king of Aragon, and that, to cement the peace, he should be allowed to take Navarre<sup>1</sup> from its proper ruler. Meanwhile, someone suggests snaring the prince of Castille into a marriage alliance—a first step would be to buy up some nobles of his court with secret pensions.<sup>2</sup>

"The hardest problem of all is what to do about England. They all agree that peace should be made, and that the alliance, which is weak at best, should be strengthened as much as possible; but while the English are being treated as friends, they should also be suspected as enemies. And so the Scots must be kept in constant readiness, poised to attack the English in case they stir ever so little.<sup>3</sup> Also a banished nobleman with some pretensions to the English throne must be secretly encouraged (there are treaties against doing it openly), and in this way pressure can be brought to bear on the English king, and a ruler kept in check who can't really be trusted.<sup>4</sup>

"Now in a meeting like this one, where so much is at stake, where so many brilliant men are competing to think up intricate strategies of war, what if an insignificant fellow like me were to get up and advise going on another tack entirely? Suppose I said the king should leave Italy alone and stay at home, because the single kingdom of France all by itself is almost too much for one man to govern well, and the king should not dream of adding others to it? Then imagine I told about the decrees of the Achorians,<sup>5</sup> who live off the island of Utopia toward the southeast. Long ago, these people went to war to gain another realm for their king, who had inherited an ancient claim to it through marriage. When they had conquered it, they soon saw that keeping it was going to be as hard as getting it had been. The seeds of war were constantly sprouting, their new subjects were continually rebelling or being attacked by foreign invaders, the Achorians had to be constantly at war for them or against them, and they saw no hope of ever being able to disband their army. In the meantime, they were being heavily taxed, money flowed out of their kingdom, their blood was being shed for the advantage of others, and peace was no closer than it had ever been. The war corrupted their own citizens by encouraging lust for robbery and murder; and the laws fell into contempt because their king, distracted with the cares of two kingdoms, could give neither one his proper attention.

"When they saw that the list of these evils was endless, the Achorians took counsel together and very courteously offered their king his choice of keeping whichever of the two kingdoms he preferred, because he couldn't rule them both. They were too numerous a people, they said, to be ruled by half a king; and they added that a man would not even hire a muledriver, if he had to divide his services with somebody else. The worthy king was thus obliged to be content with his own realm and give his new one to a friend, who before long was driven out.

“Finally, suppose I told the French king’s council that all this warmongering, by which so many different nations were kept in turmoil as a result of one man’s connivings, would exhaust his treasury and demoralize his people, and yet in the end come to nothing, through some mishap or other.<sup>6</sup> And therefore he should look after his ancestral kingdom, improve it as much as he could, cultivate it in every conceivable way. He should love his people and be loved by them; he should live among them, govern them kindly, and let other kingdoms alone, since his own is big enough, if not too big, for him. How do you think, my dear More, the other councillors would take this speech of mine?”

“Not very well, I’m sure,” said I.

“Well, let’s go on,” he said. “Suppose the councillors of some other king are discussing various schemes for raising money to fill his treasury. One man recommends increasing the value of money when the king pays his debts and devaluing it when he collects his revenues.<sup>7</sup> Thus he can discharge a huge debt with a small payment, and collect a large sum when only a small one is due him. Another suggests a make-believe war, so that money can be raised under pretext of carrying it on; then, when the money is in, he can conclude a ceremonious peace treaty—which the deluded common people will attribute to the piety of their prince and his careful compassion for the lives of his subjects.<sup>8</sup> Another councillor calls to mind some old motheaten laws, antiquated by long disuse, which no one remembers being made and consequently everyone has transgressed. By imposing fines for breaking these laws, the king will get great sums of money, as well as credit for upholding law and order, since the whole procedure can be made to look like justice.<sup>9</sup> Another recommendation is that he forbid under particularly heavy fines a lot of practices that are contrary to the public interest; afterward, he can dispense with his own rules for large sums of money. Thus he pleases the people and makes a double profit, one from the heavy fines imposed on lawbreakers, and the other from selling dispensations. Meanwhile he seems careful of his people’s welfare, since it is plain he will not allow private citizens to do anything contrary to the public interest, except for a huge price.

"Another councillor proposes that he work on the judges so that they will decide every case in favor of the king. They should be summoned to court often, and invited to debate his affairs in the royal presence. However unjust his claims, one or another of the judges, whether from love of contradiction, or desire to seem original, or simply to serve his own interest, will be bound to find some way of twisting the law in the king's favor. If the judges can be brought to differ, then the clearest matter in the world will be obscured, and the truth itself brought into question. The king is given leverage to interpret the law as he will, and everyone else will acquiesce from shame or fear. The judges will have no hesitation about supporting the royal interest, for there are always plenty of pretexts for giving judgment in favor of the king. Either equity is on his side, or the letter of the law happens to make for him, or the words of the law can be twisted into obscurity—or, if all else fails, he can appeal above the law to the royal prerogative, which is a never-failing argument with judges who know their 'duty.'

"Then all the councillors agree with the famous maxim of Crassus: a king can never have too much gold, because he must maintain an army.<sup>1</sup> Further, that a king, even if he wants to, can do no wrong, for all property belongs to the king, and so do his subjects themselves; a man owns nothing but what the king, in his goodness, sees fit to leave him. The king should in fact leave his subjects as little as possible, because his own safety depends on keeping them from growing insolent with wealth and freedom. For riches and liberty make people less patient to endure harsh and unjust commands, whereas meager poverty blunts their spirits, makes them docile, and grinds out of the oppressed the lofty spirit of rebellion.

"Now at this point, suppose I were to get up again and declare that all these counsels are both dishonorable and ruinous to the king? Suppose I said his honor and his safety alike rest on the people's resources rather than his own? Suppose I said that the people choose a king for their own sake, not for his, so that by his efforts and troubles they may live in comfort and safety? This is why, I would say, it is the king's duty to take more care of his people's welfare than of his own, just as it is the duty of a shepherd who cares about his job to feed his sheep rather than himself.<sup>2</sup>

"They are absolutely wrong when they say that the people's poverty safeguards public peace—experience shows the contrary. Where will you find more squabbling than among beggars? Who is more eager for revolution than the man who is most discontented with his present position? Who is more reckless about creating disorder than the man who knows he has nothing to lose and thinks he may have something to gain? If a king is so hated or despised by his subjects that he can rule them only by mistreatment, plundering, confiscation, and pauperization of his people, then he'd do much better to abdicate his throne—for under these circumstances, though he keeps the name of authority, he loses all the majesty of a king. A king has no dignity when he exercises authority over beggars, only when he rules over prosperous and happy subjects. This was certainly what that noble and lofty spirit Fabricius<sup>3</sup> meant when he said he would rather be a ruler of rich men than be rich himself.

"A solitary ruler who enjoys a life of pleasure and self-indulgence while all about him are grieving and groaning is acting like a jailer, not a king. Just as an incompetent doctor can cure his patient of one disease only by throwing him into another, so it's an incompetent king who can rule his people only by depriving them of all life's pleasures. Such a king openly confesses that he does not know how to rule free men.

"A king of this stamp should correct his own sloth or arrogance, because these are the vices that cause people to hate or despise him. Let him live on his own income without wronging others, and limit his spending to his income. Let him curb crime, and by wise training of his subjects keep them from misbehavior, instead of letting it breed and then punishing it. Let him not suddenly revive antiquated laws, especially if they have been long forgotten and never missed. And let him never take money as a fine when a judge would regard an ordinary subject as a low fraud for claiming it.

"Suppose I should then describe for them the law of the Macarians,<sup>4</sup> a people who also live not far from Utopia? On the day that their king first assumes office, he must take an oath confirmed by solemn ceremonies that he will never have in his treasury at any one time more than a thousand pounds in gold, or its equivalent in silver. They say this law was made by an excellent king, who cared more for his country's prosperity than for his own wealth; he established it as a barrier against any king heaping up so much money as to impoverish his people.<sup>5</sup> He thought this sum would enable the king to put down rebellions or repel hostile invasions, but would not tempt him into aggressive adventures. His law was aimed chiefly at keeping the king in check, but he also wanted to ensure an ample supply of money for the daily business transactions of the citizens. Besides, a king who has to distribute all his excess money to the people will not be much disposed to seek out opportunities for extortion. Such a king will be both a terror to evildoers and beloved by the good.—Now, don't you suppose if I set such ideas before men strongly inclined to the contrary, they would turn deaf ears to me?"

"Stone deaf, indeed, there's no doubt about it," I said, "and no wonder! To tell you the truth, I don't think you should offer advice or thrust on people ideas of this sort, that you know will not be listened to. What good can it do? When your listeners are already prepossessed against you and firmly convinced of opposite opinions, how can you win over their minds with such out-of-the-way speeches? This academic philosophy is quite agreeable in the private conversation of close friends, but in the councils of kings, where grave matters are being authoritatively decided, there is no place for it."

"That is just what I was saying," Raphael replied. "There is no place for philosophy in the councils of kings."

"Yes, there is," I said, "but not for this school philosophy which supposes that every topic is suitable for every occasion. There is another philosophy that is better suited for political action, that takes its cue, adapts itself to the drama in hand, and acts its part neatly and appropriately. This is the philosophy for you to use. Otherwise, when a comedy of Plautus is being played,<sup>6</sup> and the household slaves are cracking trivial jokes together, you propose to come on stage in the garb of a philosopher and repeat Seneca's speech to Nero from the Octavia.<sup>7</sup> Wouldn't it be better to take a silent role than to say something wholly inappropriate, and thus turn the play into a tragicomedy? You pervert and ruin a play when you add irrelevant speeches, even if they are better than the original. So go through with the drama in hand as best you can, and don't spoil it all simply because you happen to think of a play by someone else that would be better.

"That's how things go in the commonwealth, and in the councils of princes. If you cannot pluck up bad ideas by the root, if you cannot cure long-standing evils as completely as you would like, you must not therefore abandon the commonwealth. Don't give up the ship in a storm because you cannot hold back the winds. And don't force strange ideas on people who you know have set their minds on a different course from yours. You must strive to influence policy indirectly, handle the situation tactfully, and thus what you cannot turn to good, you may at least make as little bad as possible. For it is impossible to make everything good unless you make all men good, and that I don't expect to see for a long time to come."

"The only result of this," he answered, "will be that while I try to cure others of madness, I'll be raving along with them myself. If I am to speak the truth, I will simply have to talk in the way I have described. For all I know, it may be the business of a philosopher to tell lies, but it certainly isn't mine. Though my advice may be repugnant and irksome to the king's councillors, I don't see why they should consider it eccentric to the point of folly. What if I told them the kind of thing that Plato advocates in his republic, or that the Utopians actually practice in theirs? However superior those institutions might be (and as a matter of fact they are), yet here they would seem inappropriate, because private property is the rule here, and there all things are held in common.

"People who have made up their minds to rush headlong down the opposite road are never pleased with someone who calls them back and tells them they are on the wrong course. But, apart from that, what did I say that could not and should not be said anywhere and everywhere? If we dismiss as out of the question and absurd everything which the perverse customs of men have made to seem alien to us, we shall have to set aside most of the commandments of Christ, even in a community of Christians. Yet he forbade us to dissemble them, and even ordered that what he had whispered to his disciples should be preached openly from the housetops.<sup>8</sup> Most of his teachings differ more radically from the common customs of mankind than my discourse did. But preachers, like the crafty fellows they are, have found that people would rather not change their lives to conform to Christ's rule, and so, just as you suggest, they have accommodated his teaching to the way people live, as if it were a leaden yardstick.<sup>9</sup> At least in that manner they can get the two things to correspond in some way or other. The only real thing they accomplish that I can see is to make people feel more secure about doing evil.

"And this is all that I could accomplish in the councils of princes. For either I would have different ideas from the others, and that would come to the same thing as having no ideas at all, or else I would agree with them, and that, as Mitio says in Terence, would merely confirm them in their madness.<sup>1</sup> When you say I should 'influence policy indirectly,' I simply don't know what you mean; remember, you said I should try hard to handle the situation tactfully, and what can't be made good I should try to make as little bad as possible. In a council, there is no way to dissemble, no way to shut your eyes to things. You must openly approve the worst proposals, and consent to the most vicious policies. A man who went along only halfheartedly even with the worst decisions would immediately get himself a name as a spy and perhaps a traitor. How can one individual do any good when he is surrounded by colleagues who would more readily corrupt the best of men than do any reforming of themselves? Either they will seduce you by their evil ways or, if you keep yourself honest and innocent, you will be made a screen for the knavery and folly of others. Influencing policy indirectly! You wouldn't have a chance.

"This is why Plato in a very fine comparison declares that wise men are right in keeping clear of public business.<sup>2</sup> They see the people swarming through the streets and getting soaked with rain, and they cannot persuade them to go indoors and get out of the wet. They know if they go out themselves, they can do no good but only get drenched with the rest. So they stay indoors and are content to keep at least themselves dry, since they cannot remedy the folly of others.

"But as a matter of fact, my dear More, to tell you what I really think, as long as you have private property, and as long as money is the measure of all things, it is scarcely ever possible for a commonwealth to be just or happy. For justice cannot exist where all the best things in life are held by the worst people; nor can anyone be happy where property is limited to a few, since even those few are always uneasy, and the many are utterly wretched.

"So I reflect on the wonderfully wise and sacred institutions of the Utopians, who are so well governed with so few laws. Among them virtue has its reward, yet everything is shared equally, and everyone lives in plenty. I contrast them with the many other nations, which are constantly passing new ordinances and yet can never order their affairs satisfactorily. In these other nations, whatever a man can get he calls his own private property; but all the mass of laws old and new don't enable him to secure his own, or defend it, or even distinguish it from someone else's property—as is shown by innumerable and interminable lawsuits, fresh ones every day. When I consider all these things, I become more sympathetic to Plato and do not wonder that he declined to make laws for any people who refused to share their goods equally.<sup>3</sup> Wisest of men, he saw easily that the one and only road to the welfare of all lies through the absolute equality of goods. I doubt whether such equality can ever be achieved where property belongs to individuals. However abundant goods may be, when everyone tries to get as much as he can for his own exclusive use, a handful of men end up sharing the whole pile, and the rest are left in poverty. The result generally is two sorts of people whose fortunes ought to be interchanged: the rich are rapacious, wicked, and useless, while the poor are unassuming, modest men who work hard, more for the benefit of the public than of themselves.

"Thus I am wholly convinced that unless private property is entirely done away with, there can be no fair or just distribution of goods, nor can the business of mortals be happily conducted. As long as private property remains, by far the largest and the best part of the human race will be oppressed by a heavy and inescapable burden of cares and anxieties. This load, I admit, may be lightened to some extent, but I maintain it cannot be entirely removed. Laws might be made that no one should own more than a certain amount of land or receive more than a certain income. Or laws might be passed to prevent the prince from becoming too powerful and the populace too unruly. It might be made unlawful for public offices to be solicited, or put up for sale, or made burdensome for the officeholder by great expense. Otherwise, officials are tempted to get their money back by fraud or extortion, and only rich men can afford to accept positions which ought to be held by the wise. Laws of this sort, I agree, may have as much effect as poultices continually applied to sick bodies that are past cure. The social evils I mentioned may be alleviated and their effects mitigated for a while, but so long as private property remains, there is no hope at all of effecting a cure and restoring society to good health. While you try to cure one part, you aggravate the disease in other parts. Suppressing one symptom causes another to break out, since you cannot give something to one person without taking it away from someone else."<sup>4</sup>

"But I don't see it that way," I replied. "It seems to me that people cannot possibly live well where all things are in common. How can there be plenty of commodities where every man stops working? The hope of gain will not spur him on; he will rely on others, and become lazy. If men are driven by need, and yet cannot legally protect what they have gained, what can follow but continual bloodshed and turmoil, especially when respect for magistrates and their authority has been lost? I for one cannot conceive of authority existing among men who are equal to one another in every respect.”<sup>5</sup>

“I’m not surprised,” said Raphael, “that you think of it this way, since you have no idea, or only a false idea, of such a commonwealth. But you should have been with me in Utopia, and seen with your own eyes their manners and customs as I did—for I lived there more than five years, and would never have left, if it had not been to make that new world known to others. If you had seen them, you would frankly confess that you had never seen a people well governed anywhere but there.”

“You will have a hard time persuading me,” said Peter Giles, “that people in that new land are better governed than in the world we know. Our minds are not inferior to theirs, and our governments, I believe, are older. Long experience has helped us develop many conveniences of life, and by good luck we have discovered many other things which human ingenuity could never have hit upon.”

“As for the relative ages of the governments,” Raphael replied, “you might judge more accurately if you had read their histories. If we believe these records, they had cities before there were even people here. What ingenuity has discovered or chance hit upon could have turned up just as well in one place as the other. For the rest, I believe that even if we surpass them in natural intelligence, they leave us far behind in their diligence and zeal to learn.

“According to their chronicles, they had heard nothing of ultra-equatorials (that’s their name for us) until we arrived, except that once, some twelve hundred years ago, a ship which a storm had blown toward Utopia was wrecked on their island. Some Romans and Egyptians were cast ashore, and never departed. Now note how the Utopians profited, through their diligence, from this one chance event. They learned every single useful art of the Roman empire either directly from their guests or indirectly from hints and surmises on which they based their own investigations. What benefits from the mere fact that on a single occasion some Europeans landed there! If a similar accident has hitherto brought anyone here from their land, the incident has been completely forgotten, as it will perhaps be forgotten in time to come that I was ever in their country. From one such accident they made themselves masters of all our useful inventions, but I suspect it will be a long time before we accept any of their institutions which are better than ours. This willingness to learn is, I think, the really important reason for their being better governed and living more happily than we do, though we are not inferior to them in brains or resources."

"Then let me implore you, my dear Raphael," said I, "to describe that island to us. Do not try to be brief, but explain in order everything relating to their land, their rivers, towns, people, manners, institutions, laws—everything, in short, that you think we would like to know. And you can take it for granted that we want to know everything that we don't know yet."

"There's nothing I'd rather do," he replied, "for these things are fresh in my mind. But it will take quite some time."

"In that case," I said, "let's first go to lunch. Afterward, we shall have all the time we want."

"Agreed," he said. So we went in and had lunch. Then we came back to the same spot, and sat down on the bench. I ordered my servants to take care that no one should interrupt us. Peter Giles and I urged Raphael to keep his promise. When he saw that we were attentive and eager to hear him, he sat silent and thoughtful a moment, and then began as follows.

- Note 4: Luxurious living was not, in fact, characteristic of the reign of the parsimonious Henry VII (when Hythloday is supposed to be addressing Cardinal Morton). At this point in the text, the early editions have a marginal gloss—in translation, "Yet nowadays the servants of noblemen think such a haircut quite handsome." This is one of a series of some two hundred glosses, which were supplied by Peter Giles after Erasmus shared More's manuscript with him. The glosses range in length from a single word to a full sentence and provide a valuable record of the response to Utopia (especially to Book II, where they are heavily concentrated) by a particularly well-positioned member of the humanist audience for it. The present edition includes a selection of the more pungent glosses, as footnotes.

[THE GEOGRAPHY OF UTOPIA]<sup>1</sup>

The island of the Utopians is two hundred miles across in the middle part, where it is widest, and is nowhere much narrower than this except toward the two ends, where it gradually tapers. These ends, drawn toward one another as if in a five-hundred-mile circle, make the island crescent-shaped, like a new moon.<sup>2</sup> Between the horns of the crescent, which are about eleven miles apart, the sea enters and spreads into a broad bay. Being sheltered from the wind by the surrounding land, the bay is never rough, but quiet and smooth instead, like a big lake. Thus nearly the whole inner coast is one great harbor, across which ships pass in every direction, to the great advantage of the people. What with shallows on one side and rocks on the other, the entrance into the bay is perilous. Near the middle of the channel, there is one rock that rises above the water, and so presents no danger in itself; on top of it a tower has been built, and there a garrison is kept. Since the other rocks lie underwater, they are very dangerous to navigation. The channels are known only to the Utopians, so hardly any strangers enter the bay without one of their pilots; and even they themselves could not enter safely if they did not direct their course by some landmarks on the coast. If these landmarks were shifted about, the Utopians could easily lure to destruction an enemy fleet coming against them, however big it was.

Woodcut map of Utopia, by Ambrosius Holbein (brother of the more famous Hans Holbein the Younger). This map appeared in the two 1518 editions.

On the outer side of the island there are likewise occasional harbors; but the coast is rugged by nature, and so well fortified that a few defenders could beat off the attack of a strong force. They say (and the appearance of the place confirms this) that their land was not always an island. But Utopus, who conquered the country and gave it his name (it had previously been called Abraxa),<sup>3</sup> and who brought its rude and uncouth inhabitants to such a high level of culture and humanity that they now excel in that regard almost every other people, also changed its geography. After winning the victory at his first landing, he cut a channel fifteen miles wide where their land joined the continent, and caused the sea to flow around the country. He put not only the natives to work at this task, but all his own soldiers too, so that the vanquished would not think the labor a disgrace. With the work divided among so many hands, the project was finished quickly, and the neighboring peoples, who at first had laughed at his folly, were struck with wonder and terror at his success.

There are fifty-four cities on the island, all spacious and magnificent, identical in language, customs, institutions, and laws. So far as the location permits, all of them are built on the same plan and have the same appearance. The nearest are twenty-four miles apart, and the farthest are not so remote that a person cannot go on foot from one to the other in a day.

Once a year each city sends three of its old and experienced citizens to Amaurot to consider affairs of common interest to the island. Amaurot lies at the navel of the land, so to speak, and is convenient to every other district, so it acts as a capital. Every city has enough ground assigned to it so that at least twelve miles of farm land are available in every direction, though where the cities are farther apart, they have much more land.<sup>4</sup> No city wants to enlarge its boundaries,<sup>5</sup> for the inhabitants consider themselves good tenants rather than landlords. At proper intervals all over the countryside they have built houses and furnished them with farm equipment. These houses are inhabited by citizens who come to the country by turns. No rural household has fewer than forty men and women in it, besides two slaves bound to the land. A master and mistress, serious and mature persons, are in charge of each household. Over every thirty households is placed a single phylarch.<sup>6</sup> Each year twenty persons from each household move back to the city, after completing a two-year stint in the country. In their place, twenty others are sent out from town, to learn farm work from those who have already been in the country for a year and are therefore better skilled in farming. They, in turn, will teach those who come the following year. If all were equally unskilled in farm work, and new to it, they might harm the crops out of ignorance. This custom of alternating farm workers is the usual procedure, so that no one will have to do such hard work unwillingly for more than two years; but many of them, who take a natural pleasure in farm life, are allowed to stay longer.

The farm workers till the soil, feed the animals, hew wood, and take it to the city by land or by water, as is more convenient. They breed an enormous number of chickens by a marvelous method. The farmers, not hens, hatch the eggs, by keeping them in a warm place at an even temperature. As soon as they come out of the shell, the chicks recognize the humans, follow them around, and are devoted to them instead of to their mothers.

They raise very few horses, and those full of mettle, which they keep only to exercise the young people in the art of horsemanship.<sup>7</sup> For all the work of plowing and hauling they use oxen, which they agree are inferior to horses over the short haul, but which can hold out longer under heavy burdens, are less subject to disease (as they suppose), and can be kept with less cost and trouble. Moreover, when oxen are too old for work, they can be used for meat.

Grain they use only to make bread.<sup>8</sup> They drink wine, apple or pear cider, or simple water, which they sometimes boil with honey or licorice, of which they have an abundance. Although they know very well, down to the last detail, how much food each city and its surrounding district will consume, they produce much more grain and cattle than they need for themselves, and share the surplus with their neighbors. Whatever goods the folk in the country need which cannot be produced there, they request of the town magistrates, and since there is nothing to be paid or exchanged, they get what they want without any trouble. They generally go to town once a month in any case, for the feast day. When harvest time approaches, the phylarchs in the country notify the town magistrates how many hands will be needed. Crews of harvesters come just when they're wanted, and in one day of good weather they can usually get in the whole crop.

THEIR CITIES, ESPECIALLY AMAUROT

If you know one of their cities, you know them all, for they're exactly alike, except where geography itself makes a difference. So I'll describe one of them, and no matter which. But what one rather than Amaurot, the most worthy of all?—since its eminence is acknowledged by the other cities, which send representatives to the annual meeting there; besides which, I know it best, because I lived there for five full years.

Well, then, Amaurot lies up against a gently sloping hill; the town is almost square in shape. From a little below the crest of the hill, it runs down about two miles to the river Anyder, and then spreads out along the river bank for a somewhat greater distance. The Anyder rises from a small spring about eighty miles above Amaurot, but other streams flow into it, two of them being pretty big, so that, as it runs past Amaurot, the river has grown to a width of five hundred yards. It continues to grow even larger until at last, sixty miles farther along, it is lost in the ocean. In all this stretch between the sea and the city, and also for some miles above the city, the river is tidal, ebbing and flowing every six hours with a swift current.<sup>9</sup> When the tide comes in, it fills the whole Anyder with salt water for about thirty miles, driving the fresh water back. Even above that, for several miles farther, the water is brackish; but a little higher up, as it runs past the city, the water is always fresh, and when the tide ebbs, the river runs clean and sweet all the way to the sea.

The two banks of the river at Amaurot are linked by a bridge, built not on wooden piles but on remarkable stone arches. It is placed at the upper end of the city, farthest removed from the sea, so that ships can sail along the entire length of the city quays without obstruction. There is also another stream, not particularly large, but very gentle and pleasant, which gushes from the hill on which the city is situated, flows down through the center of town, and into the Anyder. The inhabitants have walled around the source of this river, which takes its rise a little outside the town, and joined it to the town proper so that if they should be attacked, the enemy would not be able to cut off the stream or divert or poison it. Water from the stream is carried by tile piping into various sections of the lower town. Where the terrain makes this impractical, they collect rain water in cisterns, which serve just as well.

The town is surrounded by a thick, high wall, with many towers and bastions. On three sides it is also surrounded by a dry ditch, broad and deep and filled with thorn hedges; on its fourth side the river itself serves as a moat. The streets are conveniently laid out for use by vehicles and for protection from the wind. Their buildings are by no means shabby; unbroken rows of houses face each other across the streets along the whole block. The streets are twenty feet wide.<sup>1</sup> Behind each row of houses—at the center of every block and extending the full length of the street—there are large gardens.

Every house has a door to the street and another to the garden. The doors, which are made with two leaves, open easily and swing shut automatically, letting anyone enter who wants to—so there is nothing private anywhere. Every ten years, they change houses by lot. The Utopians are very fond of these gardens of theirs. They raise vines, fruits, herbs, and flowers, so well cared for and flourishing that I have never seen any gardens more productive or elegant than theirs. They keep interested in gardening, partly because they delight in it, and also because of the competition between different blocks, which challenge one another to produce the best gardens.

Certainly you will not easily find anything else in the whole city more useful or more pleasant to the citizens. And this gives reason to think that the founder of the city paid particular attention to the siting of these gardens.

They say that in the beginning the whole city was planned by Utopus himself, but that he left to posterity matters of adornment and improvement such as could not be perfected in one man's lifetime. Their records began 1,760 years ago with the conquest of the island, have been diligently compiled, and are carefully preserved. From these it appears that the first houses were low, like cabins or peasant huts, built out of any sort of timber, with mud-plastered walls and pointed roofs thatched with straw. But now their houses are all three stories high and handsomely constructed; the fronts are faced with fieldstone, quarried rock, or brick, over rubble construction. The roofs are flat, and are covered with a kind of plaster that is cheap but fireproof, and more weather-resistant even than lead.<sup>2</sup> Glass (which is plentiful there) is used in windows to keep out the weather;<sup>3</sup> and they also use thin linen cloth treated with oil or gum so that it lets in more light and keeps out more wind.

THEIR OFFICIALS

Once a year, every group of thirty households elects an official, formerly called the syphogrant,<sup>4</sup> but now called the phylarch. Over every group of ten syphogrants with their households there is another official, once called the tranibor but now known as the head phylarch. All the syphogrants, two hundred in number, elect the governor. They take an oath to choose the man they think best qualified; and then by secret ballot they elect the governor from among four men nominated by the people of the four sections of the city. The governor holds office for life, unless he is suspected of aiming at a tyranny. Though the tranibors are elected annually, they are not changed for light or casual reasons. All their other officials hold office for a single year only.

The tranibors meet to consult with the governor every other day, and more often if necessary: they discuss affairs of state, and settle any disputes between private parties (there are very few), acting as quickly as possible.<sup>5</sup> The tranibors always invite two syphogrants to the senate chamber, different ones every day. There is a rule that no decision can be made on a matter of public business unless it has been discussed in the senate on three separate days. It is a capital offense to make plans about public business outside of the senate or the popular assembly. The purpose of these rules, they say, is to prevent the governor and the tranibors from conspiring together to alter the government and enslave the people. Therefore all matters which are considered important are first laid before the assembly of the syphogrants. They talk the matter over with the households they represent, debate it with one another, then report their recommendation to the senate. Sometimes a question is brought before the general council of the whole island.

The senate also has a standing rule never to discuss a matter on the day when it is first introduced; all new business is deferred to the next meeting.<sup>6</sup> They do this so that a man will not blurt out the first thought that occurs to him, and then devote all his energies to defending those foolish impulses, instead of considering impartially the public good. They know that some men would rather jeopardize the general welfare than admit to having been heedless and shortsighted—so perverse and preposterous is their sense of pride. They should have had enough foresight at the beginning to speak with prudence rather than haste.

THEIR OCCUPATIONS

Agriculture is the one occupation at which everyone works, men and women alike, with no exceptions. They are trained in it from childhood, partly in the schools, where they learn theory, and partly through field trips to nearby farms, which make something like a game of practical instruction. On these trips they not only watch the work being done, but frequently pitch in and get a workout by doing the jobs themselves.

Besides farm work (which, as I said, everybody performs), each person is taught a particular trade of his own, such as wool-working, linen-making, masonry, metal-work, or carpentry. There is no other craft that is practiced by any considerable number of them.<sup>7</sup>

Throughout the island people wear, and throughout their lives always wear, the same style of clothing, except for the distinction between the sexes, and between married and unmarried persons. Their clothing is attractive, does not hamper bodily movement, and serves for warm as well as cold weather; what is more, each household makes its own.

Every person (and this includes women as well as men) learns a second trade, besides agriculture. As the weaker sex, women practice the lighter crafts, such as working in wool or linen; the heavier jobs are assigned to the men. As a rule, the son is trained to his father's craft, for which most feel a natural inclination. But if anyone is attracted to another occupation, he is transferred by adoption into a family practicing the trade he prefers. Both his father and the authorities make sure that he is assigned to a grave and responsible householder. After someone has learned one trade, if he wants to learn another he gets the same permission. When he has learned both, he pursues whichever he likes better, unless the city needs one more than the other.

The chief and almost the only business of the syphogrants is to manage matters so that no one sits around in idleness, and assure that everyone works hard at his trade. But no one has to exhaust himself with endless toil from early morning to late at night, as if he were a beast of burden. Such wretchedness, really worse than slavery, is the common lot of workmen almost everywhere except Utopia.<sup>8</sup> Of the day's twenty-four hours, the Utopians devote only six to work. They work three hours before noon, when they go to lunch. After lunch they rest for a couple of hours, then go to work for another three hours. Then they have supper, and at eight o'clock (counting the first hour after noon as one) they go to bed, and sleep eight hours.

The other hours of the day, when they are not working, eating, or sleeping, are left to each person's individual discretion, provided that free time is not wasted in roistering or sloth but used properly in some chosen occupation. Generally these periods are devoted to intellectual activity. For they have an established custom of giving daily public lectures before dawn;<sup>9</sup> attendance at these lectures is required only of those who have been specially chosen to devote themselves to learning, but a great many other people, both men and women, choose voluntarily to attend. Depending on their interests, some go to one lecture, some to another. But if anyone would rather devote his spare time to his trade, as many do who don't care for the intellectual life, this is not discouraged; in fact, such persons are commended as especially useful to the commonwealth.

After supper, they devote an hour to recreation, in their gardens in summer, or during winter in the common halls where they have their meals. There they either play music or amuse themselves with conversation. They know nothing about gambling with dice, or other such foolish and ruinous games.<sup>1</sup> They do play two games not unlike chess. One is a battle of numbers, in which one number captures another. The other is a game in which the vices fight a battle against the virtues. The game is ingeniously set up to show how the vices oppose one another, yet combine against the virtues; then, what vices oppose what virtues, how they try to assault them openly or undermine them insidiously; how the defenses of the virtues can break the strength of the vices or skillfully elude their plots; and finally, by what means one side or the other gains the victory.<sup>2</sup>

But in all this, you may get a wrong impression, if we don't go back and consider one point more carefully. Because they allot only six hours to work, you might think the necessities of life would be in scant supply. This is far from the case. Their working hours are ample to provide not only enough but more than enough of the necessities and even the conveniences of life. You will easily appreciate this if you consider how large a part of the population in other countries exists without doing any work at all. In the first place, hardly any of the women, who are a full half of the population, work;<sup>3</sup> or, if they do, then as a rule their husbands lie snoring in bed. Then there is a great lazy gang of priests and so-called religious.<sup>4</sup>

Add to them all the rich, especially the landlords, who are commonly called gentlemen and nobles. Include with them their retainers, that mob of swaggering bullies. Finally, reckon in with these the sturdy and lusty beggars who go about feigning some disease as an excuse for their idleness. You will certainly find that the things which satisfy our needs are produced by far fewer hands than you had supposed.

And now consider how few of those who do work are doing really essential things. For where money is the standard of everything, many vain, superfluous trades are bound to be carried on simply to satisfy luxury and licentiousness. Suppose the multitude of those who now work were limited to a few trades, and set to producing just those commodities that nature really requires. They would be bound to produce so much that prices would drop and the workmen would be unable to gain a living. But suppose again that all the workers in useless trades were put to useful ones, and that all the idlers (who now guzzle twice as much as the workingmen who make what they consume) were assigned to productive tasks—well, you can easily see how little time would be enough and more than enough to produce all the goods that human needs and conveniences require—yes, and human pleasure too, as long as it's true and natural pleasure.

The experience of Utopia makes this perfectly apparent. In each city and its surrounding countryside barely five hundred of those men and women whose age and strength make them fit for work are exempted from it.<sup>5</sup> Among these are the syphogrants, who by law are free not to work; yet they don't take advantage of the privilege, preferring to set a good example to their fellow citizens. Some others are permanently exempted from work so that they may devote themselves to study, but only on the recommendation of the priests<sup>6</sup> and through a secret vote of the syphogrants. If any of these scholars disappoints their hopes, he becomes a workman again. On the other hand, it happens from time to time that a craftsman devotes his leisure so earnestly to study, and makes such progress as a result, that he is relieved of manual labor and promoted to the class of learned men. From this class of scholars are chosen ambassadors, priests, tranibors, and the governor himself, who used to be called Barzanes, but in their modern tongue is known as Ademus.<sup>7</sup> Since almost all the rest of the population is neither idle nor occupied in useless trades, it is easy to see why they produce so much in so short a working day.

Apart from all this, in several of the necessary crafts their way of life requires less total labor than does that of people elsewhere. In other countries, building and repairing houses requires the constant work of many men, because what a father has built, his thriftless heir lets fall into ruin; and then his successor has to repair, at great expense, what could easily have been maintained at a very small charge. Further, when a man has built a splendid house at vast cost, someone else may think he has finer taste, let the first house fall to ruin, and then build another one somewhere else for just as much money. But among the Utopians, where everything has been well ordered and the commonwealth properly established, building a brand-new home on a new site is a rare event. They are not only quick to repair damage, but foresighted in preventing it. The result is that their buildings last for a very long time with minimal repairs; and the carpenters and masons sometimes have so little to do that they are set to hewing timber and cutting stone in case some future need for it should arise.

Consider, too, how little labor their clothing requires. Their work clothes are unpretentious garments made of leather, which last seven years. When they go out in public, they cover these rough working-clothes with a cloak. Throughout the entire island, these cloaks are of the same color, which is that of natural wool.<sup>8</sup> As a result, they not only need less wool than people in other countries, but what they do need is less expensive. Even so, they use linen cloth most, because it requires least labor. They like linen cloth to be white and wool cloth to be clean; but they put no price on fineness of texture. Elsewhere a man may not be satisfied with four or five woollen cloaks of different colors and as many silk shirts; or if he's a clotheshorse, even ten are not enough. But there everyone is content with a single cloak, and generally wears it for two years.

There is no reason at all why he should want any others, for if he had them, he would not be better protected against the cold, nor would he appear in any way better dressed.

Since there is an abundance of everything, as a result of everyone working at useful trades and the trades requiring less work, they sometimes assemble great numbers of people to work on the roads, if any of them need repairing. And when there is no need even for this sort of work, then the officials very often proclaim a shorter workday, since they never force their citizens to perform useless labor. The chief aim of their constitution is that, whenever public needs permit, all citizens should be free to withdraw as much time as possible from the service of the body and devote themselves to the freedom and culture of the mind. For in that, they think, is the real happiness of life.

SOCIAL RELATIONS

Now I must explain how the citizens behave toward one another, the nature of their social relations, and how they distribute their goods within the society.

Each city, then, consists of households, the households consisting generally of blood-relations. When the women grow up and are married, they move into their husbands' households. On the other hand, male children and after them grandchildren remain in the family, and are subject to the oldest member, unless his mind has started to fail, in which case the next oldest takes his place. To keep the cities from becoming too large or too small, they take care that there should be no more than six thousand households in each (exclusive of the surrounding countryside), each family containing between ten and sixteen adults.<sup>9</sup> They do not, of course, try to regulate the number of minor children in a family. The limit on adults is easily observed by transferring individuals from a household with too many into a household with not enough. Likewise if a city has too many people, the extra persons serve to make up a shortage of population in other cities. And if the population throughout the entire island exceeds the quota, they enroll citizens out of every city and plant a colony under their own laws on the mainland near them, wherever the natives have plenty of unoccupied and uncultivated land. Those natives who want to live with the Utopian settlers are taken in. When such a merger occurs, the two peoples gradually and easily blend together, sharing the same way of life and customs, much to the advantage of both. For by their policies the Utopians make the land yield an abundance for all, though previously it had seemed too poor and barren even to support the natives. But if the natives will not join in living under their laws, the Utopians drive them out of the land they claim for themselves, and if they resist make war on them. They think it is perfectly justifiable to make war on people who leave their land idle and waste, yet forbid the use of it to others who, by the law of nature, ought to be supported from it.

If for any reason one of their cities shrinks so sharply in population that it cannot be made up from other cities without bringing them too under proper strength, the numbers are restored by bringing people back from the colonies. This has happened only twice, they say, in their whole history, both times as a result of a frightful plague. They would rather that their colonies disappeared than that any of the cities on their island should get too small.

But to return to their manner of living. The oldest of every household, as I said, is the ruler. Wives are subject to their husbands, children to their parents, and generally the younger to their elders.<sup>1</sup> Every city is divided into four equal districts, and in the middle of each district is a market for all kinds of commodities. Whatever each household produces is brought here and stored in warehouses, each kind of goods in its own place. Here the head of each household looks for what he or his family needs, and carries off what he wants without any sort of payment or compensation. Why should anything be refused him? There is plenty of everything, and no reason to fear that anyone will claim more than he needs. Why would anyone be suspected of asking for more than is needed, when everyone knows there will never be any shortage? Fear of want, no doubt, makes every living creature greedy and rapacious—and, in addition, man develops these qualities out of sheer pride, pride which glories in getting ahead of others by a superfluous display of possessions. But this kind of vice has no place whatever in the Utopian way of life.

Next to the marketplace of which I just spoke are the food markets, where people bring all sorts of vegetables, fruit, and bread. Fish, meat, and poultry are also brought there from designated places outside the city, where running water can carry away all the blood and refuse. Bondsmen do the slaughtering and cleaning in these places: citizens are not allowed to do such work. The Utopians feel that slaughtering our fellow creatures gradually destroys the sense of compassion, which is the finest sentiment of which our human nature is capable. Besides, they don't allow anything dirty or filthy to be brought into the city, lest the air become tainted by putrefaction and thus infectious.

Each block has its own spacious halls, equally distant from one another, and each known by a special name. In these halls live the syphogrants. Thirty families are assigned to each hall, to take their meals in common<sup>2</sup>—fifteen live on one side of the hall, fifteen on the other. The stewards of all the halls meet at a fixed time in the market and get food according to the number of persons for whom each is responsible.

But first consideration goes to the sick, who are cared for in public hospitals. Every city has four of these, built at the city limits, slightly outside the walls, and spacious enough to appear like little towns. The hospitals are large for two reasons: so that the sick, however numerous they may be, will not be packed closely and uncomfortably together, and also so that those who have a contagious disease, such as might pass from one to the other, may be isolated. The hospitals are well ordered and supplied with everything needed to cure the patients, who are nursed with tender and watchful care. Highly skilled physicians are in constant attendance. Consequently, though nobody is sent there against his will, there is hardly anyone in the city who would not rather be treated for an illness at the hospital than at home.

When the hospital steward has received the food prescribed for the sick by their doctors, the best of the remainder is fairly divided among the halls according to the number in each, except that special regard is paid to the governor, the high priest, and the tranibors, as well as to ambassadors and foreigners, if there are any. In fact, foreigners are very few; but when they do come, they have certain furnished houses assigned to them.

At the hours of lunch and supper, a brazen trumpet summons the entire syphogranty to assemble in their hall, except for those who are bedridden in the hospitals or at home. After the halls have been served with their quotas of food, nothing prevents an individual from taking food home from the marketplace. They realize that no one would do this without good reason. For while it is not forbidden to eat at home, no one does it willingly, because it is not thought proper; and besides, it would be stupid to take the trouble of preparing a worse meal at home when there is an elegant and sumptuous one near at hand in the hall.

In this hall, slaves do all the particularly dirty and heavy work. But planning the meal, as well as preparing and cooking the food, is carried out by the women alone, with each family taking its turn. Depending on their number, they sit down at three or more tables. The men sit with their backs to the wall, the women on the outside, so that if a woman has a sudden qualm or pain, such as occasionally happens during pregnancy, she may get up without disturbing the others and go off to the nurses.

A separate dining room is assigned to the nurses and infants, with a plentiful supply of cradles, clean water, and a warm fire. Thus the nurses may lay the infants down, or remove their swaddling clothes and let them refresh themselves by playing freely before the fire. Each child is nursed by its own mother, unless death or illness prevents. When that happens, the wives of the syphogrants quickly find a nurse. The problem is not difficult. Any woman who can, gladly volunteers for the job, since everyone applauds her kindness and the child itself regards its nurse as its natural mother.

Children under the age of five sit together in the nursery. All other minors, both boys and girls up to the age of marriage, either wait on table or, if not old and strong enough for that, stand by in absolute silence. Both groups eat whatever is handed to them by those sitting at the table, and have no other set time for their meals.

The syphogrant with his wife sits at the middle of the first table, in the highest part of the dining hall. This is the place of greatest honor, and from this table, which is placed crosswise to the others, the whole gathering can be seen. Two of the eldest sit with them, for they always sit in groups of four; if there is a church in the district, the priest and his wife sit with the syphogrant, so as to preside.<sup>3</sup> On both sides of them sit younger people, next to them older people again, and so through the hall: those of about the same age sit together, yet are mingled with others of a different age. The reason for this, as they explain it, is that the dignity of the aged, and the respect due them, may restrain the younger people from improper freedom of words and gestures, since nothing said or done at table can pass unnoticed by the old, who are present on every side.

Dishes of food are not served down the tables in order from top to bottom, but all the old persons, who are seated in conspicuous places, are served with the best food; and then equal shares are given to the rest. The old people, as they feel inclined, give their neighbors a share of those delicacies which are not plentiful enough to be served to everyone. Thus due respect is paid to seniority, yet everyone enjoys some of the benefits.

They begin every lunch and supper with some reading on a moral topic,<sup>4</sup> but keep it brief lest it become a bore. Taking that as an occasion, the elders introduce proper topics of conversation, which they try not to make gloomy or dull. They never monopolize the conversation with long monologues, but are eager to hear what the young people say. In fact, they deliberately draw them out, in order to discover the natural temper and quality of each one's mind, as revealed in the freedom of mealtime talk.

Their lunches are light, their suppers rather more elaborate, because lunch is followed by work, supper by rest and a night's sleep, which they think particularly helpful to good digestion. No evening meal passes without music, and the dessert course is never scanted; during the meal, they burn incense and scatter perfume, omitting nothing which will make the occasion festive. For they are somewhat inclined to think that no kind of pleasure is forbidden, provided harm does not come of it.

This is the pattern of life in the city; but in the country, where they are farther removed from neighbors, they all eat in their own homes. No family lacks for food, since, after all, whatever the city-dwellers eat comes originally from those in the country.

THE TRAVELS [AND TRADE] OF THE UTOPIANS

Anyone who wants to visit friends in another city, or simply to see the place itself, can easily obtain permission from his syphogrant and tranibor, unless for some special reason he is needed at home. They travel together in groups, taking a letter from the governor granting leave to travel and fixing a day of return. They are given a wagon and a public slave to drive the oxen and look after them, but unless women are in the company they dispense with the wagon as an unnecessary bother. Wherever they go, though they take nothing with them, they never lack for anything, because they are at home everywhere. If they stay more than a day in one place, each one practices his trade there, and is kindly received by his fellow artisans.

Anyone who takes upon himself to leave his district without permission, and is caught without the governor's letter, is treated with contempt, brought back as a runaway, and severely punished. If he is bold enough to try it a second time, he is made a slave. Anyone who wants to stroll about and explore the extent of his own district is not prevented, provided he first obtains his father's permission and his wife's consent. But wherever he goes in the countryside, he gets no food until he has completed either a morning's or an afternoon's stint of work. On these terms, he may go where he pleases within his own district, yet be just as useful to the city as if he were at home.

So you see there is no chance to loaf or any pretext for evading work; there are no wine bars or alehouses or brothels, no chances for corruption, no hiding places, no spots for secret meetings. Because they live in the full view of all, they are bound to be either working at their usual trades or enjoying their leisure in a respectable way. Such customs must necessarily result in plenty of life's good things, and since they share everything equally, it follows that no one can ever be reduced to poverty or forced to beg.

In the senate at Amaurot (to which, as I said before, three representatives come every year from each city), they survey the island to find out where there are shortages and surpluses, and promptly satisfy one district's shortage with another's surplus. These are outright gifts; those who give receive nothing in return from those to whom they give. Though they give freely to one city, asking nothing in return, they get freely from another to which they gave nothing; and thus the whole island is like a single family.

After they have accumulated enough for themselves—and this they consider to be a full two-years' store, because next year's crop is always uncertain—then they export their surpluses to other countries: great quantities of grain, honey, wool, flax, timber, scarlet and purple dyestuffs, hides, wax, tallow, and leather, as well as livestock. One-seventh of their cargo they give freely to the poor of the importing country, and the rest they sell at moderate prices. In exchange they receive not only such goods as they lack at home (in fact, about the only important thing they lack is iron) but immense quantities of silver and gold. They have been carrying on trade for a long time now, and have accumulated a greater supply of the precious metals than you would believe possible. As a result, they now care very little whether they sell for cash or on credit, and most payments to them actually take the form of promissory notes. However, in all such transactions, they never trust individuals but insist that the foreign city become officially responsible. When the day of payment comes, the city collects the money due from private debtors, puts it into the treasury, and enjoys the use of it till the Utopians claim payment. Most of it, in fact, is never claimed. The Utopians think it hardly right to take what they don't need away from people who do need it. But if they need to lend some part of the money to another nation, then they call it in—as they do also when they must wage war. This is the only reason that they keep such an immense treasure at home, as a protection against extreme peril or sudden emergency. They use it above all to hire, at extravagant rates of pay, foreign mercenaries, whom they would much rather risk in battle than their own citizens. They know very well that for large enough sums of money many of the enemy's soldiers can themselves be bought off or set at odds with one another, either secretly or openly.<sup>5</sup>

[THEIR ATTITUDE TO GOLD AND SILVER]

For this reason, therefore, they have accumulated a vast treasure; but they do not keep it like a treasure. I'm really quite ashamed to tell you how they do keep it, because you probably won't believe me. I would not have believed it myself if someone had just told me about it; but I was there, and saw it with my own eyes. It is a general rule that the more different anything is from what people are used to, the harder it is to accept. But, considering that all their other customs are so unlike ours, a sensible judge will perhaps not be surprised that they treat gold and silver quite differently from the way we do. After all, they never do use money among themselves, but keep it only for a contingency which may or may not actually arise. So in the meanwhile they take care that no one shall overvalue gold and silver, of which money is made, beyond what the metals themselves deserve. Anyone can see, for example, that iron is far superior to either; men could not live without iron, by heaven, any more than without fire or water. But Nature granted to gold and silver no function with which we cannot easily dispense. Human folly has made them precious because they are rare. In contrast, Nature, like a most indulgent mother, has placed the best things out in the open, like air, water, and the earth itself; but vain and unprofitable things she has hidden away in remote places.

If in Utopia gold and silver were kept locked up in some tower, foolish heads among the common people might concoct a story that the governor and senate were out to cheat ordinary folk and get some advantage for themselves. They might indeed put the gold and silver into plate-ware and such handiwork, but then in case of necessity the people would not want to give up such articles, on which they had begun to fix their hearts, only to melt them down for soldiers' pay. To avoid all these inconveniences, they thought of a plan which conforms with their institutions as clearly as it contrasts with our own. Unless one has actually seen it working, their plan may seem incredible, because we prize gold so highly and are so careful about protecting it. While they eat from pottery dishes and drink from glass cups, well made but inexpensive, their chamber pots and all their humblest vessels, for use in the common halls and even in private homes, are made of gold and silver.<sup>6</sup> The chains and heavy fetters of slaves are also made of these metals. Finally, criminals who are to bear the mark of some disgraceful act are forced to wear golden rings in their ears and on their fingers, golden chains around their necks, and even golden headbands. Thus they hold gold and silver up to scorn in every conceivable way. As a result, if they had to part with their entire supply of these metals, which other nations give up with as much agony as if they were being disemboweled, the Utopians would feel it no more than the loss of a penny.

They pick up pearls by the seashore, and diamonds and garnets from certain cliffs, but never go out of set purpose to look for them. If they happen to find some, they polish them and give them to the children, who, when they are small, feel proud and pleased with such gaudy decorations. But after, when they grow a bit older, and notice that only babies like such toys, they lay them aside. Their parents don't have to say anything; the children simply put these trifles away out of shame, just as our children when they grow up put away their marbles, baubles, and dolls.

These customs so different from those of other people produce quite different attitudes: this never became clearer to me than it did in the case of the Anemolian<sup>7</sup> ambassadors, who came to Amaurot while I was there. Because they came to discuss important business, the national council had assembled ahead of time, three citizens from each city. The ambassadors from nearby nations, who had visited Utopia before and knew something of their customs, understood that fine clothing was not respected in that land, silk was despised, and gold a badge of contempt; therefore they always came in the very plainest of their clothes. But the Anemolians, who lived farther off and had had fewer dealings with the Utopians, had heard only that they all dressed alike and very simply; so they took for granted that their hosts had nothing to wear that they didn't put on. Being themselves rather more proud than wise, they decided to dress as resplendently as the very gods, and dazzle the eyes of the poor Utopians by the glitter of their garb.

Consequently the three ambassadors made a grand entry with a suite of a hundred attendants, all in clothing of many colors, and most in silk. Being noblemen at home, the ambassadors were arrayed in cloth of gold, with heavy gold chains on their necks, gold earrings, gold rings on their fingers, and sparkling strings of pearls and gems on their caps. In fact, they were decked out in all the articles which in Utopia are used to punish slaves, shame wrongdoers, or entertain infants. It was a sight to see how they strutted when they compared their finery with the dress of the Utopians, who had poured out into the streets to see them pass. But it was just as funny to see how wide they fell of the mark, and how far they were from getting the consideration they wanted and expected. Except for a very few Utopians who for some special reason had visited foreign countries, all the onlookers considered this pomp and splendor a mark of disgrace. They therefore bowed to the humblest of the party as lords, and took the ambassadors, because of their golden chains, to be slaves, passing them by without any reverence at all. You might have seen children, who had themselves thrown away their pearls and gems, nudge their mothers when they saw the ambassadors' jeweled caps, and say:

"Look at that big lummo, mother, who's still wearing pearls and jewels as if he were a little boy!"

But the mother, in all seriousness, would answer:

"Hush, son, I think he is one of the ambassadors' fools."

Others found fault with the golden chains as useless, because they were so flimsy any slave could break them, and so loose that he could easily shake them off and run away whenever he wanted, footloose and fancy-free. But after the ambassadors had spent a couple of days among the Utopians, they saw the immense amounts of gold which were as thoroughly despised there as they were prized at home. They saw too that more gold and silver went into making the chains and fetters of a single runaway slave than into costuming all three of them. Somewhat ashamed and crestfallen, they put away all the finery in which they had strutted so arrogantly, especially after they had talked with the Utopians enough to learn their customs and opinions.

[THEIR PHILOSOPHY]

The Utopians marvel that any mortal can take pleasure in the dubious sparkle of a little jewel or bright gemstone, when he has a star, or the sun itself, to look at. They are amazed at the foolishness of any man who considers himself a nobler fellow because he wears clothing of specially fine wool. No matter how delicate the thread, they say, a sheep wore it once, and still was nothing but a sheep.<sup>8</sup> They are surprised that gold, a useless commodity in itself, is everywhere valued so highly that man himself, who for his own purposes conferred this value on it, is considered far less valuable than the gold. They do not understand why a dunderhead with no more brains than a post, and who is as depraved as he is foolish, should command a great many wise and good men simply because he happens to have a great pile of gold. Yet if this master should lose his money to the lowest rascal in his household (as can happen by chance, or through some legal trick—for the law can produce reversals as violent as Fortune herself), he would promptly become the servant of his servant, as if he were personally attached to the coins, and a mere appendage to them.<sup>9</sup> Even more than this, the Utopians are appalled at those people who practically worship a rich man, though they neither owe him anything nor are obligated to him in any way. What impresses them is simply that the man is rich. Yet all the while they know he is so mean and grasping that as long as he lives not a single penny out of that great mound of money will ever come their way.

These and the like attitudes the Utopians have picked up partly from their upbringing, since the institutions of their commonwealth are completely opposed to such folly, and partly from instruction and their reading of good books. For though not many people in each city are excused from labor and assigned to scholarship full-time (these are persons who from childhood have given evidence of excellent character, unusual intelligence, and devotion to learning), every child gets an introduction to good literature, and throughout their lives a large part of the people, men and women alike, spend their leisure time in reading.

They study all the branches of learning in their native tongue, which is not deficient in terminology or unpleasant in sound, and adapts itself as well as any to the expression of thought. Just about the same language is spoken throughout that entire area of the world, though elsewhere it is corrupted to various degrees.

Before we came there, the Utopians had never so much as heard about a single one of those philosophers<sup>1</sup> whose names are so celebrated in our part of the world. Yet in music, dialectic, arithmetic, and geometry they have found out just about the same things as our great men of the past. But while they equal the ancients in almost all subjects, they are far from matching the inventions of our modern logicians.<sup>2</sup> In fact they have not discovered even one of those elaborate rules about restrictions, amplifications, and suppositions which our own young men study in the Little Logicbook.<sup>3</sup> They are so far from being able to speculate on "second intentions" that not one of them was able to see "man-in-general,"<sup>4</sup> though I pointed straight at him with my finger, and he is, as you well know, bigger than any giant, maybe even a colossus. On the other hand, they have learned to plot expertly the courses of the stars and the movements of the heavenly bodies. They have devised a number of different instruments by which they compute with the greatest exactness the course and position of the sun, the moon, and the other stars that are visible in their area of the sky. As for the conjunctions and oppositions of the planets, and that whole deceitful business of divination by the stars, they have never so much as dreamed of it.<sup>5</sup> From long experience in observation, they are able to forecast rains, winds, and other changes in the weather. But as to the causes of the weather, of the tides in the sea and its saltiness, and the origins and nature of the heavens and the earth, they have various opinions. They agree with our ancient philosophers on some matters, but on others, just as the ancients disagreed with one another, so the Utopians differ from all the ancients and yet reach no consensus among themselves.

In matters of moral philosophy, they carry on the same arguments as we do. They inquire into the nature of the good, distinguishing goods of the body from goods of the mind and external goods.<sup>6</sup> They ask whether the name of "good" may be applied to all three, or applies only to goods of the mind. They discuss virtue and pleasure, but their chief concern is what to think of human happiness, and whether it consists of one thing or of more. On this point, they seem overly inclined to the view of those who think that all or most human happiness consists of pleasure.<sup>7</sup> And what is more surprising, they seek support for this comfortable opinion from their religion, which is serious and strict, indeed almost stern and forbidding. For they never discuss happiness without joining to their philosophic rationalism certain principles drawn from religion. Without these religious principles, they think that reason by itself is weak and defective in its efforts to investigate true happiness.

Their religious principles are of this nature: that the soul of man is immortal, and by God's goodness born for happiness; that after this life, rewards are appointed for our virtues and good deeds, punishments for our sins. Though these are indeed religious beliefs, they think that reason leads us to believe and accept them. And they add unhesitatingly that if these beliefs were rejected, no one would be so stupid as not to feel that he should seek pleasure, regardless of right and wrong. His only care would be to keep a lesser pleasure from standing in the way of a greater one, and to avoid pleasures that are inevitably followed by pain.<sup>8</sup> They think you would have to be actually crazy to pursue harsh and painful virtue, give up the pleasures of life, and suffer pain from which you can expect no advantage. For if there is no reward after death, you have no compensation for having passed your entire existence without pleasure, that is, miserably.

To be sure, they believe happiness is found, not in every kind of pleasure, but only in good and honest pleasure. Virtue itself, they say, draws our nature to this kind of pleasure, as to the supreme good. There is an opposed school which declares that virtue is itself happiness.<sup>9</sup>

They define virtue as living according to nature;<sup>1</sup> and God, they say, created us to that end. When an individual obeys the dictates of reason in choosing one thing and avoiding another, he is following nature. Now the first rule of reason is to love and venerate the Divine Majesty to whom we owe our existence and our capacity for happiness. The second rule of nature is to lead a life as free of anxiety and as full of joy as possible, and to help all one's fellow men toward that end. The most hard-faced eulogist of virtue and the grimmest enemy of pleasure, while they invite us to toil and sleepless nights and self-laceration, still admonish us to relieve the poverty and misfortune of others as best we can. It is especially praiseworthy, they tell us, when we provide for our fellow creatures' comfort and welfare. Nothing is more humane (and humanity is the virtue most proper to human beings) than to relieve the misery of others and, by removing all sadness from their lives, restore them to enjoyment, that is, pleasure. Well, if this is the case, why doesn't nature equally invite us to do the same thing for ourselves? Either a joyful life (that is, one of pleasure) is a good thing, or it isn't. If it isn't, then you should not help anyone to it—indeed, you ought to take it away from everyone you can, as being harmful and deadly to them. But if such a life is good, and if we are supposed, indeed obliged, to help others to it, why shouldn't we first of all seek it for ourselves, to whom we owe no less charity than to anyone else?

When nature prompts you to be kind to your neighbors, she does not mean that you should be cruel and merciless to yourself.<sup>2</sup> Thus they say that nature herself prescribes for us a joyous life, in other words, pleasure, as the goal of our actions; and living according to her prescriptions is to be defined as virtue. But as nature bids mortals to make one another's lives merrier, to the extent that they can, so she warns us constantly not to seek our own advantage in ways that cause misfortune to our fellows. And the reason for this is an excellent one; for no one is placed so far above the rest that he is nature's sole concern: she cherishes alike all those living beings to whom she has granted the same form.

Consequently, the Utopians maintain that one should not only abide by private agreements but also obey all those public laws which control the distribution of vital goods, such as are the very substance of pleasure. Any such laws, provided they have been properly promulgated by a good king, or ratified by a people free of force and fraud, should be observed; and as long as they are observed, to pursue your own interests is prudent; to pursue the public interest as well is pious; but to pursue your own pleasure by depriving others of theirs is unjust. On the other hand, deliberately to decrease one's own pleasure in order to augment that of others is a work of humanity and benevolence which never fails to reward the doer over and above his sacrifice. You may be repaid for your kindness; and in any case you are conscious of having done a good deed. Your mind draws more joy from recalling the affection and good will of those whom you have benefited than your body would have drawn pleasure from the things you gave up. Finally, they believe (as religion easily persuades a well-disposed mind to believe) that God will recompense us, for surrendering a brief and transitory pleasure here, with immense and neverending joy in heaven. And so they conclude, after carefully considering and weighing the matter, that all our actions and the virtues exercised within them look toward pleasure and happiness as their ultimate end.

By pleasure they understand every state or movement of body or mind in which we find delight in accordance with the behests of nature. They are right in adding that the desire must accord with nature. By simply following our senses and right reason<sup>3</sup> we may discover what is pleasant by nature: it is a delight that does not injure others, that does not preclude a greater pleasure, and that is not followed by pain. But a pleasure which is against nature, and which men call "delightful" only by the emptiest of fictions (as if one could change the real nature of things just by changing their names), does not, they hold, really make for happiness; in fact, they say it often precludes happiness. And the reason is that men whose minds are filled with false ideas of pleasure have no room left for true and genuine delight. As a matter of fact, there are a great many things which have no genuine sweetness in them but are for the most part actually bitter, yet which, through the perverse enticements of evil desires, are considered very great pleasures, and even included among the supreme goals of life.

Among the devotees of this false pleasure, they include those whom I mentioned before, the people who think themselves finer fellows because they wear finer clothes. These people are twice mistaken: first in thinking their clothes better than anyone else's, and then in thinking themselves better because of their clothes. As far as a garment's usefulness goes, what does it matter if it was woven of fine thread or coarse? Yet they act as if they were set apart by Nature herself, rather than their own fantasies; they strut about, and put on airs. Because they have a fancy suit, they think themselves entitled to honors they would never have expected if they were dressed in homespun, and they grow indignant if someone passes them by without showing special respect.

It is the same kind of absurdity to be pleased by empty, ceremonial honors. What true and natural pleasure can you get from someone's bent knee or bared head? Will the creaks in your own knees be eased thereby, or the madness in your head? The phantom of false pleasure is illustrated by others who run mad with delight over their own blue blood, plume themselves on their nobility, and applaud themselves for all their rich ancestors (the only ancestors that count nowadays), and especially for all their ancient family estates. Even if they don't have the shred of an estate themselves, or if they've squandered every penny of their inheritance, they don't consider themselves a bit less noble.

In the same class the Utopians put those people I described before who are mad for jewelry and gems, and think themselves divinely happy if they find a good specimen, especially of the sort that happens to be fashionable in their country at the time—for stones vary in value from one market to another. The collector will not make an offer for a stone till it's taken out of its gold setting, and even then he will not buy unless the dealer guarantees and gives security that it is a true and genuine stone. What he fears is that his eyes will be deceived by a counterfeit. But if you consider the matter, why should a counterfeit give any less pleasure, when your eyes cannot distinguish it from a real gem? Both should be of equal value to you—as they would be, in fact, to a blind man.<sup>4</sup>

What about those who pile up money not because they want to do anything with the heap, but so they can sit and look at it? Is that true pleasure they experience, or aren't they simply cheated by a show of pleasure? Or what of those with the opposite vice, who hide away gold they will never use and perhaps never even see again? In their anxiety to hold onto it, they actually lose it. For what else happens when you deprive yourself, and perhaps other people too, of a chance to use your gold, by burying it in the ground? And yet when you've hidden your treasure away, you exult over it as if your mind were now free to rejoice. Suppose someone stole it, and you died ten years later, knowing nothing of the theft. During all those ten years, what did it matter whether the money was stolen or not? In either case, it was equally useless to you.

To these false and foolish pleasures they add gambling, which they have heard about, though they've never tried it, as well as hunting and hawking. What pleasure can there be, they wonder, in throwing dice on a table? If there were any pleasure in the action, wouldn't doing it over and over again quickly make one tired of it? What pleasure can there be in listening to the barking and yelping of dogs—Isn't that rather a disgusting noise? Is there any more pleasure felt when a dog chases a hare than when a dog chases a dog? If what you like is fast running, there's plenty of that in both cases; they're just about the same. But if what you really want is slaughter, if you want to see a living creature torn apart under your eyes—you ought to feel nothing but pity when you see the little hare fleeing from the hound, the weak creature tormented by the stronger, the fearful and timid beast brutalized by the savage one, the harmless hare killed by the cruel dog. The Utopians, who regard this whole activity of hunting as unworthy of free men, have assigned it accordingly, to their butchers, who, as I said before, are all slaves.<sup>5</sup> In their eyes, hunting is the lowest thing even butchers can do. In the slaughterhouse, their work is more useful and honest, since there they kill animals only from necessity; but the hunter seeks merely his own pleasure from the killing and mutilating of some poor little creature. Even in beasts, taking such relish in the sight of death reveals, in the Utopians' opinion, a cruel disposition, or else one that has become so through the constant practice of such brutal pleasures.

Common opinion considers these activities, and countless others like them, to be pleasures; but the Utopians say flatly they have nothing at all to do with real pleasure, since there's nothing naturally pleasant about them. They often please the senses, and in this they are like pleasure, but that does not alter their basic nature. The enjoyment doesn't arise from the experience itself, but only from the perverse habits of the mob, as a result of which they mistake the bitter for the sweet, just as pregnant women, whose taste has been turned awry, sometimes think pitch and tallow taste sweeter than honey. A person's taste may be similarly depraved by disease or by custom, but that does not change the nature of pleasure, or of anything else.

They distinguish several different classes of true pleasure, some being pleasures of the mind and others pleasures of the body. Those of the mind are knowledge and the delight which rises from contemplating the truth, also the gratification of looking back on a well-spent life and the unquestioning hope of happiness to come.

Pleasures of the body they also divide into two classes. The first is that which fills the senses with immediate delight. Sometimes this happens when bodily organs that have been weakened by natural heat are restored with food and drink; sometimes it happens when we eliminate some excess in the body, as when we move our bowels, generate children, or relieve an itch somewhere by rubbing or scratching it. Now and then pleasure arises, not from restoring a deficiency or discharging an excess, but from something that excites our senses with a hidden but unmistakable force, and attracts them to itself. Such is the power of music.

The second kind of bodily pleasure they describe as nothing but the calm and harmonious state of the body, its state of health when undisturbed by any disorder. Health itself, when not oppressed by pain, gives pleasure, without any external excitement at all. Even though it appeals less directly to the senses than the gross gratifications of eating and drinking, many consider this to be the greatest pleasure of all. Most of the Utopians regard it as the foundation and basis of all the pleasures, since by itself alone it can make life peaceful and desirable, whereas without it there is no possibility of any other pleasure. Mere absence of pain, without positive health, they regard as insensibility, not pleasure.

Some have maintained that a stable and tranquil state of health is not really a pleasure, on the grounds that the presence of health cannot be felt except through some external stimulus.<sup>6</sup> The Utopians (who have considered the matter thoroughly) long ago rejected this opinion. On the contrary, they nearly all agree that health is crucial to pleasure. Since pain is inherent in disease, they argue, and pain is the bitter enemy of pleasure, just as disease is the enemy of health, then pleasure must be inherent in quiet good health. You may say pain is not the disease itself, simply an accompanying effect; but they argue that that makes no difference, since the effect is the same either way. For whether health is itself a pleasure or is merely the cause of pleasure (as fire is the cause of heat), the fact remains that those who have stable health must also have pleasure.

When we eat, they say, what happens is that health, which was starting to fade, takes food as its ally in the fight against hunger. While our health gains strength, the simple process of returning vigor gives us pleasure and refreshment. If our health feels delight in the struggle, will it not rejoice when the victory has been won? When at last it is restored to its original strength, which was its aim all through the conflict, will it at once become insensible, and fail to recognize and embrace its own good? The idea that health cannot be felt they consider completely wrong. Every man who's awake, they say, feels that he's in good health—unless he isn't. Is anyone so torpid and dull that he won't admit health is delightfully agreeable to him? And what is delight except pleasure under another name?

Of all the different pleasures, they seek primarily those of the mind, and prize them most highly. The foremost mental pleasure, they believe, arises from the practice of the virtues and the consciousness of a good life. Among the pleasures of the body, they give the first place to health. As for eating and drinking and other delights of that sort, they consider them desirable, but only for the sake of health. They are not pleasant in themselves, but only as ways to withstand the insidious attacks of sickness. A wise man would rather escape sickness altogether than have a good cure for it; he would rather prevent pain than find a palliative for it. And so it would be better not to need this kind of pleasure at all than to be assuaged by it.

Anyone who thinks happiness consists of this sort of pleasure must confess that his ideal life would be one spent in an endless round of hunger, thirst, and itching, followed by eating, drinking, scratching, and rubbing. Who can fail to see that such an existence is not only disgusting but miserable? These pleasures are certainly the lowest of all, as they are the most adulterate—for they never occur except in connection with the pains that are their contraries. Hunger, for example, is linked to the pleasure of eating, and far from equally, since the pain is sharper and lasts longer; it precedes the pleasure, and ends only when the pleasure ends with it. So the Utopians think pleasures of this sort should not be much valued, except insofar as they are necessary to life. Yet they enjoy these pleasures too, and acknowledge gratefully the kindness of Mother Nature, who coaxes her children with allurements and cajolery to do what in any case they must do from necessity. How wretched life would be if the daily diseases of hunger and thirst had to be overcome by bitter potions and drugs, like some other diseases that afflict us less often!

Beauty, strength, and agility, as special and pleasant gifts of nature, they joyfully accept. The pleasures of sound, sight, and smell they also pursue as the special seasonings of life, recognizing that nature intended these delights to be the particular province of man. No other kind of animal admires the shape and loveliness of the universe, or enjoys odors, except in the way of searching for food, or distinguishes harmonious from dissonant sounds. But in all their pleasures, the Utopians observe this rule, that the lesser pleasure must not interfere with the greater, and that no pleasure shall carry pain with it as a consequence. If a pleasure is dishonorable, they think it will inevitably lead to pain.

Moreover, they think it is crazy for a man to despise beauty of form, to impair his own strength, to grind his energy down to lethargy, to exhaust his body with fasts, to ruin his health, and to scorn all other natural delights, unless by so doing he can better serve the welfare of others or the public good. Then indeed he may expect a greater reward from God. But otherwise for a man to inflict pain on himself does no one any good. He gains, perhaps, the empty and shadowy reputation of virtue; and no doubt he hardens himself against fantastic adversities which may never occur. But such a person the Utopians consider absolutely crazy—cruel to himself, as well as most ungrateful to Nature—as if, to avoid being in her debt, he rejects all her gifts.

This is the way they think about virtue and pleasure. Human reason, they believe, can attain to no surer conclusions than these, unless a revelation from heaven should inspire men with holier notions. In all this, I have no time now to consider whether they are right or wrong, and don't feel obliged to do so. I have undertaken only to describe their principles, not to defend them. But of this I am sure, that whatever you think of their ideas, there is not a more excellent people or a happier commonwealth anywhere in the whole world.

In body they are nimble and lively, and stronger than you would expect from their stature, though they're by no means tiny. Their soil is not very fertile, nor their climate of the best, but they protect themselves against the weather by temperate living, and improve their soil by industry, so that nowhere do grain and cattle flourish more plentifully, nowhere are people more vigorous, and liable to fewer diseases. There you can see not only that they do all the things farmers usually do to improve poor soil by hard work and technical knowledge, but you can see a forest which they uprooted with their own hands and moved to another site. They did this not so much for the sake of better growth but to make transport easier, by having wood closer to the sea, the rivers, or the cities themselves. For grain is easier than wood to carry by land over a long distance.

[THEIR DELIGHT IN LEARNING]

The people in general are easygoing, cheerful, clever, and like their leisure. When they must, they can stand heavy labor, but otherwise they are not very fond of it. In intellectual pursuits, they are tireless. When they heard from us about the literature and learning of the Greeks (for we thought there was nothing in Latin, except the historians and poets, that they would value), it was wonderful to behold how eagerly they sought to be instructed in Greek. We therefore began to study a little of it with them, at first more to avoid seeming lazy than out of any expectation that they would profit by it. But after a short trial, their diligence convinced us that our efforts would not be wasted. They picked up the forms of the letters so easily, pronounced the language so aptly, memorized it so quickly, and began to recite so accurately that it seemed like a miracle. Most of our pupils were established scholars, of course, picked for their unusual ability and mature minds; and they studied with us, not just of their own free will, but at the command of the senate.<sup>7</sup> Thus in less than three years they had perfect control of the language and could read the best authors fluently, unless the text was corrupt. I have a feeling they picked up Greek more easily because it was somewhat related to their own tongue. Though their language resembles Persian in most respects, I suspect their race descends from the Greeks, because their language retains some vestiges of Greek in the names of cities and in official titles.

Before leaving on the fourth voyage, I placed on board, instead of merchandise, a good-sized packet of books; for I had resolved not to return at all rather than come home soon. Thus they received from me most of Plato's works and more of Aristotle's, as well as Theophrastus's book On Plants, though the latter, I'm sorry to say, was somewhat mutilated.<sup>8</sup> During the voyage I carelessly left it lying around, a monkey got hold of it, and from sheer mischief ripped out a few pages here and there and tore them up. Of the grammarians they have only Lascaris, for I did not take Theodorus with me, nor any dictionary except that of Hesychius; and they have Dioscorides.<sup>9</sup> They are very fond of Plutarch's writings, and delighted with the witty persiflage of Lucian.<sup>1</sup> Among the poets they have Aristophanes, Homer, and Euripides, together with Sophocles in the small typeface of the Aldine edition.<sup>2</sup> Of the historians they possess Thucydides and Herodotus, as well as Herodian.<sup>3</sup>

As for medical books, a comrade of mine named Tricius Apinatus brought with him some small treatises by Hippocrates, and the Microtechné of Galen.<sup>4</sup> They were delighted to have these books. Even though there's hardly a country in the world that needs doctors less, medicine is nowhere held in greater honor: they consider it one of the finest and most useful parts of philosophy. They think that when, with the help of philosophy, they explore the secrets of nature they are gratifying not only themselves but the author and maker of nature. They suppose that, like other artists, he created this beautiful mechanism of the world to be admired—and by whom, if not by man, who is alone in being able to appreciate so great a thing? Therefore he is bound to prefer a careful observer and sensitive admirer of his work before one who, like a brute beast, looks on the grand spectacle with a stupid and blockish mind.

HORVM VERSVVM AD VERBVM HAEC EST SENTENTIA.

Vtopus me dux ex non insula fecit insulam.
 Vna ego terrarum omnium absq; philosophia.
 Ciuitatem philosophicam expressi mortalibus.
 Libenter impartio mea, non grauatum accipio meliora.

This sample of the Utopian language, which first appeared in the earliest edition of More's book (1516), reveals affinities with Greek and Latin and has enough internal consistency to suggest that it was worked out with care (evidently by Peter Giles). The stilted Latin quatrain at the end, which purports to be a literal translation, can itself be translated as follows: "Me, once a peninsula, Utopus the king made an island. / Alone among all nations, and without complex abstractions, / I set before men's eyes the philosophical city. / What I give is free; what is better I am not slow to take from others."

Once stimulated by learning, the minds of the Utopians are wonderfully quick to seek out those various arts which make life more agreeable. Two inventions, to be sure, they owe to us: the art of printing and the manufacture of paper. At least they owe these arts partly to us, though partly to their own ingenuity. While we were showing them the Aldine editions of various works, we talked about papermaking and how letters are printed, though without going into detail, for none of us had had any practical experience of either skill. But with great sharpness of mind they immediately grasped the basic principles. While previously they had written only on vellum, bark, and papyrus, they now undertook to make paper and to print with type. Their first attempts were not altogether successful, but with practice they soon mastered both arts. They became so proficient that, if they had texts of the Greek authors, they would soon have no lack of volumes; but as they have no more than those I mentioned, they have contented themselves with reprinting each in thousands of copies.

Any sightseer coming to their land who has some special intellectual gift, or who has traveled widely and seen many countries, is sure of a warm welcome, for they love to hear what is happening throughout the world. This is why we were received so kindly. Few merchants, however, go there to trade. What could they import except iron—or else gold and silver, which everyone would rather bring home than send abroad? As for the export trade, the Utopians prefer to do their own transportation, rather than invite strangers to do it. By carrying their own cargos they are able to learn more about foreign countries on all sides, and keep up their skill in navigation.

SLAVES<sup>5</sup>

The only prisoners of war the Utopians enslave are those captured in wars they fight themselves. The children of slaves are not automatically enslaved,<sup>6</sup> nor are slaves obtained from foreign countries. Their slaves are either their own citizens, enslaved for some heinous offense, or else foreigners who were condemned to death in their own land. Most are of the latter sort. Sometimes the Utopians buy them at a very modest rate, more often they ask for them, get them for nothing, and bring them home in considerable numbers. Both kinds of slaves are kept constantly at work, and are always fettered. But the Utopians deal with their own people more harshly than with the others, feeling that their crimes are worse and deserve stricter punishment because they had an excellent education and the best of moral training, yet still couldn't be restrained from wrongdoing. A third class of slaves consists of hardworking penniless drudges from other nations who voluntarily choose to become slaves in Utopia. Such people are treated well, almost as well as citizens, except that they are given a little extra work, on the score that they're used to it. If one of them wants to leave, which seldom happens, no obstacles are put in his way, nor is he sent off emptyhanded.

[SUICIDE AND EUTHANASIA]

As I said before, the sick are carefully tended, and nothing is neglected in the way of medicine or diet which might cure them. Everything possible is done to mitigate the pain of those who are suffering from incurable diseases; and visitors do their best to console them by sitting and talking with them. But if the disease is not only incurable but excruciatingly and constantly painful, then the priests and public officials come and urge the invalid not to endure such agony any longer. They remind him that he is now unfit for any of life's duties, a burden to himself and to others; he has really outlived his own death. They tell him he should not let the disease prey on him any longer, but now that life is simply torture, he should not hesitate to die but should rely on hope for something better. Since life has become a mere prison cell, where he is bitterly tormented, he should free himself, or let others free him, from the rack of living. This would be a wise act, they say, since for him death would put an end not to pleasure but to agony. In addition, he would be obeying the advice of the priests, who are the interpreters of God's will; which ensures that it would be a holy and pious act.<sup>7</sup>

Those who have been persuaded by these arguments either starve themselves to death or, having been put to sleep, are freed from life without any sensation of dying. But they never force this step on a man against his will; nor, if he decides against it, do they lessen their care of him. Under these circumstances, when death is advised by the authorities, they consider self-destruction honorable. But the suicide, who takes his own life without the approval of priests and senate, they consider unworthy either of earth or fire, and throw his body, unburied and disgraced, into a bog.

[MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE]

Women do not marry till they are eighteen, nor men till they are twenty-two. Premarital intercourse, if discovered and proved, brings severe punishment on both man and woman, and the guilty parties are forbidden to marry during their whole lives, unless the governor by his pardon remits the sentence. In addition both the father and mother of the household where the offense occurred suffer public disgrace for having been remiss in their duty. The reason they punish this offense so severely is that they suppose few people would join in married love—with confinement to a single partner, and all the petty annoyances that married life involves—unless they were strictly restrained from a life of promiscuity.

In choosing marriage partners, they solemnly and seriously follow a custom which seemed to us foolish and absurd in the extreme.

Whether she is a widow or a virgin, the woman is shown naked to the suitor by a responsible and respectable matron; and similarly, some respectable man presents the suitor naked to the woman.<sup>8</sup> We laughed at this custom and called it absurd; but they were just as amazed at the folly of all other peoples. When men go to buy a colt, where they are risking only a little money, they are so suspicious that, though the beast is almost bare, they won't close the deal until the saddle and blanket have been taken off, lest there be a hidden sore underneath. Yet in the choice of a mate, which may cause either delight or disgust for the rest of their lives, people are completely careless. They leave all the rest of her body covered up with clothes and estimate the attractiveness of a woman from a mere handsbreadth of her person, the face, which is all they can see. And so they marry, running great risk of bitter discord, if something in either's person should offend the other. Not all people are so wise as to concern themselves solely with character; and even the wise appreciate physical beauty, as a supplement to the virtues of the mind. There's no question but that deformity may lurk under clothing, serious enough to make a man hate his wife when it's too late to be separated from her. If some disfiguring accident occurs after marriage, each person must bear his own fate; but beforehand everyone should be legally protected from deception.

There is extra reason for them to be careful, because in that part of the world they are the only people who practice monogamy. Their marriages are seldom terminated except by death, though they do allow divorce for adultery or for intolerably offensive behavior. A husband or wife who is the aggrieved party in such a divorce is granted permission by the senate to remarry, but the guilty party is considered disreputable and is permanently forbidden to take another mate.<sup>9</sup> They absolutely forbid a husband to put away his wife against her will and without any fault on her part, just because of some bodily misfortune; they think it cruel that a person should be abandoned when most in need of comfort; and they add that old age, since it not only entails disease but is actually a disease itself, needs more than a precarious fidelity.

It happens occasionally that a married couple cannot get along, and have both found other persons with whom they hope to live more harmoniously. After getting the approval of the senate, they may then separate by mutual consent and contract new marriages. But such divorces are allowed only after the senators and their wives have carefully investigated the case. They allow divorce only very reluctantly, because they know that husbands and wives will find it hard to settle down together if each has in mind that a new marriage is easily available.

They punish adulterers with the strictest form of slavery. If both parties were married, they are both divorced, and the injured parties may marry one another, if they want, or someone else. But if one of the injured parties continues to love such an undeserving spouse, the marriage may go on, providing the innocent person chooses to share in the labor to which the slave is condemned. And sometimes it happens that the repentance of the guilty and the devotion of the innocent party move the governor to pity, so that he restores both to freedom. But a second conviction of adultery is punished by death.

[PUNISHMENTS AND REWARDS; CUSTOMS AND LAWS]

No other crimes carry fixed penalties; the senate sets specific penalties for each particular misdeed, as it is considered atrocious or venial. Husbands chastise their wives, and parents their children, unless the offense is so serious that public punishment is called for. Generally, the gravest crimes are punished by slavery, for they think this deters offenders just as much as getting rid of them by immediate capital punishment, and is more beneficial to the commonwealth. In addition, slaves contribute more by their labor than by their death, and they are permanent and visible reminders that crime does not pay. If the slaves rebel against their condition, then, like savage beasts which neither bars nor chains can tame, they are finally put to death. But if they are patient, they are not left altogether without hope. When subdued by long hardships, if they show by their behavior that they regret the crime more than the punishment, their slavery is lightened or remitted altogether, sometimes by the governor's pardon, sometimes by popular vote.

Attempted seduction is subject to the same penalty as seduction itself. They think that a crime clearly and deliberately attempted is as bad as one committed, and that failure should not confer advantages on a criminal who did all he could to succeed.

They are very fond of fools, and think it contemptible to insult them.<sup>1</sup> There is no prohibition against enjoying their foolishness, and they even regard this as beneficial to the fools. If anyone is so serious and solemn that the foolish behavior and comic patter of a clown do not amuse him, they don't entrust him with the care of such a person, for fear that a man who gets not only no use from a fool but not even any amusement—a fool's only gift—will not treat him kindly.

To mock a person for being deformed or crippled is considered ugly and disfiguring, not to the victim but to the mocker, who stupidly reproaches the cripple for something he cannot help.

They think it a sign of a weak and sluggish character to neglect one's natural beauty, but they consider cosmetics a detestable affectation. From experience they have learned that no physical beauty recommends a wife to her husband so effectually as goodness and respect. Though some men are captured by beauty alone, none are held except by virtue and compliance.

As they deter people from crime by penalties, so they incite them to virtue by public honors. They set up in the marketplace statues of distinguished men who have served their country well, thinking thereby to preserve the memory of their good deeds and to spur on the citizens to emulate the glory of their ancestors.

Any man who campaigns for a public office is disqualified for all of them. They live together harmoniously, and the public officials are never arrogant or unapproachable. Instead, they are called "fathers," and that is the way they behave. Because the officials never extort respect from the people against their will, the people respect them spontaneously, as they should. Not even the governor is distinguished from his fellow citizens by a robe or crown; he is known only by a sheaf of grain he carries, just as the high priest is distinguished by a wax candle borne before him.<sup>2</sup>

They have very few laws, and their training is such that they need no more. The chief fault they find with other nations is that, even with infinite volumes of laws and interpretations, they cannot manage their affairs properly. They think it completely unjust to bind people by a set of laws that are too many to be read and too obscure for anyone to understand. As for lawyers, a class of men whose trade it is to manipulate cases and multiply quibbles, they exclude them entirely.<sup>3</sup> They think it is better for each man to plead his own case, and say the same thing to the judge that he would tell his lawyer. This makes for less ambiguity, and readier access to the truth. A man speaks his mind without tricky instructions from a lawyer, and the judge examines each point carefully, taking pains to protect simple folk against the false accusations of the crafty. It is hard to find this kind of plain dealing in other countries, where they have such a multitude of incomprehensibly intricate laws. But in Utopia everyone is a legal expert. For the laws are very few, as I said, and they consider the most obvious interpretation of any law to be the fairest. As they see things, all laws are promulgated for the single purpose of teaching every man his duty. Subtle interpretations teach very few, since hardly anybody is able to understand them, whereas the more simple and apparent sense of the law is open to everyone. If laws are not clear, they are useless; for simpleminded men (and most men are of this sort, and need to be told where their duty lies), there might as well be no laws at all as laws which can be interpreted only by devious minds after endless disputes. The dull common man cannot understand this legal chicanery, and couldn't even if he studied it his whole life, since he has to earn a living in the meantime.

[FOREIGN RELATIONS]

Some of the Utopians' free and independent neighbors (many of whom were previously liberated by them from tyranny), having learned to admire Utopian virtues, have made a practice of asking the Utopians to supply magistrates for them. Some of these magistrates serve one year, others five. When their service is over, they bring them home with honor and praise, and take back new ones to their country. These peoples seem to have settled on an excellent scheme to safeguard the commonwealth. Since the welfare or ruin of a commonwealth depends on the character of its officials, where could they make a more prudent choice than among Utopians, who cannot be tempted by money? For money is useless to them when they go home, as they soon must, and they can have no partisan or factional feelings, since they are strangers in the city over which they rule. Wherever they take root in men's minds, these two evils, greed and faction, are the destruction of all justice—and justice is the strongest bond of any society. The Utopians call these people who have borrowed magistrates from them their allies; others whom they have benefited they call simply friends.

While other nations are constantly making treaties, breaking them, and renewing them, the Utopians never make any treaties at all. If nature, they say, doesn't bind man adequately to his fellow man, will an alliance do so? If a man scorns nature herself, is there any reason to think he will care about mere words? They are confirmed in this view by the fact that in that part of the world, treaties and alliances between kings are not generally observed with much good faith.

In Europe, of course, the dignity of treaties is everywhere kept sacred and inviolable, especially in those regions where the Christian religion prevails. This is partly because the kings are all so just and virtuous, partly also because of the reverence and fear that everyone feels toward the popes.<sup>4</sup> Just as the popes themselves never promise anything which they do not most conscientiously perform, so they command all other princes to abide by their promises in every way. If someone declines to do so, they compel him to obey by means of pastoral censure and sharp reproof. The popes rightly declare that it would be particularly disgraceful if people who are specifically called "the faithful" acted in bad faith.

But in that new world, which is as distant from ours in customs and way of life as in the distance the equator puts between us, nobody trusts treaties. The greater the formalities, the more numerous and solemn the oaths, the sooner the treaty will be broken. The rulers will easily find some defect in the wording of it, which often enough they deliberately inserted themselves. No treaty can be made so strong and explicit that a government will not be able to worm out of it, breaking in the process both the treaty and its own word. If such craft, deceit, and fraud were practiced in private contracts, the politicians would raise a great outcry against both parties, calling them sacrilegious and worthy of the gallows. Yet the very same politicians think themselves clever fellows when they give this sort of advice to kings. As a consequence, people are apt to think that justice is a humble, plebeian virtue, far beneath the majesty of kings. Or else they conclude that there are two kinds of justice, one which is only for the common herd, a lowly justice that creeps along the ground, hedged in everywhere and encumbered with chains; and the other, which is the justice of princes, much more free and majestic, so that it can do anything it wants and nothing it doesn't want.

This royal practice of keeping treaties badly there is, I suppose, the reason the Utopians don't make any; doubtless if they lived here in Europe they would change their minds. However, they think it a bad idea to make treaties at all, even if they are faithfully observed. A treaty implies that people who are separated by some natural obstacle as slight as a hill or a brook are joined by no bond of nature; it assumes that they are born rivals and enemies, and are right in aiming to destroy one another except insofar as a treaty restrains them. Moreover, they see that treaties do not really promote friendship; for both parties still retain the right to prey upon one another to whatever extent incautious drafting has left the treaty without sufficient provisions against it. The Utopians think, on the other hand, that no one should be considered an enemy who has done you no harm, that the fellowship of nature is as good as a treaty, and that men are united more firmly by good will than by pacts, by their hearts than by their words.

MILITARY PRACTICES

They despise war as an activity fit only for beasts, yet practiced more by man than by any other creature. Unlike almost every other people in the world, they think nothing so inglorious as the glory won in battle. Yet on certain fixed days, men and women alike carry on vigorous military training, so they will be fit to fight should the need arise. But they go to war only for good reasons: to protect their own land, to protect their friends from an invading army, or to liberate an oppressed people from tyranny and servitude. Out of human sympathy, they not only protect their friends from present danger but sometimes avenge previous injuries; they do this, however, only if they themselves have previously been consulted, have approved the cause, and have demanded restitution in vain. Then and only then they think themselves free to declare war. They take this final step not only when their friends have been plundered but also, and even more fiercely, when their friends' merchants have been subjected to extortion in another country, either on the pretext of laws unjust in themselves or through the perversion of good laws.

This and no other was the cause of the war which the Utopians waged a little before our time on behalf of the Nephelogetes against the Alaopolitans.<sup>5</sup> Under pretext of right, a wrong (as they saw it) had been inflicted on some Nephelogete traders residing among the Alaopolitans. Whatever the rights and wrongs of the quarrel, it developed into a fierce war, into which, apart from the hostile forces of the two parties themselves, the neighboring nations poured their efforts and resources. Some prosperous nations were ruined completely, others badly shaken. One trouble led to another, and in the end the Alaopolitans were crushed and reduced to slavery (since the Utopians weren't involved on their own account) by the Nephelogetes—a people who, before the war, had not been remotely comparable in power to their rivals.

So severely do the Utopians punish wrong done to their friends, even in matters of mere money; but they are not so strict in enforcing their own rights. When they are cheated out of their goods, so long as no bodily harm is done, their anger goes no further than cutting off trade relations with that nation till restitution is made. The reason is not that they care more for their allies' citizens than for their own, but simply this: when the merchants of their friends are cheated, it is their own property that is lost, but when the Utopians lose something, it comes from the common stock, and is bound to be in plentiful supply at home; otherwise they wouldn't have been exporting it. Hence no one individual even notices the loss. So small an injury, which affects neither the life nor the livelihood of any of their own people, they consider it cruel to avenge by the deaths of many soldiers. On the other hand, if one of their own is maimed or killed anywhere, whether by a government or by a private citizen, they first send envoys to look into the circumstances; then they demand that the guilty persons be surrendered; and if that demand is refused, they are not to be put off, but at once declare war. If the guilty persons are surrendered, their punishment is death or slavery.

The Utopians are not only troubled but ashamed when their forces gain a bloody victory, thinking it folly to pay too high a price even for the best goods. But if they overcome the enemy by skill and cunning, they exult mightily, celebrate a public triumph, and raise a monument as for a hard-won victory. They think they have really acted with manly virtue when they have won a victory such as no animal except man could have won—a victory achieved by strength of understanding. Bears, lions, boars, wolves, dogs, and other wild beasts fight with their bodies, they say; and most of them are superior to us in strength and ferocity; but we outdo them all in shrewdness and rationality.

The only thing they aim at, in going to war, is to secure what would have prevented the declaration of war, if the enemy had conceded it beforehand. Or if they cannot get that, they try to take such bitter revenge on those who have provoked them that they will be afraid ever to do it again. These are their chief aims, which they try to achieve quickly, yet in such a way as to avoid danger rather than to win fame and glory.

As soon as war is declared, therefore, they have their secret agents simultaneously post many placards, each marked with their official seal, in the most conspicuous places throughout the enemy territory. In these proclamations they promise immense rewards to anyone who will kill the enemy's king. They offer smaller but still very substantial sums for killing any of a list of other individuals whom they name. These are the persons whom they regard as most responsible, after the king, for plotting aggression against them. The reward for an assassin is doubled for anyone who succeeds in bringing in one of the proscribed men alive. The same reward, plus a guarantee of personal safety, is offered to any one of the proscribed men who turns against his comrades. As a result, the enemies of the Utopians quickly come to suspect everyone, particularly one another; and the many perils of their situation lead to panic. They know perfectly well that many of them, including their princes, have been betrayed by those in whom they placed complete trust—so effective are bribes as an incitement to crime. Knowing this, the Utopians are lavish in their promises of bounty. Being well aware of the risks their agents must run, they make sure that the payments are in proportion to the peril; thus they not only offer, but actually deliver, enormous sums of gold, as well as large landed estates in very secure locations on the territory of their friends.

Everywhere else in the world, this process of bidding for and buying the life of an enemy is condemned as the cruel villainy of a degenerate mind; but the Utopians consider it good policy, both wise and merciful. In the first place, it enables them to win tremendous wars without fighting any actual battles; and in the second place it enables them, by the sacrifice of a few guilty men, to spare the lives of many innocent persons who would have died in battle, some on their side, some on the enemy's. They pity the mass of the enemy's soldiers almost as much as their own citizens, for they know common people do not go to war of their own accord, but are driven to it by the madness of princes.

If assassination does not work, they sow the seeds of dissension in enemy ranks by inciting the prince's brother or some other member of the nobility to scheme for the crown. If internal discord dies down, they try to rouse up neighboring peoples against the enemy by reviving forgotten claims to dominion, of which kings always have an ample supply.

When they promise their resources to help in a war, they send money very freely, but commit their own citizens only sparingly. They hold their own people dear, and value them so highly that they would not willingly exchange one of their citizens for an enemy's prince. Since they keep their gold and silver for the purpose of war alone, they spend it without hesitation; after all, they will continue to live just as well even if they expend the whole sum. Besides the wealth they have at home, they have a vast treasure abroad, since, as I said before, many nations owe them money. So they hire mercenary soldiers from all sides, especially the Zapoletes.<sup>6</sup>

These people live five hundred miles to the east of Utopia, and are rude, rough, and fierce. The forests and mountains where they are bred are the kind of country they like: tough and rugged. They are a hard race, capable of standing heat, cold, and drudgery, unacquainted with any luxuries, careless of what houses they live in or what they wear; they don't till the fields but raise cattle instead. Most of them survive by hunting and stealing. These people are born for battle and are always eager for a fight; they seek one out at every opportunity. Leaving their own country in great numbers, they offer themselves for cheap hire to anyone in need of warriors. The only art they know for earning a living is the art of taking life.

They fight with great courage and incorruptible loyalty for the people who pay them, but they will not bind themselves to serve for any fixed period of time. If someone, even the enemy, offers them more money tomorrow, they will take his side; and day after tomorrow, if a trifle more is offered to bring them back, they'll return to their first employers. Hardly a war is fought in which a good number of them are not engaged on both sides. It happens every day that men who are united by ties of blood and have served together in friendship, but who are now separated into opposing armies, meet in battle. Forgetful of kinship and comradeship alike, they furiously run one another through, driven to mutual destruction for no other reason than that they were hired for paltry pay by opposing princes. They care so much about money that they can easily be induced to change sides for an increase of only a penny a day. They have picked up the habit of avarice, but none of the profit; for what they earn by shedding blood, they quickly squander on debauchery of the most squalid sort.

Because the Utopians give higher pay than anyone else, these people are ready to serve them against any enemy whatever. And the Utopians, who seek out the best possible men for proper uses, hire these, the worst possible men, for improper uses. When the situation requires, they thrust the Zapoletes into the positions of greatest danger by offering them immense rewards. Most of them never come back to collect their pay, but the Utopians faithfully pay off those who do survive, to encourage them to try it again. As for how many Zapoletes get killed, the Utopians never worry about that, for they think they would deserve very well of all mankind if they could exterminate from the face of the earth that entire disgusting and vicious race.

Besides the Zapoletes, they employ as auxiliaries the soldiers of the people for whom they have taken up arms, and then squadrons of their other friends. Last, they add their own citizens, including some man of known bravery to command the entire army. In addition, they appoint two substitutes for him, who hold no rank as long as he is safe. But if the commander is captured or killed, the first of these two substitutes becomes his successor, and in case of a mishap to him, the other. Thus, though the accidents of war cannot be foreseen, they make sure that the whole army will not be disorganized through the loss of their leader.

In each city, soldiers are chosen from those who have volunteered. No one is forced to fight abroad against his will, because they think a man who is naturally fearful will act weakly at best, and may even spread panic among his comrades. But if their own country is invaded, they call everyone to arms, posting the fearful (as long as they are physically fit) on shipboard among braver men, or here and there along fortifications, where there is no place to run away. Thus shame at failing their countrymen, desperation at the immediate presence of the enemy, and the impossibility of flight often combine to overcome their fear, and they make a virtue out of sheer necessity.

Just as no man is forced into a foreign war against his will, so women are allowed to accompany their men on military service if they want to—not only not forbidden, but encouraged and praised for doing so. Each goes with her husband to the front, and stands shoulder to shoulder with him in the line of battle; in addition, they place around a man his children and blood- or marriage-relations, so that those who by nature have most reason to help one another may be closest at hand for mutual aid. It is a matter of great reproach for either partner to come home without the other, or for a son to return after losing a parent. The result is that if the enemy stands his ground, the hand-to-hand fighting is apt to be long and bitter, ending only when everyone is dead.

As I observed, they take every precaution to avoid having to fight in person, so long as they can bring the war to an end with mercenaries. But when they are forced to take part in battle, they are as bold in the struggle as they were prudent in avoiding it while they could. In the first charge they are not fierce, but gradually as the fighting goes on they grow more determined, putting up a steady, stubborn resistance. Their spirit is so strong that they will die rather than yield ground. They are certain that everyone at home will be provided for, and they have no worries about the future of their families (and that sort of worry often daunts the boldest courage); so their spirit is exalted and unconquerable. Their skill in the arts of war gives them extra confidence; also from childhood they have been trained in sound principles of conduct (which their education and the good institutions of their commonwealth reinforce); and that too adds to their courage. They don't hold life so cheap that they throw it away recklessly, nor so dear as to grasp it avidly at the price of shame, when duty bids them give it up.

At the height of the battle, a band of the bravest young men, who have taken a special oath, devote themselves to seeking out the opposing general. They attack him directly, they lay secret traps for him, they hit at him from near and far. A long and continuous supply of fresh men keep up the assault as the exhausted drop out. In the end, they rarely fail to kill or capture him, unless he takes to flight.

When they win a battle, it never ends in a massacre, for they would much rather take prisoners than cut throats. They never pursue fugitives without keeping one line of their army drawn up under the colors. They are so careful of this that if they win the victory, with this last reserve force (supposing the rest of their army has been beaten), they would rather let the enemy army escape than pursue fugitives with their own ranks in disorder. They remember what has happened more than once to themselves: that when the enemy seemed to have the best of the day, had routed the main Utopian force and, exulting in their victory, had scattered to pursue the fugitives, a few Utopians held in reserve and watching their opportunity have suddenly attacked the dispersed and scattered enemy at the very moment when he felt safe and had lowered his guard. Thereby they changed the fortune of the day, snatched certain victory out of the enemy's hands, and, though conquered themselves, conquered their conquerors.

It is not easy to say whether they are more crafty in laying ambushes or more cautious in avoiding those laid for them. Sometimes they seem to be on the point of breaking and running when that is the last thing they have in mind; but when they really are ready to retreat, you would never guess it. If they are outnumbered, or if the terrain is unsuitable, they shift their ground silently by night or slip away from the enemy by some stratagem. Or if they have to withdraw by day, they do so gradually, and in such good order that they are as dangerous to attack then as if they were advancing. They fortify their camps very carefully with a deep, broad ditch all around them, the earth being thrown inward to make a wall; the work is done not by workmen but by the soldiers themselves with their own hands. The whole army pitches in, except for an armed guard posted around the rampart to prevent a surprise attack. With so many hands at work, they complete great fortifications, enclosing wide areas with unbelievable speed.

The armor they wear is strong enough to protect them from blows, but does not prevent easy movement of the body; in fact, it doesn't interfere even with their swimming, and part of their military training consists of swimming in armor. For long-range fighting they use arrows, which they fire with great force and accuracy, and from horseback as well as on foot. At close quarters they use not swords but battle-axes, which because of their sharp edge and great weight are lethal weapons, whether used in slashing or thrusting. They are very skillful in inventing machines of war, but conceal them with the greatest care, since if they were made known before they were needed, they might be more ridiculous than useful. Their first consideration in designing them is to make them easy to move and aim.<sup>7</sup>

When the Utopians make a truce with the enemy, they observe it religiously, and will not break it even if provoked. They do not ravage the enemy's territory or burn his crops; indeed, so far as possible, they avoid any trampling of the fields by men or horses, thinking they may need the grain themselves later on. Unless he is a spy, they injure no unarmed man. When cities are surrendered to them, they keep them intact; even when they have stormed a place, they do not plunder it, but put to death the men who prevented surrender, enslave the other defenders, and do no harm to the civilians. If they find any inhabitants who recommended surrender, they give them a share in the property of the condemned, and present their auxiliaries with the rest; for the Utopians themselves never take any booty.

After a war is ended, they collect the cost of it, not from the allies for whose sake they undertook it, but from the conquered. They take as indemnity not only money, which they set aside to finance future wars, but also landed estates, from which they may enjoy forever a substantial annual income. They now have revenues of this sort in many different countries, acquired little by little in various ways, till it now amounts to over seven hundred thousand ducats a year.<sup>8</sup> As managers of these estates, they send abroad some of their own citizens to serve as collectors of revenue. Though they live on the properties in grand style and conduct themselves like great lords, plenty of income is still left over to be put in the public treasury, unless they choose to give the conquered nation credit. They often do the latter, until they happen to need the money, and even then it's rare for them to call in the entire debt. Some of the estates are given, as I've already described, to those who have risked great dangers on their behalf.

If any prince takes up arms and prepares to invade their land, they immediately attack him in full force outside their own borders. They are most reluctant to wage war on their own soil, and no necessity could ever compel them to admit foreign auxiliaries onto their island.

THE RELIGIONS OF THE UTOPIANS

There are different forms of religion throughout the island, and even in individual cities. Some worship as a god the sun, others the moon, and still others one of the planets. There are some who worship a man of past ages who was conspicuous either for virtue or glory; they consider him not only a god but the supreme god. The vast majority, however, and these by far the wisest, believe nothing of the sort: they believe in a single power, unknown, eternal, infinite, inexplicable, beyond the grasp of the human mind, and diffused throughout the universe, not physically, but in influence. Him they call their parent, and to him alone they attribute the origin, increase, progress, changes, and ends of all things; they do not offer divine honors to any other.

Though the other sects of the Utopians differ from this main group in various particular doctrines, they agree with them in this single head, that there is one supreme power, the maker and ruler of the universe, whom they all call in their native language Mithra.<sup>9</sup> Different people define him differently, and each supposes the object of his worship is that one and only nature to whose divine majesty, by the consensus of all nations, the creation of all things is attributed. But gradually they are coming to forsake this mixture of superstitions, and to unite in that one religion which seems more reasonable than any of the others. And there is no doubt that the other religions would have disappeared long ago, had not various unlucky accidents that befell certain Utopians who were thinking about changing their religion been interpreted, out of fear, as signs of divine anger, not chance, as if the deity who was being abandoned were avenging an insult against himself.

But after they had heard from us the name of Christ, and learned of his teachings, his life, his miracles, and the no less marvelous constancy of the many martyrs whose blood, freely shed, has drawn many nations far and near into the Christian fellowship, you would not believe how eagerly they assented to it, either through the mysterious inspiration of God, or because Christianity seemed very like the religion already prevailing among them. But I think they were also much influenced by the fact that Christ approved a communal way of life for his disciples, and that among the truest communities of Christians the practice still prevails.<sup>1</sup> Whatever the reason, no small number of them chose to join our communion, and received the holy water of baptism. By that time, two of our group had died, and among us four survivors there was, I am sorry to say, no priest; so, though they received the other sacraments, they still lack those which in our religion can be administered only by priests.<sup>2</sup> They do, however, understand what these are, and earnestly desire them. In fact, they dispute vigorously whether a man chosen from among themselves could legitimately assume the functions of a priest without the dispatch of a Christian bishop. Though they seemed on the point of selecting such a person, they had not yet done so when I left.

Those who have not accepted Christianity make no effort to restrain others from it, nor do they criticize new converts to it. While I was there, only one of the Christians was interfered with. As soon as he was baptized, he took upon himself to preach the Christian religion publicly, with more zeal than discretion. We warned him not to do so, but he soon worked himself up to a pitch where he not only set our religion above the rest but condemned all others as profane in themselves, leading their impious and sacrilegious followers to the hell-flames they richly deserved. After he had been going on in this style for a long time, they arrested him. He was tried on a charge, not of despising their religion, but of creating a public disorder, convicted, and sentenced to exile. For it is one of their oldest rules that no man's religion, as such, shall be held against him.

Utopus had heard that before his arrival the inhabitants were continually quarreling over religious matters. In fact, he found it was easy to conquer the country because the different sects were too busy fighting one another to oppose him. As soon as he had gained the victory, therefore, he decreed that everyone could cultivate the religion of his choice, and strenuously proselytize for it too, provided he did so quietly, modestly, rationally, and without bitterness toward others. If persuasion failed, no one was allowed to resort to abuse or violence. Anyone who fights wantonly about religion is punished by exile or enslavement.

Utopus laid down these rules not simply for the sake of peace, which he saw was in danger of being destroyed by constant quarrels and implacable hatreds, but also for the sake of religion itself. In matters of religion, he was not at all quick to dogmatize, because he suspected that God perhaps likes diverse and manifold forms of worship and has therefore deliberately inspired different people with different views. On the other hand, he was quite sure that it was arrogant folly for anyone to enforce conformity with his own beliefs on everyone else by means of threats or violence.<sup>3</sup> He supposed that if one religion is really true and the rest false, the true one will sooner or later emerge and prevail by its own natural strength, provided only that men consider the matter reasonably and moderately. But if they try to decide these matters by fighting and rioting, since the worst men are always the most headstrong, the best and holiest religion in the world will be crowded out by blind superstitions, like grain choked out of a field by thorns and briars. So he left the whole matter open, allowing each individual to choose what he would believe. The only exception he made was a solemn and strict law against any person who should sink so far below the dignity of human nature as to think that the soul perishes with the body, or that the universe is ruled by mere chance rather than divine providence.

Thus the Utopians all believe that after this life vices are to be punished and virtue rewarded; and they consider that anyone who denies this proposition is not even one of the human race, since he has degraded the sublimity of his own soul to the base level of a beast's wretched body. Still less will they count him as one of their citizens, since he would openly despise all the laws and customs of society, if not prevented by fear. Who can doubt that a man who has nothing to fear but the law, and no hope of life beyond the grave, will do anything he can to evade his country's laws by craft or break them by violence, in order to gratify his own private greed?

Therefore a person who holds such views is offered no honors, entrusted with no offices, and given no public responsibility; he is universally regarded as low and torpid. Yet they do not afflict him with punishments, because they are persuaded that no one can choose to believe by a mere act of the will. They do not compel him by threats to dissemble his views, nor do they tolerate in the matter any deceit or lying, which they detest as next door to deliberate malice. The man may not argue with the common people in behalf of his opinion; but in the presence of the priests and other important persons, in private, they not only permit but encourage it. For they are confident that in the end his madness will yield to reason.

There are some others, in fact no small number of them, who err in the opposite direction, in supposing that animals too have immortal souls,<sup>4</sup> though not comparable to ours in excellence, nor destined to equal felicity. These people are not thought to be evil, their opinion is not thought to be wholly unreasonable, and so they are not interfered with.

Almost all the Utopians are absolutely convinced that human bliss after death will be enormous; thus they lament every individual's sickness, but mourn over a death only if the person was torn from life anxiously and unwillingly. Such behavior they take to be a very bad sign, as if the soul, despairing and conscious of guilt, dreaded death through a secret premonition of punishments to come.

Besides, they suppose God can hardly be well pleased with the coming of one who, when he is summoned, does not come gladly but is dragged off reluctantly and against his will. Such a death fills the onlookers with horror, and they carry the corpse out to burial in melancholy silence. There, after begging God to have mercy on his spirit and to pardon his infirmities, they commit his body to the earth. But when someone dies blithely and full of good hope, they do not mourn for him but carry the body cheerfully away, singing and commending the dead man's soul to God. They cremate him in a spirit more of reverence than of grief, and erect a column on which the dead man's honors are inscribed. After they have returned home, they talk of his character and deeds, and no part of his life is mentioned more frequently or more gladly than his joyful death.

They think that recollecting the dead person's goodness helps the living to behave virtuously and is also the most acceptable form of honor to the dead. For they think that dead people are actually present among us, and hear what we say about them, though through the dullness of human sight they are invisible to our eyes. Given their state of bliss, the dead must be able to travel freely where they please, and it would be unkind of them to cast off every desire of revisiting their friends, to whom they had been bound by mutual affection and charity during their lives. Like all other good things, they think that after death charity is increased rather than decreased in good men; and thus they believe the dead come frequently among the living, to observe their words and actions. Hence they go about their business the more confidently because of their trust in such protectors; and the belief that their forefathers are physically present keeps them from any secret dishonorable deed.

Fortune-telling and other vain forms of superstitious divination, such as other peoples take very seriously, they have no part of and consider ridiculous. But they venerate miracles which occur without the help of nature, considering them direct and visible manifestations of the divine power. Indeed, they report that miracles have frequently occurred in their country. Sometimes in great and dangerous crises they pray publicly for a miracle, which they then anticipate with great confidence, and obtain.

They think that the contemplation of nature, and the sense of reverence arising from it, are acts of worship to God. There are some people, however, and not just a few of them, who from religious motives reject learning and pursue no studies; but none of them is the least bit idle. Constant dedication to the offices of charity, these people think, will increase their chances of happiness after death; and so they are always busy in the service of others. Some tend the sick; others repair roads, clean ditches, rebuild bridges, dig turf, sand, or stones; still others fell trees and cut them up, and transport wood, grain, or other commodities into the cities by wagon. They work for private citizens as well as for the public, and work even harder than slaves. They undertake with cheery good will any task that is so rough, hard, and dirty that most people refuse to tackle it because of the toil, boredom, and frustration involved. While constantly engaged in heavy labor themselves, they secure leisure for others, and yet they claim no credit for it. They do not criticize the way other people live, nor do they boast of their own doings. The more they put themselves in the position of slaves, the more highly they are honored by everyone.

These people are of two sects. The first are celibates who abstain not only from sex but also from eating meat, and some of them from any sort of animal food whatever. They reject all the pleasures of this life as harmful, and look forward only to the joys of the life to come, which they hope to deserve by hard labor and all-night vigils. As they hope to attain it soon, they are cheerful and active in the here and now. The other kind are just as fond of hard work, but prefer to marry. They don't despise the comforts of marriage, but think that, as their duty to nature requires work, so their duty to their country requires them to beget children. They avoid no pleasure unless it interferes with their labor, and gladly eat meat, precisely because they think it makes them stronger for any sort of heavy work. The Utopians regard the second sort as more sensible, but the first sort as holier. If they claimed to prefer celibacy to marriage, and a hard life to a comfortable one, on grounds of reason alone, the Utopians would think them absurd. But since these men claim to be motivated by religion, the Utopians respect and revere them. There is no subject on which they are warier of jumping to conclusions than in this matter of religion. These then are the men whom in their own language they call Buthrescas, a term which may be translated as "the especially religious."

Their priests are of great holiness, and therefore very few. In each city, there are no more than thirteen, one for each church. In case of war, seven of them go out with the army, and seven substitutes are appointed to fill their places for the time being. When the regular priests come back, the substitutes return to their former posts—that is, they serve as assistants to the high priest, until one of the regular thirteen dies, and then one of them succeeds to his position. The high priest is, of course, in authority over all the others. Priests are elected, just like all other officials, by secret popular vote, in order to avoid partisan feeling. After election they are ordained by the college of priests.

They preside over divine worship, attend to religious matters, and act as censors of public morality. For a man to be summoned before them and scolded for not living an honorable life is considered a great disgrace. As the duty of the priests is simply to counsel and advise, so correcting and punishing offenders is the duty of the governor and the other officials, though the priests do exclude from divine service persons whom they find to be extraordinarily wicked. Hardly any punishment is more dreaded than this; the excommunicate incurs great disgrace, and is tortured by the fear of damnation. Not even his body is safe for long, for unless he quickly convinces the priests of his repentance he will be seized and punished by the senate for impiety.

The priests are entrusted with teaching the children and young people.<sup>5</sup> Instruction in morality and virtue is considered just as important as the accumulation of learning. From the very first they try to instill in the pupils' minds, while they are still young and tender, principles which will be useful to preserve the commonwealth. What is planted in the minds of children lives on in the minds of adults, and is of great value in strengthening the commonwealth: the decline of society can always be traced to vices which arise from wrong attitudes.

Women are not debarred from the priesthood, but only a widow of advanced years is ever chosen, and it doesn't happen often. The wives of the male priests are the very finest women in the whole country.

No official in Utopia is more honored than the priest. Even if one of them commits a crime, he is not brought into a court of law, but left to God and his own conscience. They think it is wrong to lay human hands on a man, however guilty, who has been specially consecrated to God as a holy offering, so to speak. This custom is the easier for them to observe because their priests are very few and very carefully chosen. Besides, it rarely happens that a man selected for his goodness and raised to high dignities wholly because of his moral character will fall into corruption and vice. And even if such a thing should happen, human nature being as changeable as it is, no great harm is to be feared, because the priests are so few and have no power beyond that which derives from their good reputation. In fact, the reason for having so few priests is to prevent the order, which the Utopians now esteem so highly, from being cheapened by numbers.<sup>6</sup> Besides, they think it would be hard to find many men qualified for a dignity for which merely ordinary virtues are not sufficient.

Their priests are esteemed no less highly abroad than at home, which can be seen from the following fact: Whenever their armies join in battle, the Utopian priests are to be found, a little removed from the fray but not far, wearing their sacred vestments and down on their knees. With hands raised to heaven, they pray first of all for peace, and then for victory to their own side, but without much bloodshed on either hand.<sup>7</sup> Should their side be victorious, they rush among the combatants and restrain the rage of their own men against the enemy. If any of the enemy see these priests and call to them, it is enough to save their lives; to touch the flowing robes of a priest will save all their property from confiscation. This custom has brought them such veneration among all peoples, and given them such genuine authority, that they have saved the Utopians from the rage of the enemy as often as they have protected the enemy from Utopians. Instances of this are well known. Sometimes when the Utopian line has buckled, when the field was lost, and the enemy was rushing in to kill and plunder, the priests have intervened to stop the carnage and separate the armies, and an equitable peace has been concluded. There was never anywhere a tribe so fierce, cruel, and barbarous as not to hold their persons sacrosanct and inviolable.

The Utopians celebrate the first and last days of every month, and likewise of each year, as feast days. They divide the year into months which they measure by the orbit of the moon, just as they measure the year itself by the course of the sun. In their language, the first days are known as the Cynemerns and the last days as the Trapemerns, which is to say "First-feasts" and "Last-feasts."<sup>8</sup> Their churches are beautifully constructed, finely adorned, and large enough to hold a great many people. This is a necessity, since churches are so few. Their interiors are all rather dark, not from architectural ignorance but from deliberate policy; for the priests think that in bright light the congregation's thoughts will go wandering, whereas a dim light tends to concentrate the mind and encourage devotion.

Though there are various religions in Utopia, all of them, even the most diverse, agree in the main point, which is worship of the divine nature; they are like travelers going to one destination by different roads. So nothing is seen or heard in the churches that does not square with all the creeds. If any sect has a special rite of its own, that is celebrated in a private house; the public service is ordered by a ritual which in no way derogates from any of the private services. Therefore in the churches no image of the gods is to be seen, so that each person may be free to form his own image of God according to his own religion, in any shape he pleases. They do not invoke God by any name except Mithra. Whatever the nature of the divine majesty may be, they all agree to refer to it by that single word, and their prayers are so phrased as to accommodate the beliefs of all the different sects.

On the evening of the “Last-feast” they meet in their churches, and while still fasting they thank God for their prosperity during that month or year which is just ending. Next day, which is “First-feast,” they all flock to the churches in the morning, to pray for prosperity and happiness in the month or year which is just beginning. On the day of “Last-feast,” in the home before they go to church, wives kneel before their husbands and children before their parents, to confess their various sins of commission or of negligence and beg forgiveness for their offenses. Thus if any cloud of anger or resentment has arisen in the family, it is dispersed, and they can attend divine services with clear and untroubled minds—for they consider it sacrilege to worship with a rankling conscience. If they are conscious of hatred or anger toward anyone, they do not take part in divine services till they have been reconciled and have cleansed their hearts, for fear of some swift and terrible punishment.

As they enter the church, they separate, men going to the right side and women to the left.<sup>9</sup> Then they take their seats so that the males of each household are placed in front of the head of that household, while the womenfolk are directly in front of the mother of the family. In this way they ensure that everyone’s behavior in public is supervised by the same person whose authority and discipline direct him at home. They take great care that the young are everywhere placed in the company of their elders. For if children were trusted to the care of other children, they might spend in childish foolery the time they should devote to developing a religious fear of the gods, which is the greatest and almost the only incitement to virtue.

They do not slaughter animals in their sacrifices, and do not think that a merciful God, who gave life to all creatures precisely so that they might live, will be gratified with the shedding of blood. They burn incense, scatter perfumes, and display a great number of candles—not that they think these practices profit the divine nature in any way, any more than human prayers do; but they like this harmless kind of worship. They feel that sweet smells, lights, and other such rituals elevate the mind and lift it with a livelier devotion toward the adoration of God.

When they go to church, the people all wear white. The priest wears robes of various colors, wonderful for their workmanship and decoration, though not of materials as costly as one would suppose. The robes have no gold embroidery nor any precious stones, but are decorated with the feathers of different birds so skillfully woven together that the value of the handiwork far exceeds the cost of the most precious materials.<sup>1</sup> Also, certain symbolic mysteries are hidden in the patterning of the feathers on the robes, the meaning of which is carefully handed down among the priests. These messages serve to remind them of God's benefits toward them, and consequently of the devotion they owe to God, as well as of their duty to one another.

As the priest in his robes appears from the vestibule, the people all fall to the ground in reverence. The stillness is so complete that the scene strikes one with awe, as if a divinity were actually present. After remaining in this posture for some time, they rise at a signal from the priest. Then they sing hymns to the accompaniment of musical instruments, most of them quite different in shape from those in our part of the world. Many of them produce sweeter tones than ours, but others are not even comparable. In one respect, however, they are beyond doubt far ahead of us, because all their music, both vocal and instrumental, renders and expresses natural feelings and perfectly matches the sound to the subject. Whether the words of the hymn are supplicatory, cheerful, troubled, mournful, or angry, the music represents the meaning through the contour of the melody so admirably that it penetrates and inspires the minds of the ardent hearers. Finally, the priest and the people together recite certain fixed forms of prayer, so composed that what they all repeat in unison each individual can apply to himself.

In these prayers, the worshipers acknowledge God to be the creator and ruler of the universe and the author of all good things. They thank God for benefits received, and particularly for the divine favor which placed them in the happiest of commonwealths and inspired them with religious ideas which they hope are the truest. If they are wrong in this, and if there is some sort of society or religion more acceptable to God, they pray that he will, in his goodness, reveal it to them, for they are ready to follow wherever he leads. But if their form of society is the best and their religion the truest, then they pray that God will keep them steadfast, and bring other mortals to the same way of life and the same religious faith—unless, indeed, there is something in this variety of religions which delights his inscrutable will.

Then they pray that after an easy death God will receive each of them to himself, how soon or how late it is not for them to say. But if God's divine majesty so please, they ask to be brought to him soon, even by the hardest possible death, rather than be kept away from him longer, even by the most fortunate of earthly lives. When this prayer has been said, they prostrate themselves on the ground again; then after a little while they rise and go to lunch. The rest of the day they pass in games and military training.

Now I have described to you as accurately as I could the structure of that commonwealth which I consider not only the best but indeed the only one that can rightfully claim that name. In other places men talk very liberally of the commonwealth, but what they mean is simply their own wealth; in Utopia, where there is no private business, everyone zealously pursues the public business. And in both places people are right to act as they do. For among us, even though the commonwealth may flourish, there are very few who do not know that unless they make separate provision for themselves, they may perfectly well die of hunger. Bitter necessity, then, forces them to think that they must look out for themselves rather than for others, that is, for the people. But in Utopia, where everything belongs to everybody, no one need fear that, so long as the public warehouses are filled, anyone will ever lack for anything he needs. For the distribution of goods is not niggardly; in Utopia no one is poor, there are no beggars, and though no one owns anything, everyone is rich.

For what can be greater riches than to live joyfully and peacefully, free from all anxieties, and without worries about making a living? No man is bothered by his wife's querulous entreaties about money, no man fears poverty for his son, or struggles to scrape up a dowry for his daughter. Everyone can feel secure of his own livelihood and happiness, and of his whole family's as well: wife, sons, grandsons, great-grandsons, great-great-grandsons, and that whole long line of descendants that gentlefolk are so fond of contemplating. Indeed, even those who once worked but can no longer do so are cared for just as well as those who are still working.

Now here I'd like to see anyone try to compare this equity of the Utopians with the so-called justice that prevails among other peoples—among whom let me perish if I can discover the slightest scrap of justice or fairness. What kind of justice is it when a nobleman or a goldsmith or a moneylender, or someone else who makes his living by doing either nothing at all or something completely useless to the commonwealth, gets to live a life of luxury and grandeur, while in the meantime a laborer, a carter, a carpenter, or a farmer works so hard and so constantly that even a beast of burden could scarcely endure it? Although this work of theirs is so necessary that no commonwealth could survive a year without it, they earn so meager a living and lead such miserable lives that beasts of burden would really seem to be better off. Beasts do not have to work every minute, and their food is not much worse; in fact they like it better. And besides, they do not have to worry about their future. But workingmen not only have to sweat and suffer without present reward, but agonize over the prospect of a penniless old age. Their daily wage is inadequate even for their present needs, so there is no possible chance of their saving toward the future.

Now isn't this an unjust and ungrateful commonwealth? It lavishes rich rewards on so-called gentry, goldsmiths, and the rest of that crew, who don't work at all or are mere parasites, purveyors of empty pleasures. And yet it makes no provision whatever for the welfare of farmers and colliers, laborers, carters, and carpenters, without whom the commonwealth would simply cease to exist. After society has taken the labor of their best years, when they are worn out by age and sickness and utter destitution, then the thankless commonwealth, forgetting all their sleepless nights and great services, throws them out to die a miserable death. What is worse, the rich constantly try to grind out of the poor part of their meager wages, not only by private swindling but by public laws. Before, it appeared to be unjust that people who deserve most from the commonwealth should receive least; but now, by promulgating law, they have palmed injustice off as "legal." When I run over in my mind the various commonwealths flourishing today, so help me God, I can see in them nothing but a conspiracy of the rich, who are fattening up their own interests under the name and title of the commonwealth.<sup>2</sup> They invent ways and means to hang onto whatever they have acquired by sharp practice, and then they scheme to oppress the poor by buying up their toil and labor as cheaply as possible. These devices become law as soon as the rich, speaking for the commonwealth—which, of course, includes the poor as well—say they must be observed.

And yet, when these insatiably greedy and evil men have divided among themselves all the goods which would have sufficed for the entire people, how far they remain from the happiness of the Utopian republic, which has abolished not only money but with it greed! What a mass of trouble was cut away by that one step! What a multitude of crimes was pulled up by the roots! Everyone knows that if money were abolished, fraud, theft, robbery, quarrels, brawls, altercations, seditions, murders, treasons, poisonings, and a whole set of crimes which are avenged but not prevented by the hangman would at once die out. If money disappeared, so would fear, anxiety, worry, toil, and sleepless nights. Even poverty, the one condition which seems more than anything else to need money for its relief, would die away if money were entirely abolished.

Consider, if you will, this example. Take a barren year of failed harvests, when many thousands of people have been carried off by famine. If at the end of the scarcity the barns of the rich were searched, I dare say positively that enough grain would be found in them to have kept all those who died of starvation and disease from even realizing that a shortage ever existed—if only it had been divided among them. So easily might people get the necessities of life if that cursed money, that marvelous invention which is supposed to provide access to them, were not in fact the only barrier to our getting what we need to live. Even the rich, I'm sure, understand this. They must know that it's better to have enough of what we really need than an abundance of superfluities, much better to escape from our many present troubles than to be burdened with great masses of wealth. And in fact I have no doubt that every man's perception of where his true interest lies, along with the authority of Christ our Savior (whose wisdom could not fail to recognize the best, and whose goodness would not fail to counsel it), would long ago have brought the whole world to adopt Utopian laws, if it were not for one single monster, the prime plague and begetter of all others—I mean Pride.

Pride measures her advantages not by what she has but by what others lack. Pride would not condescend even to be made a goddess, if there were no wretches for her to sneer at and domineer over. Her good fortune is dazzling only by contrast with the miseries of others, her riches are valuable only as they torment and tantalize the poverty of others. Pride is a serpent from hell that twines itself around the hearts of men; and it acts like a suckfish<sup>3</sup> in holding them back from choosing a better way of life.

Pride is too deeply fixed in human nature to be easily plucked out. So I am glad that the Utopians at least have been lucky enough to achieve this commonwealth, which I wish all mankind would imitate. The institutions they have adopted have made their community most happy, and, as far as anyone can tell, capable of lasting forever. Now that they have rooted up the seeds of ambition and faction at home, along with most other vices, they are in no danger from internal strife, which alone has been the ruin of many cities that seemed secure. As long as they preserve harmony at home, and keep their institutions healthy, the Utopians can never be overcome or even shaken by all the envious princes of neighboring countries, who have often attempted their ruin, but always in vain.

When Raphael had finished his story, I was left thinking that not a few of the customs and laws he had described as existing among the Utopians were quite absurd. These included their methods of waging war, their religious practices, as well as other customs of theirs, but my chief objection was to the basis of their whole system, that is, their communal living and their moneyless economy. This one thing alone takes away all the nobility, magnificence, splendor, and majesty which (in the popular view) are the true ornaments and glory of any commonwealth. But I saw Raphael was tired with talking, and I was not sure he could take contradiction in these matters, particularly when I remembered what he had said about certain people who were afraid they might not appear wise unless they found out something to criticize in the ideas of others. So with praise for the Utopian way of life and his account of it, I took him by the hand and led him in to supper. But first I said that we would find some other time for thinking of these matters more deeply, and for talking them over in more detail. And I still hope such an opportunity will present itself someday.

Meanwhile, though he is a man of unquestionable learning, and highly experienced in the ways of the world, I cannot agree with everything he said. Yet I freely confess there are very many things in the Utopian commonwealth that in our own societies I would wish rather than expect to see.

- Note 1:
The early editions of Utopia include, in Book II, eight section headings. These help in locating the treatment of particular topics in Hythloday's rather sprawling discourse, but since in several instances the headings identify only the initial topic of a section, they can also be misleading. In the present edition, they are supplemented by additional headings, enclosed in brackets to identify them as editorial insertions.

The word appears to be constructed from Greek sophos (wise)—or perhaps syphEOS (of the sty)—plus gerontes (old men). The etymology for "tranibor" (below) seems to be traneis or tranos (clear, plain, distinct) plus boros (devouring, gluttonous). There is no explanation of why Hythloday consistently uses the “older” form of the titles.

A strange statement, since in More’s time most women selected, prepared, and cooked the family food; did the family laundry; performed a thousand other routine tasks of domestic drudgery; and were responsible for taking care of the children. If an average household includes thirteen adults, and there are 6,000 households per city (not counting those on the surrounding farms), then there are about 78,000 adults per city; allowing for children and slaves, the total population must be well in excess of 100,000, making every Utopian city larger than all but the greatest European cities of the time. Whether More actually made these calculations (or whether there is really much point in making them) is another matter.
Return to reference 9
- Note 1:
Utopian women enjoy considerably more equality with men than did their 16th-century European counterparts, but Utopian social relations as a whole exhibit the same patriarchal structure that had always been prevalent in Europe and was sanctioned in classical and biblical texts (for example, Aristotle, Politics 1.12.1–2; Ephesians 5:22–6:4) as well as in many later ones.

- Note 2: The institution of the common messes has precedents in ancient Sparta and in the designs for an ideal commonwealth by Plato (Republic 3.416E) and Aristotle (Politics 7.10.10). From Greek anemolios, "windy." The story of the Anemolian ambassadors owes much to "Nigrinus," a dialogue by the Syrian satirist Lucian (2nd century C.E.) in which a rich Roman makes a fool of himself by strolling around Athens in a purple robe. More and Erasmus had published a volume of Latin translations of Lucian (who wrote in Greek) in 1506.

- Note 3: Probably the Parva logicalia, a textbook of logic by Peter of Spain, later Pope John XXI (d. 1277).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Man conceived of as a "universal." "Second intentions": in Scholastic discourse, purely abstract conceptions, derived from "first intentions" (the direct apprehensions of things). That is, the Utopians' primary affinity in moral philosophy is with the hedonistic school founded by Epicurus (341–271 B.C.E.). Compare Vespucci on the Native Americans: "I deem their manner of life to be Epicurean." Contrary to popular opinion, however, Epicurus himself did not mean, by the pursuit of pleasure, mere indiscriminating sensual indulgence: like the Utopians, he placed primary emphasis on the pleasures of a virtuous, rational life.
Return to reference 7
- Note 8: These rules for choosing among pleasures are attributed to Epicurus (Diogenes Laertius, Lives of Eminent Philosophers 10.129).Return to reference 8

- Note 1: The Syrian-born ironist who was admired, translated, and imitated by both More and Erasmus (see p. 86, n. 7). The writings of Plutarch (ca. 46–ca. 120 C.E.) referred to presumably include his Moral Essays as well as his Parallel Lives of eminent Greeks and Romans.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The first printed edition of Sophocles was that of Aldus Manutius in 1502. The house of Aldus, established in Venice toward the end of the 15th century, not only was the first establishment to print Greek texts in Greek type but was responsible for some of the best-designed books in the history of the art.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Thucydides and Herodotus (both 5th century B.C.E.) are the preeminent Greek historians. Herodian (ca. 175–250 C.E.) wrote a history of the Roman emperors of the 2nd and 3rd centuries.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Hippocrates (5th century B.C.E.) and Galen (2nd century C.E.) were the most influential Greek medical writers. The Microtechne is a medieval summary of Galen's ideas. The name Tricius Apinatus (like Hythloday) is a learned joke: in classical Italy, Trica and Apina were extinct towns whose names, taken together, were proverbial for trifling, worthless things.Return to reference 4
- Note 5:
The institution of slavery—with prisoners of war (civilians as well as combatants) as a major source of the people to be enslaved

—was ubiquitous in the ancient world, including the Greek and Roman civilizations that Utopia resembles in various ways. In Europe, slavery declined in the Middle Ages, being replaced as a source of labor by feudal serfdom, in which individuals were bound to the land rather than to a particular owner. Chattel slavery, however, revived strongly in the European colonies in the New World: the enslavement of Native Americans began with the earliest settlements, in the 1490s, and enslaved people from Africa were imported from Spain to Hispaniola in the Caribbean in 1502.

Return to reference 5

- Note 6: This fact sharply distinguishes Utopian slavery from both classical and early modern slavery and medieval serfdom.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: In ancient Rome, suicide was regarded as an honorable way out of deep personal or political difficulties, but neither suicide nor euthanasia has ever been acceptable in Catholic Christianity. See Hythloday's earlier reference to God's prohibition of suicide.Return to reference 7

- Note 3: Marginal gloss: "The useless crowd of lawyers." More was, of course, one himself.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: In fact the crowned heads of Europe and the popes alike were ruthless and casual violators of treaties.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: "People Born from the Clouds" versus "Citizens of a Country without People."Return to reference 5

- Note 6: “Busy sellers.” The Zapoletes resemble the Swiss, who produced the best and most feared mercenaries of Europe (a remnant still survives as the Swiss Guard in the Vatican).Return to reference 6
- Note 7:
The military devices of the Utopians represent a patchwork of notions from the common knowledge of the day. Their camps are fortified like Roman ones. Their reliance on archery links them with the English, whose archers had played key roles in the famous victories over the French at Crécy and Agincourt—though the Utopians’ skill in shooting arrows from horseback recalls the ancient Parthians and Scythians. Their “machines” are presumably like Roman dart hurlers, battering rams, and stone throwers, but the emphasis on their portability probably reflects contemporary experience with cannon, which were extremely hard to drag over the muddy roads of the time.
Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Gold coins of this name were minted by several European states. Four ducats of Venice, Burgundy, or Hungary were roughly equivalent to an English pound, and the pound itself was worth several hundred times its value today. The point is that the Utopians’ annual income from the estates is huge.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: In ancient Persian religion, Mithra (or Mithras) was the spirit of light.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The communist practice of the early Christians is described in Acts 2:44–45 and 4:32–35. Many monastic and ascetic orders still made a practice of abolishing private property for their members.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Of the seven Catholic sacraments, only baptism and matrimony can be conferred by laymen. Priests are created by ordination by a bishop (the Utopian priests are elected; see below).Return to reference 2
- Note 3:
This was not the attitude More took a decade after Utopia, when, the Reformation schism having begun, he was involved in the prosecution of Protestant heretics, sometimes to the death. In the Dialogue Concerning Heresies (1529), he wrote that "if it were now doubtful and ambiguous whether the church of Christ were in the right rule of doctrine or not, then were it very necessary to give them all good audience that could and would anything dispute on either party for it or against it, to the end that if we were now in a wrong way, we might leave it and walk in some better." Utopia was in this hypothetical situation; England, in More's view, was not.

Return to reference 3

- Note 4: These Utopians resemble the ancient Pythagoreans, who, as a facet of their doctrine of the transmigration of souls, conceded them to animals.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Presumably the priests only supervise the teaching: there are only thirteen of them per city, whereas each city is home to thousands of children.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Marginal gloss: "But what a crowd of them we have!"Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Marginal gloss: "O priests far holier than our own!"Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The Greek coinage Trapemerns actually means "turning-days"; Cynemerns means "dog-days" (or perhaps "starting-days").Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Separation of the sexes in church had been customary since the early Christian centuries.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Perhaps related to Vespucci's observation that the Native Americans' wealth "consists of feathers of many-hued birds . . . and of many other things to which we attach no value."Return to reference 1
- Note 2:
Marginal gloss: "Reader, note well!" In the text at this point, More may be alluding to the judgment of Saint Augustine in The City of God 4.4: "Take away justice, and what are kingdoms but great robber bands?" As a young man, More had given a series of public lectures on Augustine's book.

Thomas More to His Friend Peter Giles, Warmest Greetings<sup>1</sup>

My dear Peter, I was absolutely delighted with the judgment of that very sharp fellow you recall, who posed this dilemma about my Utopia: if the story is put forward as fact, he said, then I see a number of absurdities in it; but if it's fiction, then it seems to me that in various respects More's usual good judgment is at fault. I suspect this fellow of being learned, and I see that he's a friend; but whoever he is, I'm much obliged to him. By this frank opinion of his, he has pleased me more than anyone else since the book was published.

For in the first place, either out of fondness for me or for the work itself, he seems to have borne up under the burden of reading the book all the way through—and that not perfunctorily or hastily, the way priests read the divine office—those, at least, who read it at all.<sup>2</sup> No, he read slowly and attentively, noting all the particular points. Then, having singled out certain matters for criticism, and not very many, as a matter of fact, he gives careful and considered approval to the rest. And finally, in the very expressions he uses to criticize me, he implies higher praises than some of those who have put all their energies into compliment. It's easy to see what a high opinion he has of me, when he expresses disappointment over reading something imperfect or inexact—whereas I don't expect, in treating so many different matters, to be able to say more than a few things which aren't totally ridiculous.

Still, I'd like to be just as frank with him as he was with me; and, in fact, I don't see why he should think himself so acute (so "sharp-sighted," as the Greeks would say) just because he's discovered some absurdities in the institutions of Utopia, or caught me putting forth some half-baked ideas about the constitution of a republic. Aren't there any absurdities elsewhere in the world? And did any one of the philosophers who've offered a pattern of a society, a ruler, or even a private household set down everything so well that nothing ought to be changed? Actually, if it weren't for the great respect I retain for certain highly distinguished names, I could easily produce from each of them a number of notions which I can hardly doubt would be universally condemned as absurd.

But when he wonders whether Utopia is fact or fiction, then I find his judgment, in turn, sorely at fault. I do not deny that if I'd decided to write about a commonwealth, and a tale of this sort had occurred to me, I might have spread a little fiction, like so much honey, over the truth, to make it more acceptable. But I would certainly have tempered the fiction a little, so that, while it deceived the common folk, I gave hints to the more learned which would enable them to see what I was about. So, if I'd done nothing but give special names to the governor, the river, the city, and the island, which hinted to the learned that the island was nowhere, the city a phantom, the river waterless, and that the governor had no people,<sup>3</sup> that would not have been hard to do, and would have been far more clever than what I actually did. Unless I had a historian's devotion to fact, I am not so stupid as to have used those barbarous and senseless names of Utopia, Anyder, Amaurot, and Ademus.

Still, my dear Giles, I see some people are so suspicious that what we simple-minded and credulous fellows have written down of Hythloday's account can hardly find any credence at all with these circumspect and sagacious persons. I'm afraid my personal reputation, as well as my authority as a historian, may be threatened by their skepticism; so it's a good thing that I can defend myself by saying, as Terence's Mysis says about Glycerium's boy, to confirm his legitimacy, "Praise be to God there were some free women present at his birth."<sup>4</sup> And so it was a good thing for me that Raphael told his story not just to you and me, but to a great many perfectly respectable and serious-minded men. Whether he told them more things, and more important things, I don't know; but I'm sure he told them no fewer and no less important things than he told us.

Well, if these doubters won't believe such witnesses, let them consult Hythloday himself, for he is still alive. I heard only recently from some travelers coming out of Portugal that on the first of last March he was as healthy and vigorous a man as he ever was. Let them get the truth from him—dig it out of him with questions, if they want. I only want them to understand that I'm responsible for my own work, and my own work alone, not for anyone else's credibility.

Farewell, my dearest Peter, to you, your charming wife, and your clever little girl—to all, my wife sends her very best wishes.

SIR THOMAS WYATT THE ELDER 1503–1542

Thomas Wyatt made his career in the shifting, dangerous currents of Renaissance courts, whose power struggles, sexual intrigues, and sophisticated tastes shaped his remarkable achievements as a poet. Educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, Wyatt entered the service of Henry VIII, becoming clerk of the king's jewels, a member of diplomatic missions to France and the Low Countries, and, in 1537–39, ambassador to Spain at the court of the Holy Roman Emperor, Charles V. The years he spent abroad as a diplomat had a significant impact on his writing, imbuing it with the spirit of Continental Renaissance poetry. Diplomacy, with its veiled threats, rhetorical manipulation, and cynical role-playing, may have had a more indirect impact as well, reinforcing the lessons in self-presentation and self-concealment that Wyatt would have received at the English court.

Life in the orbit of the ruthless, unpredictable Henry VIII was competitive and risky. When, in the late 1530s, Wyatt wrote to his son of the "thousand dangers and hazards, enmities, hatreds, prisonments, despites [insults], and indignations" he had faced, he was not exaggerating. He probably came closest to the executioner's ax when in 1536 he was imprisoned in the Tower of London along with several others accused of having committed adultery with the queen, Anne Boleyn. As his poem "Who List His Wealth and Ease Retain" suggests, Wyatt may have watched from his cell the execution of the queen and her alleged lovers; but he himself was spared, as he was spared a few years later, when he was again imprisoned in the Tower, on charges of high treason brought by his enemies at court. His death, at the age of thirty-nine, came from a fever.

It is not surprising, given his career, that many of Wyatt's poems, including his satires and his psalm translations, express an intense longing for "steadfastness" and an escape from the corruption, anxiety, and duplicity of the court. The praise, in his verse epistle to John Poins, of a quiet retired life in the country and the harsh condemnation of courtly hypocrisy derive from his own experience. But the eloquent celebration of simplicity and truthfulness can itself be a cunning strategy. Wyatt was a master of the game of poetic self-display. Again and again he represents himself as a plain-speaking and steadfast man, betrayed by the "doubleness" of a fickle mistress or the instability of fortune. At this distance it is impossible to know how much this account corresponds to reality, but we can admire, as Wyatt's contemporaries did, the rhetorical deftness of the performance.

In a move with momentous consequences for English poetry, Wyatt introduced into English the sonnet, a fourteen-line poem in iambic pentameter with a complex, intertwining rhyme scheme and the development of one or more sustained metaphors or "conceits." For the most part, he took his subject matter from the sonnets of Francesco Petrarca (anglicized as "Petrarch"; 1304–1374), an Italian poet who, over twenty years, wrote obsessive poems about his love for the unattainable "Laura." But while Petrarch's sonnets consist of an "octave," rhyming abba abba, followed, after a turn (volta) in the sense, by a "sestet" with various rhyme schemes (such as cd cd cd and cde cde), Wyatt's most common sestet scheme is cddc ee. He began the process of changing the Petrarchan sonnet into what was to become the characteristic "English" structure for the sonnet: three quatrains and a closing couplet.

In his freest translations of Petrarchan sonnets, such as "Whoso List to Hunt," Wyatt tends to turn the idealizing of the woman into disillusionment and complaint. For the lover in Petrarch's poems, love is an ongoing, transcendent experience, extending beyond the boundaries of life itself; for the lover in Wyatt's poems, it is all too transient and embittering. The tone of bitterness carries over to many poems less closely linked to Italian and French models, poems with short stanzas and refrains that associate them with the native English song tradition. Some of Wyatt's songs, to be sure, strike a note of jaunty independence, often tinged with misogyny; but melancholy complaint is rarely very distant. Perhaps the poem that most brilliantly captures his blend of passion, anger, cynicism, longing, and pain is "They Flee from Me."

Wyatt never published a collection of his own poems, and very few of them appeared in print during his lifetime. Carefully crafted pieces in an elaborate and sometimes risky erotic chess game, many of them may have been designed for specific social occasions, to be recited or sometimes set to music and sung to the accompaniment of a lute. In addition to such oral performances, the poems were written out, exchanged, and circulated in manuscript, both within a small, exclusive circle of friends and among those beyond the court who were eager to enjoy the latest poetic fashions.

Contemporaries clearly took pleasure in staging and savoring the drama of sexual relations: the Devonshire Manuscript, one of the chief sources for Wyatt's verse, collects a variety of poetic perspectives on courtship. The miscellany contains not only several male-authored poems in a female voice but also a number of poems probably written by women, along with many more transcribed by female hands. Wyatt was writing within a larger game of social competition and exchange.

In 1557 (fifteen years after Wyatt's death), 97 poems attributed to him were included by the printer Richard Tottel among the 271 poems in his miscellany, Songs and Sonnets. By the time this collection was published, Wyatt's deliberately rough, vigorous, and expressive metrical practice was felt to be crude, and Tottel (or perhaps some intermediary) smoothed out the versification. We reprint "They Flee from Me" both in Tottel's "improved" version and in the version found in the Egerton Manuscript, which contains poems in Wyatt's own hand and corrections he made to scribal copies of his poems.

In the following selections we have divided the poems into three generic groups: sonnets, other lyrics, and finally a satire. Within each of the first two groups, the poems are printed in the order in which they appear in the manuscripts. There is no reason to think that this is a chronological ordering.

The Long Love That in My Thought Doth Harbor<sup>1</sup>

The long love that in my thought doth harbor,
And in mine heart doth keep his residence,
Into my face presseth with bold pretense
And therein campeth, spreading his banner.<sup>2</sup>
5 She that me learneth<sup>o</sup> to love and suffer
And will that my trust and lust's negligence<sup>3</sup>
Be reined by reason, shame, and reverence,
With his hardiness taketh displeasure.
Wherewithal<sup>o</sup> unto the heart's forest he fleeth,
10 Leaving his enterprise with pain and cry,
And there him hideth, and not appeareth.
What may I do, when my master feareth,
But in the field with him to live and die?
For good is the life ending faithfully.

- Note 2:
That is, the speaker's blush. The first four lines of this sonnet introduce the "conceit" (elaborately sustained metaphor) of Love as a warrior who, "with bold pretense" (that is, making bold claim), flaunts his presence by means of the "banner." Elaborate metaphors of this kind are common in Petrarchan (and Elizabethan) love poetry, and often, as in this instance, an entire sonnet will turn on a single conceit.

A MODERN PROSE TRANSLATION<sup>4</sup>

Love, who lives and reigns in my thought and keeps his principal seat in my heart, sometimes comes forth all in armor into my forehead, there camps, and there sets up his banner.

She who teaches us to love and to be patient, and wishes my great desire, my kindled hope, to be reined in by reason, shame, and reverence, at our boldness is angry within herself.

Wherefore Love flees terrified to my heart, abandoning his every enterprise, and weeps and trembles; there he hides and no more appears outside.

What can I do, when my lord is afraid, except stay with him until the last hour? For he makes a good end who dies loving well.

Whoso List to Hunt<sup>1</sup>

Whoso list<sup>o</sup> to hunt, I know where is an hind,<sup>o</sup>
But as for me, alas, I may no more.
The vain travail<sup>o</sup> hath wearied me so sore,<sup>o</sup>
I am of them that farthest cometh behind.
5 Yet may I, by no means, my wearied mind
Draw from the deer, but as she fleeth afore, Fainting I follow. I leave off, therefore,
Since in a net I seek to hold the wind.
Who list her hunt, I put him out of doubt,<sup>o</sup>
10 As well as I, may spend his time in vain.
And graven with diamonds in letters plain
There is written, her fair neck round about, “Noli me tangere, for Caesar’s I am,
And wild for to hold, though I seem tame.”

E. MS.

Endnotes

- Note 1:
An adaptation of Petrarch’s Rima 190, perhaps influenced by commentators on Petrarch, who said that Noli me tangere quia Caesaris sum (Touch me not, for I am Caesar’s) was inscribed on the collars of Caesar’s hinds, which were then set free and were presumably safe from hunters. Wyatt’s sonnet is usually supposed to refer to Anne Boleyn, in whom Henry VIII became interested in 1526.

A MODERN PROSE TRANSLATION

A white doe on the green grass appeared to me, with two golden horns, between two rivers, in the shade of a laurel, when the sun was rising in the unripe season.

Her look was so sweet and proud that to follow her I left every task, like the miser who as he seeks treasure sweetens his trouble with delight.

"Let no one touch me," she bore written with diamonds and topazes around her lovely neck. "It has pleased my Caesar to make me free."

And the sun had already turned at midday; my eyes were tired by looking but not sated, when I fell into the water, and she disappeared.

I Find No Peace<sup>1</sup>

I find no peace, and all my war is done,
I fear and hope, I burn and freeze like ice,
I fly above the wind, yet can I not arise,
And naught I have, and all the world I seize on.
5 That<sup>o</sup> looseth nor locketh holdeth me in prison,
And holdeth me not, yet can I 'scape nowise;
Nor letteth me live nor die at my devise,<sup>o</sup>
And yet of death it giveth me occasion.
Without eyen<sup>o</sup> I see, and without tongue I plain;<sup>o</sup>
10 I desire to perish, and yet I ask health;
I love another, and thus I hate myself;
I feed me in sorrow, and laugh in all my pain.
Likewise displeaseth me both death and life,
And my delight is causer of this strife.

A MODERN PROSE TRANSLATION

Peace I do not find, and I have no wish to make war; and I fear and hope, and burn and am of ice; and I fly above the heavens and lie on the ground; and I grasp nothing and embrace all the world.

One has me in prison who neither opens nor locks, neither keeps me for his own nor unties the bonds; and Love does not kill and does not unchain me, he neither wishes me alive nor frees me from the tangle.

I see without eyes, and I have no tongue and yet cry out; and I wish to perish and I ask for help; and I hate myself and love another.

I feed on pain, weeping I laugh; equally displeasing to me are death and life. In this state am I, Lady, on account of you.

My Galley<sup>1</sup>

My galley charged<sup>o</sup> with forgetfulness<sup>2</sup>
Thorough<sup>o</sup> sharp seas, in winter nights doth pass
'Tween rock and rock; and eke<sup>o</sup> mine enemy, alas,
That is my lord, steereth with cruelness;
And every oar a thought in readiness,
5 As though that death were light in such a case.<sup>3</sup>
An endless wind doth tear the sail apace<sup>o</sup>
Of forced sighs and trusty fearfulness.<sup>o</sup>
A rain of tears, a cloud of dark disdain,
Hath done the wearied cords great hinderance;
10 Wreathed<sup>o</sup> with error and eke with ignorance.
The stars be hid that led me to this pain.
Drowned is reason that should me consort,<sup>o</sup>
And I remain despairing of the port.

A MODERN PROSE TRANSLATION

My ship laden with forgetfulness passes through a harsh sea, at midnight, in winter, between Scylla and Charybdis,<sup>4</sup> and at the tiller sits my lord, rather my enemy;

each oar is manned by a ready, cruel thought that seems to scorn the tempest and the end; a wet, changeless wind of sighs, hopes, and desires breaks the sail;

a rain of weeping, a mist of disdain wet and loosen the already weary ropes, made of error twisted up with ignorance.

My two usual sweet stars are hidden; dead among the waves are reason and skill; so that I begin to despair of the port.

They Flee from Me

They flee from me, that sometime did me seek
With naked foot stalking<sup>o</sup> in my chamber.
I have seen them gentle, tame, and meek
That now are wild and do not remember
That sometime they put themself in danger

Busily seeking with a continual change.

Thanked be fortune it hath been otherwise
Twenty times better; but once in special,
In thin array, after a pleasant guise,
10 When her loose gown from her shoulders did fall,
And she me caught in her arms long and small,<sup>o</sup>
Therewithal<sup>o</sup> sweetly did me kiss
And softly said, "Dear heart, how like you this?"

My Lute, Awake!

My lute, awake! Perform the last
Labor that thou and I shall waste,
And end that I have now begun:
For when this song is sung and past,
5 My lute be still, for I have done.

As to be heard where ear is none,
As lead to grave in marble stone,<sup>1</sup>
My song may pierce her heart as soon.
Should we then sigh or sing or moan?
10 No, no, my lute, for I have done.

The rocks do not so cruelly
Repulse the waves continually
As she my suit and affection.
So that I am past remedy,
15 Whereby my lute and I have done.

Proud of the spoil that thou hast got
Of simple hearts, thorough<sup>o</sup> Love's shot,
By whom, unkind, thou hast them won,
Think not he hath his bow forgot,
20 Although my lute and I have done.

Vengeance shall fall on thy disdain
That makest but game on earnest pain.
Think not alone under the sun
Unquit<sup>o</sup> to cause thy lovers plain,<sup>o</sup>
25 Although my lute and I have done.

Perchance thee lie<sup>2</sup> withered and old

30 The winter nights that are so cold,
Plaining in vain unto the moon.
Thy wishes then dare not be told.
Care then who list,<sup>o</sup> for I have done.

35 And then may chance thee to repent
The time that thou hast lost and spent
To cause thy lovers sigh and swoon.
Then shalt thou know beauty but lent,
And wish and want as I have done.

40 Now cease, my lute. This is the last
Labor that thou and I shall waste,
And ended is that we begun.
Now is this song both sung and past;
My lute be still, for I have done.

Mine Own John Poins<sup>1</sup>

Mine own John Poins, since ye delight to know
The cause why that homeward I me draw
(And flee the press of courts, whereso they go,
Rather than to live thrall under the awe
Of lordly looks) wrapped within my cloak,
5 To will and lust<sup>o</sup> learning to set a law;
It is not for because I scorn or mock
The power of them to whom Fortune hath lent
Charge over us, of right to strike the stroke.<sup>2</sup>
But true it is that I have always meant
10 Less to esteem them than the common sort,

Without regard what doth inward resort.
I grant sometime that of glory the fire
Doth touch my heart; me list not to report
15 Blame by honor, and honor to desire.<sup>3</sup>
But how may I this honor now attain,
That cannot dye the color black a liar?<sup>4</sup>
My Poins, I cannot frame my tune to feign,
To cloak the truth for praise, without desert,
20 Of them that list<sup>o</sup> all vice for to retain.
I cannot honor them that sets their part
With Venus and Bacchus all their life long,<sup>5</sup>
Nor hold my peace of<sup>o</sup> them although I smart.
I cannot crouch nor kneel nor do so great a wrong
25 To worship them like God on earth alone
That are as wolves these sely<sup>o</sup> lambs among.
I cannot with my words complain and moan
And suffer naught,<sup>o</sup> nor smart without complaint,
Nor turn the word that from my mouth is gone;

30 I cannot speak and look like a saint,
Use wiles for wit<sup>o</sup> and make deceit a pleasure,
And call craft<sup>o</sup> counsel, for profit still to paint;<sup>o</sup>
I cannot wrest the law to fill the coffer,
35 With innocent blood to feed myself fat,
And do most hurt where most help I offer.
I am not he that can allow<sup>o</sup> the state<sup>o</sup>
Of high Caesar and damn Cato<sup>6</sup> to die,
That with his death did 'scape out of the gate
40 From Caesar's hands, if Livy<sup>7</sup> do not lie,
And would not live where liberty was lost,
So did his heart the common weal apply.<sup>8</sup>
I am not he such eloquence to boast
To make the crow singing as the swan,
Nor call the lion of coward beasts the most,
45 That cannot take a mouse as the cat can;
And he that dieth for hunger of the gold,
Call him Alexander,<sup>9</sup> and say that Pan
Passeth<sup>o</sup> Apollo in music many fold;<sup>1</sup>
Praise Sir Thopas for a noble tale,
50 And scorn the story that the Knight told;<sup>2</sup>
Praise him for counsel that is drunk of ale;
Grin when he laugheth that beareth all the sway,<sup>o</sup>
Frown when he frowneth, and groan when he is pale;
On other's lust<sup>o</sup> to hang both night and day—
55 None of these points would ever frame in me;<sup>o</sup>
My wit<sup>o</sup> is naught:<sup>o</sup> I cannot learn the way;
And much the less of things that greater be,
That asken help of colors of device<sup>o</sup>
To join the mean with each extremity:
60 With the nearest virtue to cloak alway the vice,
And, as to purpose likewise it shall fall,<sup>3</sup>
To press the virtue that it may not rise;
As drunkenness, good fellowship to call;

65 The friendly foe, with his double face,
Say he is gentle and courteous therewithal;<sup>o</sup>
And say that favel<sup>o</sup> hath a goodly grace
In eloquence; and cruelty to name
Zeal of justice, and change in time and place;<sup>4</sup>
And he that suffereth offense<sup>o</sup> without blame, 70 Call him pitiful,<sup>o</sup> and him true and plain
That railleth reckless<sup>o</sup> to every man's shame;
Say he is rude<sup>o</sup> that cannot lie and feign,
The lecher a lover, and tyranny
To be the right of a prince's reign.
75 I cannot, I: no, no, it will not be.
This is the cause that I could never yet
Hang on their sleeves that weigh, as thou mayst see,
A chip of chance more than a pound of wit.
This maketh me at home to hunt and hawk
80 And in foul weather at my book to sit;
In frost and snow then with my bow to stalk.
No man doth mark<sup>o</sup> whereso I ride or go.
In lusty leas<sup>o</sup> at liberty I walk,
And of these news I feel nor weal nor woe,
85 Save that a clog doth hang yet at my heel.<sup>5</sup>
No force<sup>o</sup> for that, for it is ordered so
That I may leap both hedge and dike full well.
I am not now in France, to judge the wine,
With sav'ry sauce the delicates<sup>o</sup> to feel;
90 Nor yet in Spain, where one must him incline,
Rather than to be, outwardly to seem.
I meddle not with wits that be so fine;
Nor Flanders' cheer<sup>6</sup> letteth<sup>o</sup> not my sight to deem
Of black and white, nor taketh my wit away
95 With beastliness they, beasts, do so esteem.
Nor am I not where Christ is given in prey
For money, poison, and treason—at Rome<sup>7</sup>
A common practice, used night and day.

But here I am in Kent and Christendom,
 Among the Muses, where I read and rhyme;
 Where if thou list, my Poins, for to come,
 Thou shalt be judge how I do spend my time.

 Poins was a friend of Wyatt's. This verse epistle of informal satire is based on the tenth satire of the Italian Luigi Alamanni but is personalized and Anglicized in detail by Wyatt. It was apparently written during his banishment from court, in 1536. Lines 1–52 of the poem are missing from the authoritative Egerton Manuscript and are here supplied from the Devonshire Manuscript.

HENRY HOWARD, EARL OF SURREY

1517–1547

The ax that decapitated Surrey at the age of thirty had been hanging over his head for much of his life. In the court of Henry VIII, it was dangerous to be a potential claimant to the throne, and Surrey was descended from kings on both sides of his family. He was brought up at Windsor Castle as the close companion of Henry VIII's illegitimate son, the Duke of Richmond, who married Surrey's sister. As the eldest son of the Duke of Norfolk, the chief bulwark of the old Catholic aristocracy against the rising tide of "new men" and the reformed religion, Surrey was the heir not only to the Howard family's great wealth but also to the family's immense pride, its sense at once of noble privilege and of obligation. Like his father and grandfather, he was a brave and able soldier, serving in Henry VIII's French wars as "Lieutenant General of the King on Sea and Land." He was also repeatedly imprisoned for rash behavior, on one occasion for striking a courtier, on another for wandering through the streets of London breaking the windows of sleeping townspeople. In 1541 Surrey used his family connections—his first cousin, Catherine Howard, was queen—to secure the release from the Tower of his close friend the poet Thomas Wyatt, who had been accused of treason. But a year later, Catherine Howard was executed for adultery, like Anne Boleyn before her. Power returned to the rival family of the former queen Jane Seymour, who had died in childbirth giving a son and heir to the aging Henry VIII. Surrey's situation was already precarious, and his vocal opposition to the Seymours, with their strong Protestant leanings, sealed his fate. Convicted of treason, he had the grim distinction of being Henry's last victim.

Poets and critics of the later sixteenth century, fascinated by Surrey's noble rank and his tragic fate, routinely praised him as one of the very greatest English poets. The full title of Tottel's influential miscellany, published in 1557 (ten years after Surrey's death), is Songs and Sonnets Written by the Right Honorable Lord Henry Howard Late Earl of Surrey and Other. The principal "other" here is his older friend Wyatt, with whose poetry Surrey's is closely linked. Poets who circulated their verse in manuscript in a courtly milieu, the two shared a passion for French and Italian poetry, especially for Petrarch's sonnets. Surrey established a form for these that was used by Shakespeare and that has become known as the English sonnet: three quatrains and a couplet, all in iambic pentameter and rhyming abab cdcd efef gg. Even more significant, he was the first English poet to publish in blank verse—unrhymed iambic pentameter—a verse form so popular in the succeeding centuries that it has come to seem almost native to the language. The work in which he used his "strange meter," as the publisher called it, was a translation of part of Virgil's Aeneid, a Latin epic poem telling the legendary story of Aeneas of Troy and written between 29 and 19 B.C.E. Managing the five-stress line with exceptional skill, Surrey initiated the rhythmic fluency that distinguishes so many Elizabethan lyrics. It is striking that his two great literary innovations, the English sonnet and blank verse, should emerge in the same period that saw radical upheavals in traditional religious and social life. It is possible that he was drawn to Virgil's epic because it offered a model of continuity in the face of disaster. Aeneas cannot prevent the fall of Troy, but, carrying his household gods with him, he leads his followers to a new land, Italy, where his descendants will found a city, the future Rome.

As a conventional love poet Surrey is not very convincing: in 1593 Thomas Nashe wrote sardonically that Surrey "was more in love with his own curious forming fancy" than with this mistress's face. His verse comes alive when he writes about his deep male friendships ("So Cruel Prison" and the moving epitaph he published on Wyatt), or imagines himself as a woman longing for her absent man ("O Happy Dames").

Our selections from Surrey are divided into two groups: sonnets are followed by lyric and reflective poems.

The Soote Season<sup>1</sup>

The soote<sup>o</sup> season, that bud and bloom forth brings,
With green hath clad the hill and eke<sup>o</sup> the vale.
The nightingale with feathers new she sings;
The turtle to her make<sup>o</sup> hath told her tale.
5 Summer is come, for every spray now springs.
The hart hath hung his old head on the pale;<sup>o</sup>
The buck in brake<sup>o</sup> his winter coat he flings;
The fishes float with new repaired scale;
The adder all her slough<sup>o</sup> away she slings;
10 The swift swallow pursueth the flies small;
The busy bee her honey now she mings.<sup>o</sup>
Winter is worn, that was the flowers' bale.<sup>o</sup>
And thus I see among these pleasant things,
Each care decays, and yet my sorrow springs.

A MODERN PROSE TRANSLATION<sup>2</sup>

Zephyrus returns and leads back the fine weather and the flowers and the grass, his sweet family, and chattering Procne and weeping Philomena,<sup>3</sup> and Spring, all white and vermillion;

the meadows laugh and the sky becomes clear again, Jupiter is gladdened looking at his daughter,<sup>4</sup> the air and the waters and the earth are full of love, every animal takes counsel again to love.

But to me, alas, come back heavier sighs, which she draws from my deepest heart, she who carried off to Heaven the keys to it; and the singing of little birds, and the flowering of meadows, and virtuous gentle gestures in beautiful ladies are a wilderness and cruel, savage beasts.

Love, That Doth Reign and Live Within My Thought<sup>1</sup>

Love, that doth reign and live within my thought,
And built his seat within my captive breast,
Clad in the arms wherein with me he fought,
Oft in my face he doth his banner rest.
5 But she that taught me love and suffer pain,
My doubtful hope and eke<sup>o</sup> my hot desire
With shamefast<sup>o</sup> look to shadow and refrain,<sup>o</sup>
Her smiling grace converteth straight to ire.
And coward Love then to the heart apace<sup>o</sup>
10 Taketh his flight, where he doth lurk and plain,<sup>o</sup>
His purpose lost, and dare not show his face.
For my lord's guilt thus faultless bide<sup>o</sup> I pain,
Yet from my lord shall not my foot remove:
Sweet is the death that taketh end by love.

Alas! So All Things Now Do Hold Their Peace<sup>1</sup>

Alas! so all things now do hold their peace,
Heaven and earth disturbèd in no thing.
The beasts, the air, the birds their song do cease;
The nightè's chare<sup>2</sup> the stars about doth bring;
5 Calm is the sea, the waves work less and less.
So am not I, whom love, alas, doth wring,
Bringing before my face the great increase
Of my desires, whereat I weep and sing,
In joy and woe, as in a doubtful ease:
10 For my sweet thoughts sometime do pleasure bring,
But by and by<sup>o</sup> the cause of my disease<sup>3</sup>
Gives me a pang that inwardly doth sting,
When that I think what grief it is, again,
To live, and lack the thing should rid my pain.

Petrarch, Rima 164

A MODERN PROSE TRANSLATION

Now that the heavens and the earth and the wind are silent, and sleep reins in the beasts and the birds, Night drives her starry car about, and in its bed the sea lies without a wave,

I am awake, I think, I burn, I weep; and she who destroys me is always before me, to my sweet pain: war is my state, full of sorrow and suffering, and only thinking of her do I have any peace.

Thus from one clear living fountain alone spring the sweet and the bitter on which I feed; one hand alone heals me and pierces me.

And that my suffering may not reach an end, a thousand times a day
I die and a thousand am born, so distant am I from health.

So Cruel Prison How Could Betide<sup>1</sup>

So cruel prison how could betide,<sup>2</sup> alas,
As proud Windsor, where I in lust<sup>o</sup> and joy
With a king's son my childish<sup>o</sup> years did pass
In greater feast than Priam's sons of Troy?<sup>3</sup>

5 Where each sweet place returns a taste full sour:
The large green courts, where we were wont to hove,<sup>o</sup>
With eyes cast up unto the Maidens' Tower,
And easy sighs, such as folk draw in love.

10 The stately sales,<sup>o</sup> the ladies bright of hue,
The dances short, long tales of great delight,
With words and looks that tigers could but rue,<sup>4</sup>
Where each of us did plead the other's right.

15 The palm play<sup>o</sup> where, dispoiled<sup>o</sup> for the game,
With dazed eyes oft we by gleams of love
Have missed the ball and got sight of our dame,
To bait<sup>o</sup> her eyes, which kept the leads<sup>5</sup> above.

20 The graveled ground, with sleeves<sup>o</sup> tied on the helm,
On foaming horse, with swords and friendly hearts,
With cheer<sup>o</sup> as though the one should overwhelm,
Where we have fought and chased oft with darts.<sup>o</sup>

With silver drops the meads yet spread<sup>6</sup> for ruth,<sup>o</sup>
In active games of nimbleness and strength,
Where we did strain, trailed by swarms of youth,
Our tender limbs that yet shot up in length.

25 The secret groves which oft we made resound
Of pleasant plaint and of our ladies' praise,
Recording soft what grace<sup>o</sup> each one had found,
What hope of speed,<sup>o</sup> what dread of long delays.

The wild forest, the clothèd holts<sup>o</sup> with green,
With reins availed<sup>o</sup> and swift ybreathèd horse, 30 With cry of hounds and merry blasts<sup>o</sup> between,
Where we did chase the fearful hart a force.<sup>7</sup>

The void<sup>o</sup> walls eke<sup>o</sup> that harbored us each night,
Wherewith, alas, revive within my breast
The sweet accord, such sleeps as yet delight,
35 The pleasant dreams, the quiet bed of rest,

The secret thoughts imparted with such trust,
The wanton<sup>o</sup> talk, the divers change of play,
The friendship sworn, each promise kept so just,
40 Wherewith we passed the winter nights away.

And with this thought, the blood forsakes my face,
The tears berain my cheeks of deadly hue,
The which as soon as sobbing sighs, alas,
Upsuppèd have, thus I my plaint renew:

45 "O place of bliss, renewer of my woes,
Give me accompt,<sup>o</sup> where is my noble fere,<sup>8</sup>
Whom in thy walls thou didst each night enclose,
To other lief,<sup>o</sup> but unto me most dear."

Each stone, alas, that doth my sorrow rue,<sup>o</sup>
Returns thereto a hollow sound of plaint.
50 Thus I alone, where all my freedom grew,
In prison pine with bondage and restraint.

And with remembrance of the greater grief

To banish the less, I find my chief relief.

Wyatt Resteth Here, That Quick Could Never Rest

Wyatt resteth here, that quick<sup>o</sup> could never rest,
Whose heavenly gifts, increased by disdain<sup>1</sup>
And virtue, sank the deeper in his breast:
Such profit he by envy could obtain.

5 A head where wisdom mysteries<sup>o</sup> did frame,
Whose hammers beat still in that lively brain
As on a stith,<sup>o</sup> where that some work of fame
Was daily wrought to turn to Britain's gain.

10 A visage stern and mild, where both did grow
Vice to contemn,<sup>o</sup> in virtue to rejoice;
Amid great storms whom grace assured so
To live upright and smile at fortune's choice.

15 A hand that taught what might be said in rhyme,
That reft<sup>o</sup> Chaucer the glory of his wit<sup>2</sup>—
A mark the which, unperfited<sup>o</sup> for time,
Some may approach, but never none shall hit.

20 A tongue that served in foreign realms his king;
Whose courteous talk to virtue did inflame
Each noble heart: a worthy guide to bring
Our English youth by travail<sup>o</sup> unto fame.

An eye whose judgment none affect<sup>o</sup> could blind,
Friends to allure and foes to reconcile,
Whose piercing look did represent a mind
With virtue fraught, reposèd, void of guile.

25 A heart where dread yet never so impressed
To hide the thought that might the truth advance;
In neither fortune loft nor yet repressed<sup>3</sup>
To swell in wealth<sup>o</sup> or yield unto mischance.

A valiant corpse<sup>4</sup> where force and beauty met,
Happy<sup>o</sup>—alas, too happy, but<sup>o</sup> for foes;
30 Lived and ran the race that Nature set,
Of manhood's shape, where she the mold did lose.<sup>5</sup>

But to the heavens that simple<sup>o</sup> soul is fled,
Which left, with such as covet Christ to know,
35 Witness of faith<sup>6</sup> that never shall be dead,
Sent for our health,<sup>o</sup> but not received so.

Thus for our guilt, this jewel have we lost;
The earth his bones, the heavens possess his ghost.<sup>o</sup>

O Happy Dames, That May Embrace<sup>1</sup>

O happy dames,<sup>o</sup> that may embrace
The fruit of your delight,
Help to bewail the woeful case
And eke<sup>o</sup> the heavy plight
Of me, that wanted<sup>o</sup> to rejoice
5 The fortune of my pleasant choice:
Good ladies, help to fill my mourning voice.

In ship, freight<sup>o</sup> with remembrance
Of thoughts and pleasures past,
He sails that hath in governance
10 My life while it will last;
With scalding sighs, for lack of gale,
Futhering his hope, that is his sail,
Toward me, the sweet port of his avail.<sup>o</sup>

Alas, how oft in dreams I see 15 Those eyes that were my food,
Which sometime so delighted me,
That yet they do me good;
Wherewith I wake with his return,
Whose absent flame did make me burn:
20 But when I find the lack, Lord how I mourn!

When other lovers in arms across<sup>o</sup>
Rejoice their chief delight,
Drowned in tears to mourn my loss
I stand the bitter night
25 In my window, where I may see
Before the winds how the clouds flee.
Lo, what a mariner love hath made me!

30 And in green waves when the salt flood
 Doth rise by rage of wind,
 A thousand fancies in that mood
 Assail my restless mind.
 Alas, now drencheth<sup>o</sup> my sweet foe,<sup>2</sup>
 That with the spoil<sup>o</sup> of my heart did go 35 And left me; but, alas, why did he so?

 And when the seas wax calm again,
 To chase from me annoy,<sup>o</sup>
 My doubtful hope doth cause me plain,<sup>o</sup>
 So dread cuts off my joy.
 40 Thus is my wealth<sup>o</sup> mingled with woe,
 And of each thought a doubt doth grow:
 Now he comes! Will he come? Alas, no, no!

Faith in Conflict

When, in the late 1520s, the Catholic authorities of England tried to burn all copies of William Tyndale's English translation of the New Testament, they were attempting to stop the spread of what they viewed as a dangerous new plague of heresies. The plague was the Protestant Reformation, a movement opposed to crucial aspects of both the belief system and the institutional structure of Roman Catholicism.

The movement had been launched by the German theologian Martin Luther, who in 1517 challenged the authority of the pope and attacked several key doctrines of the Catholic Church. According to Luther, the Church, with its elaborate hierarchical structure centered in Rome, its rich monasteries and convents, and its enormous political influence, had become a hopelessly corrupt conspiracy of cynical priests who manipulated popular superstitions to enrich themselves and amass worldly power. Luther began by vehemently attacking the sale of indulgences—certificates promising the remission of punishments to be suffered in the afterlife by souls sent to “Purgatory” (a place or state where souls could be punished to make amends for their earthly sins before being allowed into heaven). Purgatory, he argued, had no foundation in scripture, which in his view was the only legitimate source of religious truth (sola scriptura). Christians would be saved not by scrupulously following the ritual practices fostered by the Catholic Church—observing fast days, reciting the ancient Latin prayers, endowing chantries to say prayers for the dead, invoking the protection of individual saints, and so on—and not even by the performance of good deeds, but by faith and faith alone (sola fide).

This challenge spread and gathered force, especially in northern Europe, where major Protestant leaders like the French theologian Jean Calvin (who, after his break with Catholicism, established a theocracy in Geneva) transformed religious institutions and elaborated various and sometimes conflicting doctrinal principles. Calvin, whose thought came to be particularly influential in England and Scotland, emphasized the obligation of governments to implement God's will in the world. He advanced too the doctrine of predestination, by which, as he put it, "God adopts some to hope of life and sentences others to eternal death." God's "secret election" of the saved troubled Calvin, but his study of the scriptures had led him to conclude that "only a small number, out of an incalculable multitude, should obtain salvation." Some Christians found this idea horrifying. How, they asked, could a loving creator condemn the great majority of his creatures to an eternity of torment? And was it not possible for humans to avert the severe decree through virtuous actions? But for Calvin predestination was a mystery bound up with faith, confidence, and an active engagement in the fashioning of a Christian community.

The Reformation had a direct and powerful impact on those realms where it gained control. Monasteries were sacked, their possessions seized by princes or sold off to the highest bidder; monks and nuns, expelled from their cloisters, were encouraged to break their vows of chastity and find spouses, as Luther and his wife, a former nun, had done. In the great cathedrals and in hundreds of smaller churches and chapels, the elaborate altarpieces, bejeweled crucifixes, crystal reliquaries holding the bones of saints, venerated statues, and paintings were attacked as "idols." Condemned for their Catholic doctrinal content and accused of violating the biblical prohibition on the making of "graven images," they were often defaced or destroyed. Protestant congregations continued, for the most part, to celebrate the most sacred Christian ritual—the Eucharist, or Lord's Supper—but they did so in a profoundly different spirit from the Catholic Church. For them it was a commemoration (in which the bread and wine symbolized Christ) rather than a miracle (in which the bread and wine turned into Christ), and the service was conducted not in the old liturgical Latin but in the local language.

The Reformation was at first vigorously resisted in England. Protestant writings were seized by officials of the Church and the state and burned. Protestants who made their views known were persecuted—driven to flee the country or arrested, put on trial, and burned at the stake. But the situation changed drastically after Henry VIII decided to seek a divorce from his first wife, Catherine of Aragon, to marry Anne Boleyn. When the Roman Catholic Church, under pressure from Catherine's powerful family, refused to grant the divorce, Henry defied papal authority, declared himself head of the Church in England, seized the wealth of the monasteries, and unleashed Protestant energies, including fierce bursts of iconoclasm in which many religious images in churches were painted over, broken, or otherwise destroyed. On most doctrinal questions, however, Henry remained an orthodox Catholic, and in the latter part of his reign his clerical authorities renewed the persecution of Protestants.

The turn toward the Reformation was more decisive in the reign (1547–53) of Henry's heir, Edward VI; and the attempt by Edward's successor, Mary (daughter of Henry VIII's first wife, the Catholic Catherine of Aragon), to reimpose Roman Catholicism as the national religion came to an end with her death, in 1558. The long reign (1558–1603) of Henry's daughter by Anne Boleyn, Elizabeth I, firmly established Protestantism as the faith of the Church of England. Reformation doctrine shaped the English liturgy eloquently formulated in the officially sanctioned Book of Common Prayer and was reinforced in the series of homilies, or sermons, that ministers were commanded to deliver to their parishioners.

The Reformation did not spread quickly or easily in England. Like Henry VIII himself, most English people in the decades after the break with Rome were far from being full-fledged Protestants. Emotional attachment to the traditional religion ran deep, as did resentment of an aggressively intolerant Protestant officialdom. From the 1530s to the end of the century, a significant number of individuals, including Thomas More and the Jesuit Robert Southwell, were prepared to die for the old faith. Many more, though still a small minority, stubbornly rejected the new orthodoxy, absenting themselves from obligatory Protestant worship; these recusants, as they were known, were subjected to fines and sometimes worse punishments. A much greater number conformed in public but remained largely untouched by Protestant doctrine.

Though Protestantism and Catholicism were exposed, under different regimes, to brutal persecution, both faiths proved impossible to eradicate. In large part this tenacity arose from the passionate, often suicidal heroism of men and women who felt that their soul's salvation depended on the precise character of their Christianity and who consequently embraced martyrdom rather than repudiate their beliefs. It arose too from a mid-fifteenth-century technological innovation that made it extremely difficult to suppress unwelcome ideas: the printing press. Early Protestants quickly grasped that with a few clandestine presses they could defy the Catholic authorities and flood the country with their texts. "How many printing presses there be in the world," wrote the Protestant polemicist and martyrologist John Foxe, "so many blockhouses there be against the high castle" of the pope in Rome, "so that either the pope must abolish knowledge and printing or printing at length will root him out." By the century's end, it was the outlawed Catholics, as well as the more radical Protestant dissenters known as Puritans, who were using the clandestine press to propagate their beliefs in the face of official persecution.

THE ENGLISH BIBLE

Protestant insistence that true belief must be based on the Holy Scriptures alone made the translation and dissemination of the Bible in English and other vernacular languages a matter of utmost urgency. Before the Reformation, the Roman Catholic Church had not always and everywhere opposed vernacular translations of the Bible, but it generally preferred that the populace encounter the scriptures through the interpretations of its priests, trained to read the Latin translation known as the Vulgate. In times of great conflict this preference hardened into outright prohibition of vernacular translation and into persecution and book burning. The late fourteenth-century English translation associated with John Wycliffe was vehemently attacked as heretical, and its suppression led to an edict banning any unauthorized attempt to translate the Bible into English. Throughout the fifteenth century no authorization was granted.

It was in the face of such fierce opposition that zealous Protestants all over Europe set out to put the Bible into the hands of the general populace, rather than the clergy. A remarkable translation of the New Testament by an English follower of Luther named William Tyndale was printed on the Continent and smuggled into England in 1526; Tyndale's translation of the Pentateuch, the first five books of the Hebrew Bible, followed in 1530. Many copies of these translations were seized and destroyed, as was the translator himself, but the printing press made it extremely difficult for authorities to eradicate books for which there was a passionate demand.

Tyndale's translation of the Bible was completed by an associate, Miles Coverdale, whose rendering of the Psalms proved to be particularly influential. Their joint labor was the basis for the Great Bible (1539), a copy of which was ordered to be placed in every church in the kingdom. Four years later, as Henry VIII sought to halt the tide of reform, a law was passed forbidding women, craftsmen, servants, and laborers from reading the Bible either in public or in private. Yet at this stage it was already too late to get the scriptures out of the hands of the populace. Though there would be further opposition in years to come—innumerable Bible translations were printed under Edward VI, only to be burned during the reign of his half-sister Mary—the English Bible was a force that could not be suppressed, and it became, in its various forms, the single most important book of the sixteenth century.

The persecution of Protestants under the Queen Mary was indirectly responsible for what would become the most scholarly Protestant English Bible, known as the Geneva Bible. This translation was prepared, with extensive, learned, and often fiercely polemical marginal notes, by English exiles in Calvin's Geneva and widely diffused in England after Elizabeth came to the throne. In addition, Elizabethan church authorities ordered a careful revision of the Great Bible, and this version, known as the Bishops' Bible, was the one read in the churches. The success of the Geneva Bible in particular finally prompted those Elizabethan Catholics who now in turn found themselves in exile to bring out a vernacular translation of their own, the Douay-Rheims version, to counter the Protestant readings and glosses.

After Elizabeth's death, in 1603, King James I and his bishops ordered that a revised translation of the entire Bible be undertaken by a group of forty-seven scholars. The result, published in 1611, was the Authorized Version, more popularly known as the King James Bible. This translation, whose diction and rhythms have had an immense influence on English literature, continues to be read and treasured.

In the passage selected here, 1 Corinthians 13, Tyndale's use of the word love, echoed by the Geneva Bible, is set against the Catholic charity. The latter term gestures toward the religious doctrine of salvation through actions, against the Protestant insistence on salvation by faith alone. It is a sign of the conservative, moderate Protestantism of the King James Version that it too opts for charity.

1 Corinthians 13

From *Tyndale's Translation

Though I spake with the tongues of men and angels, and yet had no love, I were even as sounding brass: or as a tinkling cymbal. And though I could prophesy, and understood all secrets, and all knowledge: yea, if I had all faith, so that I could move mountains out of their places, and yet had no love, I were nothing. And though I bestowed all my goods to feed the poor, and though I gave my body even that I burned, and yet had no love, it profiteth me nothing.

Love suffereth long, and is courteous. Love envieth not. Love doth not forwardly,<sup>1</sup> swelleth not, dealeth not dishonestly, seeketh not her own, is not provoked to anger, thinketh not evil, rejoiceth not in iniquity: but rejoiceth in the truth, suffereth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth in all things. Though that prophesying fail, other<sup>2</sup> tongues shall cease, or knowledge vanish away, yet love falleth never away.

For our knowledge is unperfect and our prophesying is unperfect. But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is unperfect shall be done away. When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I imagined as a child. But as soon as I was a man, I put away childishness. Now we see in a glass, even in a dark<sup>3</sup> speaking: but then shall we see face to face. Now I know unperfectly: but then shall I know even as I am known. Now abideth faith, hope, and love, even these three: but the chief of these is love.

not the eye, I am not of the body, is it therefore not of the bodie?
17 If the whole bodie were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling?
18 But nowe hath God disposed the members every one of them in the bodie at his owne pleasure.
19 For if they were all one member, where were the bodie?
20 But nowe are there many members, yet but one bodie.
21 And the eye cannot say vnto the hande, I haue no neede of thee: nor the heade againe to the feete, I haue no neede of you.
22 Yea, much rather those members of the bodie, which seeme to be more feeble, are necessarie.
23 And vpon those members of the bodie, which we thinke most vnholiest, put wee more honestie on: and our vncomely partes haue more comelines on.
24 For our comely partes neede it not: but God hath tempered the bodie together, and hath giuen the more honour to that part which lacked,
25 Least there should be any diuision in the bodie: but that the members should haue the same care one for another.
26 Therefore if one member suffer, all suffer with it: if one member bee had in honour, all the members reioyce with it.
27 Nowe ye are the body of Christ, and members of his body.
28 And God hath ordeyned some in the Church: as first Apostles, secondly Prophets, thirdly teachers, then them that do miracles: after that, the giftes of healing, helpers, gouernours, diuersitie of tongues.
29 Are all Apostles? are all Prophets? are al teachers?
30 Are al doers of miracles? haue al the giftes of healing? do al speake with tongues? do all interpret?
31 But desire you the best giftes, and I will yet shew you a more excellent way.

1 Though I speake with the tongues of men and Angels, and haue not loue,
I am as sounding brasse, or a tinckeling cymball.
2 And though I had the gift of prophecy, and knewe all secretes and all knowledge, yea, if I had all fapth, so that I could remoue mountaynes and had not loue, I were nothing.
3 And though I feede the poore with all my goodes, and though I giue my bodie, that I be burned, and haue not loue, it pro-
fiteth me nothing.
4 Loue suffereth long: it is bountifull: loue enuieth not: loue doeth not boast it selfe: it is not puffed vp:
5 It disdaineth not: it seeketh not her owne things: it is not prouoked to anger: it thinketh not euill:

6 It reioyceth not in iniquitie, but reioyceth in the truth:
7 It suffereth all things: it beareth all things:
it hopeth all things: it endureth all things.
8 Loue doeth neuer fall away, though that prophecyngs be abolished, or the tongues cease, or knowledge vanish away.
9 For we knowe in part, and we prophesie in part.
10 But when that which is perfect, is come, then that which is in part, shall be abolished.
11 When I was a childe, I spake as a childe,
I vnderstoode as a childe, I thought as a childe: but when I became a man, I put away childish things.
12 For nowe we see through a glasse darkely: but then shall we see face to face. Nowe
I knowe in part: but then shall I knowe as I am knowne.
13 And nowe abideth fapth, hope and loue, euen these three: but the chiefest of these is loue.

1 Follow after loue, and couet spiritual giftes, & rather that ye may prophetic.
2 For he that speaketh a strange tongue, speaketh not vnto men, but vnto God: for no man heareth him: howbeit in the spirit he speaketh secret things.
3 But hee that propheticeth, speaketh vnto men to edifying, and to exhortation, and to comfort.
4 He that speaketh strange language, edifi-eth him selfe: but he that propheticeth, edi-fiethe the Church.
5 I would that ye all spake strange languages, but rather that ye propheticed: for greater is hee that propheticeth, then hee that speaketh diuers tongues, except he expound it, that the Church may receyue edification.
6 And nowe, brethren, if I come vnto you speaking diuers tongues, what shall I profit you, except I speake to you, either by revelation, or by knowledge, or by pro-phesyng, or by doctrine?
7 Whereouer things without life which giue a sound, whether it be a pipe or an harpe, except they make a distinction in the sounds, howe shall it be knowne what is pypped or harped?
8 And also if the trumpet giue an vncertaine sounde, who shall prepare him selfe to battel?
9 So like wise you, by the tongue, except ye utter wordes that haue signification, howe shall it be vnderstand what is spoken: for ye shall speake in the aire.

WILLIAM TYNDALE

Educated at Oxford, William Tyndale (ca. 1490–1536) became a lecturer at Cambridge, where he was associated with a group of humanist scholars who met regularly at the White Horse Inn. Having become convinced that salvation depended on direct access to the word of God, he sought official support to undertake a translation of the Bible into English; but English church authorities, concerned about the spread of heresies, blocked this project. In 1524 Tyndale went to Germany, where, with the financial assistance of wealthy London merchants, he completed a translation of the New Testament the following year. Deeply influenced by the writings of Martin Luther and other reformers, he also wrote a series of doctrinal and polemical works, such as The Obedience of a Christian Man (1528), that eloquently express the Protestant hope of salvation through faith alone and reject the principles and practices of Roman Catholicism. Because of their bitter assaults on the Catholic Church, Protestants like Tyndale were often accused of fomenting rebellion. The Obedience of a Christian Man attempts to answer the charge by insisting on the subject's absolute secular obligation to obey the king. At Anne Boleyn's urging, Henry VIII read it and is reported to have remarked that "this is a book for me and for all kings to read." Notwithstanding this supposed endorsement, English Catholic authorities during Henry's reign managed to lure Tyndale into a trap and had him strangled and burned in Vilvorde, Flanders.

[THE FORGIVENESS OF SINS]

* * * For sin we through fragility never so oft, yet as soon as we repent and come into the right way again, and unto the testament<sup>1</sup> which God hath made in Christ's blood, our sins vanish away as smoke in the wind, and as darkness at the coming of light; or as thou castest a little blood, or milk, into the main sea: insomuch that whosoever goeth about to make satisfaction for his sins to God-ward,<sup>2</sup> saying in his heart, This much have I sinned, this much will I do again; or this-wise will I live to make amends withal; or this will I do, to get heaven withal; the same is an infidel, faithless, and damned in his deed-doing, and hath lost his part in Christ's blood; because he is disobedient unto God's testament, and setteth up another of his own imagination, unto which he will compel God to obey. If we love God, we have a commandment to love our neighbor also, as saith John in his epistle;<sup>3</sup> and if we have offended him, to make him amends; or if we have not wherewith, to ask him forgiveness, and to do and suffer all things for his sake, to win him to God, and to nourish peace and unity. But to God-ward Christ is an everlasting satisfaction, and ever sufficient.<sup>4</sup>

[SCRIPTURAL INTERPRETATION]

Thou shalt understand, therefore, that the Scripture hath but one sense, which is the literal sense. And that literal sense is the root and ground of all, and the anchor that never faileth, whereunto if thou cleave, thou canst never err or go out of the way. And if thou leave the literal sense, thou canst not but go out of the way.

Neverthelater,<sup>5</sup> the Scripture useth proverbs, similitudes, riddles, or allegories, as all other speeches do; but that which the proverb, similitude, riddle, or allegory signifieth, is ever the literal sense, which thou must seek out diligently: as in the English we borrow words and sentences of one thing, and apply them unto another, and give them new significations. We say, "Let the sea swell and rise as high as he will, yet hath God appointed how far he shall go": meaning that the tyrants shall not do what they would, but that only which God hath appointed them to do. "Look ere thou leap": whose literal sense is, "Do nothing suddenly, or without advisement." "Cut not the bough that thou standest upon": whose literal sense is, "Oppress not the commons"; and is borrowed of hewers. When a thing speedeth<sup>6</sup> not well, we borrow speech, and say, "The bishop hath blessed it"; because that nothing speedeth well that they meddle withal. If the porridge be burned too, or the meat over-roasted, we say, "The bishop hath put his foot in the pot," or "The bishop hath played the cook"; because the bishops burn whom they lust,<sup>7</sup> and whosoever displeaseth them. "He is a pontifical fellow"; that is, proud and stately. "He is popish"; that is, superstitious and faithless.

Beyond all this, when we have found out the literal sense of the Scripture by the process of the text, or by a like text of another place, then go we, and as the Scripture borroweth similitudes of worldly things, even so we again borrow similitudes or allegories of the Scripture, and apply them to our purposes; which allegories are no sense of the Scripture, but free things besides the Scripture, and altogether in the liberty of the Spirit. * * * This allegory proveth nothing, neither can do. For it is not the Scripture, but an ensample<sup>8</sup> or a similitude borrowed of the Scripture, to declare a text or a conclusion of the Scripture more expressly, and to root it and grave<sup>9</sup> it in the heart. For a similitude, or an ensample, doth print a thing much deeper in the wits of a man than doth a plain speaking, and leaveth behind him as it were a sting to prick him forward, and to awake him withal. Moreover, if I could not prove with an open<sup>1</sup> text that which the allegory doth express, then were the allegory a thing to be jested at, and of no greater value than a tale of Robin Hood.

THOMAS MORE

As early as 1521, when he became Henry VIII's "theological councillor," Thomas More had played an important role in the official campaign against Luther. Initially writing doctrinal attacks on Protestantism under the king's name, by 1529, when he became lord chancellor of England, More was immersed in the anti-Protestant campaign in his own right. His extremely energetic contributions included written attacks, in English, on Tyndale's Bible translations and other prohibited books and extended to active persecution of those defined as heretics. A few years earlier, in Utopia, More had imagined a state that would tolerate a diversity of religious convictions, but that view had vanished in the face of actual dissent. "I find that breed of men absolutely loathsome," More wrote to his friend Erasmus; "I want to be as hateful to them as anyone can possibly be." During his tenure as lord chancellor, several Protestants were imprisoned in More's own house while he tried to persuade them to renounce views unacceptable to Roman Catholic orthodoxy, and six people were burned at the stake for heresy. If More was willing to kill in defense of the doctrines in which he passionately believed, he also proved willing in the end to die for his beliefs.

More had two principal quarrels with Lutheranism: (1) he objected to Luther's denial that Christians could contribute to their own salvation through their good works, and (2) he objected to Luther's view of biblical interpretation. For Luther, scripture preceded and ideally determined the form of the Church; for More, the Church preceded and determined the interpretation of scripture.

In A Dialogue Concerning Heresies (1529), More raises both issues. Departing from the head-on, bitter attacks of his Latin works, More here adopts a different approach: one of the speakers in his Dialogue is a young man on friendly terms with More but infatuated with Protestant ideas; the other speaker is a version of More himself. More's aim seems to be less to attack Luther directly than, by using wit, to dissuade English men and women from embracing Protestantism.

The selection printed here tackles the fundamental issues of biblical interpretation. Who decides on the meaning of scripture: the Church or individual readers? More's interlocutor is in no doubt: scripture is for the most part entirely plain; individual readers have no trouble interpreting it. More strongly counters such simple faith in the plain and literal sense. Everything, he argues (in a passage playing with the consonance of "goose" and "gloss"), requires a commentary. Even to compare one text with another is to gloss it, and any translation of the Bible is itself inevitably a gloss. If commentary is always necessary, then some stable ground for establishing authority over that commentary also becomes necessary. For More that ground is the Catholic Church, whose authority is established by the many centuries of its continued existence and by the consensus of the Church's councils. More casts the young Lutheran's position as that of a single opinionated reader perversely resisting the "common faith" of Christendom.

From A Dialogue Concerning Heresies

From Book 1, Chapter 28: * * * proving the authority of the old interpreters and the infallible authority of the Church * ***

*

“* * * in somewhat, ye say, ye will believe the Church, but not in all. In anything beside Scripture ye will not, nor in the interpretation of Scripture ye will not; and so, where ye said that ye believe the Church in somewhat, in very deed ye believe the Church in right nought. For wherein will ye believe it, if ye believe it not in the interpretation of Scripture? For as touching the text, ye believe the Scripture self, and not the Church.”

“Hard it were,” quod I, “to find anything so plain that it should need no gloss at all.”

“In faith,” quod he, “they make a gloss to some texts that be as plain as it is that twice two make four.”

“Why,” quod I, “needeth that no gloss at all?”

“I trow<sup>3</sup> so,” quod he. “Or else the devil is on it.”

“Iwis,”<sup>4</sup> quod I, “and yet though ye would believe one that would tell you that twice two ganders made always four geese, yet ye would be advised<sup>5</sup> ere ye believed him that would tell you that twice two geese made always four ganders. For therein might ye be deceived. And him would ye not believe at all, that would tell you that twice two geese would always make four horse.”

“Tut,” quod he, “this is a merry<sup>6</sup> matter. They must be all the twice twain always of one kind. But geese and horse be of diverse.”

“Well,” quod I, “then every man that is neither goose nor horse seeth that there is one gloss yet.<sup>7</sup> But now,” quod I, “the geese and the ganders be both of one kind, and yet twice two geese make not always four ganders.”

“A sweet matter,” quod he. “Ye wot<sup>8</sup> what I mean well enough.”

"I think I do," quod I. "But I think if ye bring it forth it will make another gloss to your text, as plain as your text is; and<sup>9</sup> ye will in all Holy Scripture have no gloss at all. And yet will ye have collation made of one text with another, and show how they may be agreed together<sup>1</sup>—as though all that were no gloss."

"Yea," quod he, "but would you that we should believe the Church if it set a gloss that will in no wise<sup>2</sup> agree with the text, but that it appeareth plainly that the text, well considered, saith clean the contrary?"

"To whom doth that appear," quod I, "so plainly, when it appeareth one to you, and to the whole Church another?"

"Yet if I see it so," quod he, "though holy doctors and all the whole Church would tell me the contrary, methinketh I were no more bounden to believe them all, that the Scripture meaneth as they take it, than if they would all tell me that a thing were white which I see myself is black."

"Of late," quod I, "ye would believe the Church in something. And now not only ye would believe it in nothing, but also whereas God would the Church should be your judge, ye would now be judge over the Church. And ye will by your wit<sup>3</sup> be judge whether the Church, in the understanding of Holy Scripture that God hath written to His Church, do judge aright or err. As for your white and black, never shall it be that ye shall see the thing black that all other shall see white. But ye may be sure that if all other see it white, and ye take it for black, your eyen<sup>4</sup> be sore deceived. For the Church will not, I think, agree to call it other than it seemeth to them. And much marvel were it, if ye should in Holy Scripture see better than the old holy doctors and Christ's whole Church."

JOHN CALVIN

Born to middle-class parents in Picardy, France, and trained as a lawyer, Calvin (1509–1564) was steeped in the Greek and Latin learning associated with Renaissance humanism. He acquired as well a knowledge of Hebrew, so that he was powerfully equipped to respond to the call, from Erasmus and others, for a study of the Bible in its original languages. Drawn increasingly toward Protestantism, Calvin left Catholic France for Switzerland, where he eventually established a stern theocratic rule in Geneva. Through his many writings, he also became the principal theologian of the Protestant Reformation, exercising immense influence in England and Scotland as well as on the Continent. His major work, revised in successive Latin and French editions and widely translated, is The Institution of Christian Religion. The passage printed here is from Calvin's famous, troubling account of the doctrine of predestination, according to which God has determined before the foundation of the world whom he will save and whom he will damn, regardless of the merits or defects of these individuals. The good deeds that a virtuous person does in life are a sign of having divine "election" (to be saved), not a means to secure salvation. The translation, closely adhering to the Latin original, is by Thomas Norton (1532–1584), a lawyer and member of Parliament and, with Thomas Sackville, the author of the earliest English tragedy in blank verse, Gorboduc—first performed in the same year (1561) that Norton's translation of Calvin appeared.

From* The Institution of Christian Religion, written in Latin by Master John Calvin, and translated into English according to the author's last edition

From *Book 3, Chapter 21 Of the eternal election, whereby God hath predestinate some to salvation, and other some to destruction

But now whereas the covenant of life<sup>1</sup> is not equally preached to all men, and with them to whom it is preached it doth not either equally or continually find like place,<sup>2</sup> in this diversity the wondrous depth of the judgment of God appeareth. For neither is it any doubt but that this diversity also serveth the free choice of God's eternal election.<sup>3</sup> If it be evident that it is wrought by the will of God that salvation is freely offered to some, and other some are debarred from coming to it, here by and by<sup>4</sup> arise great and hard questions which cannot otherwise be discussed than if the godly minds have that certainly stablished which they ought to hold<sup>5</sup> concerning election and predestination. This is (as many think) a cumbersome<sup>6</sup> question: because they think nothing to be less reasonable than of the common multitude of men some to be foreordained to salvation, other some to destruction. But how they wrongfully encumber themselves shall afterward be evident by the framing of the matter together.<sup>7</sup> Beside that in the very same darkness which maketh men afraid, not only the profitableness of this doctrine but also the most sweet fruit sheweth forth itself. We shall never be clearly persuaded, as we ought to be, that our salvation floweth out of the fountain of the free mercy of God, till his eternal election be known to us, which by this comparison brightly setteth forth the grace of God, that he doth not without difference adopt all into the hope of salvation,<sup>8</sup> but giveth to some that which he denieth to other. How much the ignorance of this principle diminisheth of the glory of God, how much it withdraweth from true humility, it is plain to see.

They which shut the gates, that none may be bold to come to the tasting of this doctrine, do no less wrong to men than to God:

because neither shall any other thing suffice to humble us as we ought to be, neither shall we otherwise feel from our heart how much we are bound<sup>9</sup> to God. Neither yet is there any otherwhere the upholding stay of sound affiance,<sup>1</sup> as Christ himself teacheth, which to deliver us from all fear, and to make us unvanquishable among so many dangers, ambushes, and deadly battles, promiseth that whatsoever he hath received of<sup>2</sup> his Father to keep shall be safe.<sup>3</sup> Whereof we gather that they shall with continual trembling be miserable, whosoever they be that know not themselves to be the proper possession of God; and therefore that they do very ill provide both for themselves and for all the faithful, which, in being blind at these three profits which we have touched,<sup>4</sup> would wish the whole foundation of our salvation to be quite taken from among us. Moreover, hereby the Church appeareth unto us, which otherwise (as Bernard rightly teacheth)<sup>5</sup> were not possible to be found nor to be known among creatures, because both ways in marvelous wise<sup>6</sup> it lieth hidden: within the bosom of blessed predestination, and within the mass of miserable damnation.

But ere I enter into the matter itself, I must beforehand in two sorts speak to two sorts of men.<sup>7</sup> That the entreating<sup>8</sup> of predestination, whereas of itself it is somewhat cumbersome, is made very doubtful, yea, and dangerous, the curiousness of men is the cause: which can by no stops be refrained from wandering into forbidden compasses,<sup>9</sup> and climbing up on high; which, if it may, will leave to God no secret which it will not search and turn over. Into this boldness and importunacy<sup>1</sup> forasmuch as we commonly see many to run headlong, and among those some that are otherwise not evil men, here is fit occasion to warn them what is in this behalf<sup>2</sup> the due measure of their duty. First, therefore, let them remember that when they inquire upon predestination, they pierce into the secret closets<sup>3</sup> of the wisdom of God: whereinto if any man too carelessly and boldly break in, he shall both not attain wherewith to satisfy his curiousness, and he shall enter into a maze whereof he shall find no way to get out again. For neither is it meet<sup>4</sup> that man should freely search those things which God hath willed to be hidden in himself, and to turn over from very eternity the height of wisdom,<sup>5</sup> which he willed to be honored and not to be conceived, that by it also he mought<sup>6</sup> be marvelous unto us. Those secrets of his will which he hath determined to be opened unto us, he hath disclosed in his Word: and he hath determined, so far as he foresaw to pertain to us and to be profitable for us.<sup>7</sup>

* * *

There be other which, when they have a will to remedy this evil,<sup>8</sup> do command all mention of predestination to be in a manner buried: at the least they teach men to flee from every manner of questioning thereof as from a rock. Although the moderation of these men be herein worthily to be praised, that they judge that mysteries should be tasted of with such sobriety, yet because they descend too much beneath the mean,<sup>9</sup> they little prevail with the wit of man, which doth not lightly suffer<sup>1</sup> itself to be restrained. Therefore, that in this behalf also we may keep a right end,<sup>2</sup> we must return to the Word of the Lord, in which we have a sure rule of understanding. For the Scripture is the school of the Holy Ghost, in which as nothing is left out which is both necessary and profitable to be known, so nothing is taught but that which is behoveful<sup>3</sup> to learn. Whatsoever therefore is uttered in the Scripture concerning predestination, we must beware that we debar not the faithful from it, lest we should seem either enviously<sup>4</sup> to defraud them of the benefit of their God or to blame and accuse the Holy Ghost, who hath published those things which it is in any wise<sup>5</sup> profitable to be suppressed.

That, therefore, which the Scripture clearly showeth, we say that God by eternal and unchangeable counsel hath once appointed whom in time to come he would take to salvation, and on the other side whom he would condemn to destruction. This counsel as touching the elect,<sup>6</sup> we say to be grounded upon his free mercy, without any respect of<sup>7</sup> the worthiness of man: but whom he appointeth to damnation, to them by his judgment (which is indeed just and irreprehensible but also incomprehensible) the entry of life is foreclosed. Now in the elect we set vocation to be the testimony<sup>8</sup> of election; and then justification<sup>9</sup> to be another sign of the manifest showing of it, till they come to glory, wherein is the fulfilling of it. But as by vocation and election God marketh his elect, so by shutting out the reprobate<sup>1</sup> either from the knowledge of his name or from the sanctification of his spirit, he doth as it were by these marks open what judgment abideth<sup>2</sup> for them. * * *

ANNE ASKEW

In the 1540s, Henry VIII sought to return the English Church to a basically Catholic doctrinal position, and Protestants were subjected to persecution. The outspoken Protestant Anne Askew (1521–1546) was called in for questioning in 1545; the next year, she was tortured on the rack and burned at the stake. Askew's accounts of her two examinations were smuggled out of England by the reformer John Bale, who published them in Germany (1546–47). The texts were later incorporated into John Foxe's Acts and Monuments (1563).

Vivid first-person accounts like Askew's were intended to bear witness to the astonishing courage and determination of a small group of ardent Protestants, men and women alike, who were willing to die for their convictions. (When the political tides shifted, there were comparable Catholic figures who endured similar trials for their faith.) Though obedience to authority was instilled in Tudor England and though women in particular were expected to be submissive, social norms could be upended by religious conviction. By the time of the examinations Askew describes, she had already repeatedly defied her Catholic husband, who denounced her publicly and had her arrested. Even when showed the instruments of torture, she refused to name any of her associates or to take back any of her beliefs.

The theological controversies over the meaning of the bread and wine taken in church, the "Eucharist," for which Askew and her companions along with many other Protestants and Catholics were willing to lay down their lives, require some explanation. Catholic doctrine held that if the formula of consecration of the bread and wine was correctly spoken by a properly ordained priest, a miraculous "transubstantiation"—in which the bread or Host became the body of Christ and the wine his blood—would occur, whether or not the priest or the communicant was in a state of grace. Indeed, some Catholic theologians argued that because the bread had objectively been transformed into the body of God, even a mouse nibbling on a consecrated host would be receiving Christ's flesh. In contrast, Protestants argued that an evil priest would not only be damning himself (as Catholics also believed) but would also be turning the Lord's Supper itself into the Devil's Supper.

From The First Examination of Anne Askew

To satisfy your expectation, good people (sayeth she), this was my first examination in the year of our Lord 1545, and in the month of March. First, Christopher Dare examined me at Saddlers' Hall, being one of the quest,<sup>1</sup> and asked if I did not believe that the sacrament hanging over the altar<sup>2</sup> was the very body of Christ really. Then I demanded<sup>3</sup> this question of him: wherefore Saint Stephen was stoned to death.<sup>4</sup> And he said he could not tell. Then I answered that no more would I assoil<sup>5</sup> his vain question.

Secondly, he said that there was a woman which did testify that I should read<sup>6</sup> how God was not in temples made with hands. Then I showed him the seventh and the seventeenth chapters of the Acts of the Apostles, what Stephen and Paul had said therein.<sup>7</sup> Whereupon he asked me how I took those sentences.<sup>8</sup> I answered that I would not throw pearls among swine,<sup>9</sup> for acorns were good enough.

Thirdly, he asked me wherefore I said that I had rather to read five lines in the Bible than to hear five masses in the temple. I confessed that I said no less. Not for the dispraise of either the Epistle or Gospel, but because the one did greatly edify me and the other<sup>1</sup> nothing at all. As Saint Paul doth witness in the fourteenth chapter of his first Epistle to the Corinthians, whereas he doth say: "If the trumpet giveth an uncertain sound, who will prepare himself to the battle?"

Fourthly, he laid unto my charge that I should say: "If an ill<sup>2</sup> priest ministered, it was the Devil and not God." My answer was that I never spake such thing. But this was my saying: "That whatsoever he were which ministered unto me, his ill conditions could not hurt my faith, but in spirit I received nevertheless the body and blood of Christ." He asked me what I said concerning confession. I answered him my meaning, which was as Saint James sayeth, that every man ought to knowledge<sup>3</sup> his faults to other, and the one to pray for the other.

Sixthly, he asked me what I said to the king's book.<sup>4</sup> And I answered him that I could say nothing to it, because I never saw it.

Seventhly, he asked me if I had the spirit of God in me. I answered if I had not, I was but reprobate or cast away. Then he said he had sent for a priest to examine me, which was there at hand. The priest asked me what I said to the sacrament of the altar.<sup>5</sup> And required much to know therein my meaning. But I desired him again to hold me excused concerning that matter. None other answer would I make him, because I perceived him a papist.<sup>6</sup>

Eighthly, he asked me if I did not think that private masses did help souls departed.<sup>7</sup> And [I] said it was great idolatry to believe more in them than in the death which Christ died for us. Then they had me thence unto my lord mayor and he examined me, as they had before, and I answered him directly in all things as I answered the quest afore. Besides this, my lord mayor laid one thing unto my charge which was never spoken of<sup>8</sup> me but of them. And that was whether a mouse eating the host received God or no. This question did I never ask, but indeed they asked it of me, whereunto I made them no answer, but smiled. Then the bishop's chancellor rebuked me and said that I was much to blame for uttering the Scriptures. For Saint Paul (he said) forbade women to speak or to talk of the word of God. I answered him that I knew Paul's meaning as well as he, which is, 1 Corinthians 14, that a woman ought not to speak in the congregation by the way of teaching. And then I asked him how many women he had seen go into the pulpit and preach? He said he never saw none. Then I said he ought to find no fault in poor women, except<sup>9</sup> they had offended the law. Then my lord mayor commanded me to ward.<sup>1</sup> I asked him if sureties<sup>2</sup> would not serve me, and he made me short answer, that he would take none.

Then was I had to the Counter,<sup>3</sup> and there remained eleven days, no friend admitted to speak with me. But in the meantime there was a priest sent to me which said that he was commanded of the bishop to examine me and to give me good counsel, which he did not. But first he asked me for what cause I was put in the Counter. And I told him I could not tell. Then he said it was great pity that I should be there without cause, and concluded that he was very sorry for me.

Secondly, he said it was told him that I should deny the sacrament of the altar. And I answered him again that, that<sup>4</sup> I had said, I had said. Thirdly, he asked me if I were shriven.<sup>5</sup> I told him, so that I might have one of these three, that is to say, Doctor Crome, Sir William, or Huntingdon,<sup>6</sup> I was contented, because I knew them to be men of wisdom. "As for you or any other I will not dispraise, because I know ye not."

Then he said, "I would not have you think but that I or another that shall be brought you shall be as honest as they. For if we were not, ye may be sure, the king would not suffer us to preach."

Then I answered by the saying of Solomon, "By communing with the wise, I may learn wisdom: But by talking with a fool, I shall take scathe"<sup>7</sup> (Proverbs 1).

Fourthly, he asked me, if the host should fall and a beast did eat it, whether the beast did receive God or no. I answered, "Seeing ye have taken the pains to ask this question, I desire you also to assoil<sup>8</sup> it yourself. For I will not do it, because I perceive ye come to tempt me." And he said it was against the order of schools that he which asked the question should answer it. I told him I was but a woman and knew not the course of schools.<sup>9</sup> Fifthly, he asked me if I intended to receive the sacrament at Easter or no. I answered that else I were no Christian woman, and that I did rejoyce that the time was so near at hand. And then he departed thence with many fair words.

* * *

In the meanwhile he commanded his archdeacon to common<sup>1</sup> with me, who said unto me, "Mistress, wherefore are ye accused and thus troubled here before the bishop?"

To whom I answered again and said, "Sir, ask, I pray you, my accusers, for I know not as yet."

Then took he my book out of my hand and said, "Such books as this hath brought you to the trouble you are in. Beware," sayeth he, "beware, for he that made this book and was the author thereof was an heretic, I warrant you, and burnt in Smithfield."<sup>2</sup>

Then I asked him if he were certain and sure that it was true that<sup>3</sup> he had spoken. And he said he knew well the book was of John Frith's making.<sup>4</sup> Then I asked him if he were not ashamed for to judge of the book before he saw it within, or yet knew the truth thereof. I said also that such unadvised and hasty judgment is token apparent of a very slender wit.<sup>5</sup> Then I opened the book and showed it to him. He said he thought it had been another, for he could find no fault therein. Then I desired him no more to be so unadvisedly rash and swift in judgment, till he thoroughly knew the truth; and so he departed from me. * * *

JOHN FOXE

When the Catholic Mary Tudor became queen, in 1553, and began to persecute Protestants, John Foxe (1516–1587), who had been a fellow at Oxford University and had served as a tutor to the children of noble families, fled to the Continent. The book for which he became famous was already under way: the first version (Strasbourg, 1554) was in Latin and dealt with the persecutions suffered by the early reformers, particularly John Wycliffe and John Hus. But his book grew and grew as Foxe received from England and Scotland accounts of the persecutions, including hideous tortures, being inflicted on the Protestants there. When Elizabeth came to the throne, in 1558, Foxe returned at once to England, and there he translated his Latin volume, adding to it hundreds of stories of those martyred under Queen Mary (many based on eyewitness testimony, some on hearsay and rumor). The English edition was first published in 1563; often called "Foxe's Book of Martyrs," the work was titled Acts and Monuments of these latter and perilous days, touching matters of the church, wherein are comprehended and described the great persecution and horrible troubles that have been wrought and practiced by the Romish prelates from the year of Our Lord a thousand to the time now present.

The Burning of Thomas Cranmer, from Foxe's Acts and Monuments. Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, was arrested, tried for treason, and burned at the stake in front of Balliol College, Oxford, on March 21, 1556. Here he stretches his right hand into the fire, since that hand had been responsible for writing (or at least signing) a recantation of his Protestant faith, an apostasy that he repudiated just before his execution. The image also shows Cranmer crying out, "Lord, receive my spirit," traditionally said to be part of the dying words of the first Christian martyr, Saint Stephen.

Foxe saw life as an apocalyptic struggle between good and evil, Christ and Antichrist. Immediately and enormously popular, his book is a compendium of memoirs, stories, personal letters, court records, and the like, rendering the words, acts, and sufferings of some hundreds of martyrs in graphic—if often fictionalized—detail. The final version of the book (1583) is massive—more than six thousand folio pages, containing four million words. Though vehemently criticized by Catholics for its distortions and errors, it helped shape for generations of men and women across the broad social spectrum a sense of collective identity and destiny. Apart from fanning the flames of anti-Catholic feeling, Foxe had an immense influence on English nationalism. His stories—from the medieval crypto-Protestants burned for heresy to the Protestant martyrs who passed through the fiery trials of the Marian persecutions—portrayed England as the land of a new chosen people, destined to lead the way toward the kingdom of God on earth. Foxe's second edition (1570) was placed, by government order, in churches throughout England.

[THE DEATH OF ANNE ASKEW]

Hitherto we have entreated of<sup>1</sup> this good woman; now it remaineth that we touch somewhat as touching her end and martyrdom. She being born of such stock and kindred that she might have lived in great wealth and prosperity, if she would rather have followed the world than Christ, but now she was so tormented, that she could neither live long in so great distress, neither yet by the adversaries be suffered<sup>2</sup> to die in secret. Wherefore the day of her execution was appointed, and she brought into Smithfield<sup>3</sup> in a chair, because she could not go on her feet, by means<sup>4</sup> of her great torments. When she was brought unto the stake she was tied by the middle with a chain that held up her body. When all things were thus prepared to the fire, the king's letters of pardon were brought, whereby to offer her safeguard of her life if she would recant, which she would neither receive neither<sup>5</sup> yet vouchsafe once to look upon. Shaxton<sup>6</sup> also was there present, who, openly that day recanting his opinions, went about with a long oration to cause her also to turn, against whom she stoutly resisted. Thus she being troubled so many manner of ways, and having passed through so many torments, having now ended the long course of her agonies, being compassed in with flames of fire, as a blessed sacrifice unto God, she slept in the Lord, in anno<sup>7</sup> 1546, leaving behind her a singular example of Christian constancy for all men to follow.

ANNE COOKE BACON

It was while he was a student at Oxford University that John Jewel (1522–1571) became devoted to the Protestant cause. But when, later, he advanced to the position of public orator of Oxford, he had to compose a Latin epistle in honor of the Catholic Mary I, who had just ascended to the throne. Because he retained his allegiance to Protestantism, for his own safety he fled to Frankfurt, returning to England only after the Protestant Elizabeth I was crowned.

An Apology is a book Jewel wrote, as bishop of Salisbury, against Catholicism and in defense of the establishment of the English Protestant Church. The section provided here, from the end of the book, maintains that English Protestant Reformers are simply bringing back the values of a historic “old” church, in the face of a viciously corrupt Catholicism. In 1609 Archbishop Richard Bancroft ordered that Jewel’s Apology be placed in all churches in the land.

Anne Cooke Bacon (ca. 1527–1610), one of the five daughters of Sir Anthony Cooke, was said to be the most learned women in England. Married to Nicholas Bacon, privy councillor and lord keeper of the great seal under Queen Elizabeth, Bacon had two children; her younger son was the philosopher Francis Bacon. Bacon knew Jewel and shared his Protestant beliefs. She translated his Latin work as An Apology or Answer in Defence of the Church of England in 1564, rendering his Latin text into spare, accessible, and punchy prose.

From John Jewel's An Apology or Answer in Defence of the Church of England

We have said that we abandon and detest, as plagues and poisons, all those old heresies which either the sacred scriptures, or the ancient councils, have utterly condemned. That we call home again, as much as ever we can, the right<sup>1</sup> discipline of the Church, which our adversaries have quite brought into a poor and weak case.<sup>2</sup> That we punish all licentiousness of life, and unruliness of manners, by the old and long-continued laws, and with as much sharpness<sup>3</sup> as is convenient, and lieth in our power. That we maintain still the state of kingdoms in the same condition and plight wherein we have found them, without any diminishing or alteration, reserving unto our princes their majesties and worldly pre-eminence, safe and without impairing, to our possible power. That we have so gotten ourselves away from that Church—which they had made a den of thieves,<sup>4</sup> and wherein nothing was in good frame,<sup>5</sup> or once like to the Church of God, and which, themselves confessed, had erred many ways, even as Lot in times past gat him<sup>6</sup> out of Sodom, or Abraham out of Chaldea—not upon a desire of contention, but by the warning of God Himself.<sup>7</sup> And that we have searched out of<sup>8</sup> the Holy Bible, which we are sure cannot deceive, one sure form of religion, and have returned again unto the primitive Church of the ancient fathers and Apostles—that is to say, to the first ground<sup>9</sup> and beginning of things, as unto the very foundations and headsprings of Christ's Church. And in very truth we have not tarried<sup>1</sup>—for, in this matter, the authority or consent of the Tridentine council,<sup>2</sup> wherein we saw nothing done uprightly, nor by good order; where also everybody was sworn to the maintenance of one man;<sup>3</sup> where our prince's ambassadors were contemned;<sup>4</sup> where not one of our divines could be heard, and where parts-taking and ambition was openly and earnestly procured and wrought—but, as the holy fathers in former time, and as our predecessors have commonly done, we have restored our churches by a provincial convocation,<sup>5</sup> and have clean shaken off, as our duty was, the yoke and tyranny of the bishop of Rome,<sup>6</sup> to whom we were not bound; who also had no manner of thing like, neither to Christ, nor to Peter,<sup>7</sup> nor to an Apostle, nor yet like to any bishop at all. Finally, we say, that we agree amongst ourselves touching<sup>8</sup> the whole judgment and chief substance of Christian religion, and with one mouth, and with one spirit, do worship God, and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER

The Protestant attack on Catholic rituals and the demand for worship in the vernacular led during the reign of Edward VI to the preparation of an English liturgical book, authorized to be the official and only text for public worship in England. The work was initiated by the Act of Uniformity in 1549, and its principal architect was Thomas Cranmer (1489–1556). Cranmer, the archbishop of Canterbury, was at first careful to translate and shape the old Latin liturgy into a moderate, occasionally ambiguous compromise between Catholic and Protestant positions. His thorough revision in 1552, however, put the Book of Common Prayer much more decisively into the Protestant camp. Banned by the Catholic Mary Tudor, during whose reign Cranmer was executed, the Book of Common Prayer was restored, with small revisions, by Elizabeth and has remained the basis of Anglican worship ever since. Cranmer was, among his other accomplishments, a brilliant prose stylist, and the cadences of his book have had a profound influence on the English language. The selection, part of the marriage service, is from the version used during the reign of Elizabeth.

From The Form of Solemnization of Matrimony

* * * At the day appointed for solemnization of matrimony, the persons to be married shall come into the body of the church with their friends and neighbors. And there the priest shall thus say:

Dearly beloved friends, we are gathered together here in the sight of God, and in the face of his congregation, to join together this man and this woman in holy matrimony, which is an honorable estate,<sup>1</sup> instituted of God in paradise, in the time of man's innocency, signifying unto us the mystical union that is betwixt Christ and his church:<sup>2</sup> which holy estate Christ adorned and beautified with his presence and first miracle that he wrought in Cana of Galilee,<sup>3</sup> and is commended of Saint Paul to be honorable among all men,<sup>4</sup> and therefore is not to be enterprised<sup>5</sup> nor taken in hand unadvisedly, lightly, or wantonly, to satisfy men's carnal lusts and appetites, like brute beasts that have no understanding; but reverently, discreetly, advisedly, soberly, and in the fear of God, duly considering the causes for the which matrimony was ordained. One was, the procreation of children, to be brought up in the fear and nurture of the Lord, and praise of God. Secondly, it was ordained for a remedy against sin, and to avoid fornication, that such persons as have not the gift of continency might marry, and keep themselves undefiled members of Christ's body.<sup>6</sup> Thirdly, for the mutual society, help, and comfort that the one ought to have of the other, both in prosperity and adversity: into the which holy estate these two persons present come now to be joined. Therefore if any man can show any just cause why they may not lawfully be joined together, let him now speak, or else hereafter forever hold his peace.

And also speaking to the persons that shall be married, he shall say:

I require and charge you (as you will answer at the dreadful day of judgment, when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed) that if either of you do know any impediment why ye may not be lawfully joined together in matrimony, that ye confess it. For be ye well assured, that so many as be coupled together otherwise than God's word doth allow are not joined together by God, neither is their matrimony lawful.

At which day of marriage, if any man do allege and declare any impediment why they may not be coupled together in matrimony by God's law or the laws of this realm; and will be bound, and sufficient sureties with him, to the parties, or else put in a caution,<sup>7</sup> to the full value of such charges as the persons to be married doth sustain, to prove his allegation: then the solemnization must be deferred unto such time as the truth be tried. If no impediment be alleged, then shall the curate<sup>8</sup> say unto the man,

N.<sup>9</sup> Wilt thou have this woman to thy wedded wife, to live together after God's ordinance in the holy estate of matrimony? Wilt thou love her, comfort her, honor and keep her, in sickness and in health? And forsaking all other, keep thee only to her, so long as you both shall live?

The man shall answer,
I will.

Then shall the priest say to the woman,

N. Wilt thou have this man to thy wedded husband, to live together after God's ordinance in the holy estate of matrimony? Wilt thou obey him and serve him, love, honor, and keep him, in sickness and in health, and forsaking all other, keep thee only unto him, so long as you both shall live?

The woman shall answer,
I will.
Then shall the minister say,

Who giveth this woman to be married unto this man?

And the minister receiving the woman at her father or friend's hands, shall cause the man to take the woman by the right hand, and so either to give their troth<sup>1</sup> to other. The man first saying:

I N. take thee N. to my wedded wife, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish, till death us depart,<sup>2</sup> according to God's holy ordinance: and thereto I plight thee my troth.

Then shall they loose their hands, and the woman taking again the man by the right hand shall say:

I N. take thee N. to my wedded husband, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love, cherish, and to obey, till death us depart, according to God's holy ordinance: and thereto I give thee my troth.

Then shall they again loose their hands, and the man shall give unto the woman a ring, laying the same upon the book with the accustomed duty<sup>3</sup> to the priest and clerk. And the priest taking the ring, shall deliver it unto the man, to put it upon the fourth finger of the woman's left hand. And the man taught by the priest shall say:

With this ring I thee wed: with my body I thee worship: and with all my worldly goods I thee endow. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

Then the man leaving the ring upon the fourth finger of the woman's left hand, the minister shall say:

O eternal God, creator and preserver of all mankind, giver of all spiritual grace, the author of everlasting life: send thy blessing upon these thy servants, this man and this woman, whom we bless in thy name; that as Isaac and Rebecca lived faithfully together,<sup>4</sup> so these persons may surely perform and keep the vow and covenant betwixt them made, whereof this ring given and received is a token and pledge, and may ever remain in perfect love and peace together, and live according unto thy laws: through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Then shall the priest join their right hands together, and say:

Those whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.<sup>5</sup>

Then shall the minister speak unto the people:

Forasmuch as N. and N. have consented together in holy wedlock, and have witnessed the same before God and this company, and thereto have given and pledged their troth, either to other, and have declared the same by giving and receiving of a ring, and by joining of hands: I pronounce that they be man and wife together. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

And the minister shall add this blessing:

God the Father, God the Son, God the Holy Ghost, bless, preserve, and keep you: the Lord mercifully with his favor look upon you, and so fill you with all spiritual benediction and grace that you may so live together in this life that in the world to come you may have life everlasting. Amen.

BOOK OF HOMILIES

The first Protestant archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Cranmer, was responsible in 1547 for the publication of the Book of Homilies. Hoping to curb the influence of "ignorant preachers" and fearing the spread of unauthorized beliefs, Cranmer brought together twelve sermons that were, by royal and ecclesiastical decree, to be read over and over, in the order in which they were set forth, in parish churches throughout the realm. The Homilies, revised and reissued during the reign of Elizabeth, are political as well as religious documents. As the "Homily Against Disobedience" (added in 1570 in the aftermath of a Catholic uprising the preceding year) amply demonstrates, the intention was to teach the English people "to honor God and to serve their king with all humility and subjection, and godly and honestly to behave themselves toward all men." Artfully crafted and tirelessly reiterated, these sermons would have been familiar to almost everyone in the latter half of the sixteenth century.

From An Homily Against Disobedience and Willful Rebellion

* * * How horrible a sin against God and man rebellion is cannot possibly be expressed according unto the greatness thereof. For he that nameth rebellion nameth not a singular, or one only sin, as is theft, robbery, murder, and suchlike, but he nameth the whole puddle and sink<sup>1</sup> of all sins against God and man, against his prince, his country, his countrymen, his parents, his children, his kinfolds, his friends, and against all men universally: all sins, I say, against God and all men heaped together nameth he that nameth rebellion. For concerning the offense of God's majesty, who seeth not that rebellion riseth first by contempt of God and of his holy ordinances and laws, wherein he so straitly<sup>2</sup> commandeth obedience, forbiddeth disobedience and rebellion?<sup>3</sup> And besides the dishonor done by rebels unto God's holy name by their breaking of the oath made to their prince with the attestation of God's name and calling of his majesty to witness, who heareth not the horrible oaths and blasphemies of God's holy name that are used daily amongst rebels, that is either amongst them or heareth the truth of their behavior? Who knoweth not that rebels do not only themselves leave all works necessary to be done upon workdays undone, whiles they accomplish their abominable work of rebellion, and do compel others that would gladly be well occupied to do the same, but also how rebels do not only leave the sabbath day of the Lord unsanctified, the temple and church of the Lord unresorted unto, but also do by their works of wickedness most horribly profane and pollute the sabbath day, serving Satan, and by doing of his work making it the devil's day instead of the Lord's day? Besides that they compel good men that would gladly serve the Lord assembling in his temple and church upon his day, as becometh the Lord's servants, to assemble and meet armed in the field to resist the fury<sup>4</sup> of such rebels. Yea, and many rebels, lest they should leave any part of God's commandments in the first table of his law<sup>5</sup> unbroken or any sin against God undone, do make rebellion for the maintenance of their images and idols, and of their idolatry committed or to be committed by them, and, in despite of God, cut and tear in sunder his Holy Word, and tread it under their feet, as of late ye know was done.<sup>6</sup>

As concerning the second table of God's law, and all sins that may be committed against man, who seeth not that they be all contained in rebellion? For first, the rebels do not only dishonor their prince, the parent of their country, but also do dishonor and shame their natural parents, if they have any, do shame their kindred and friends, disherit<sup>7</sup> and undo forever their children and heirs. Thefts, robberies, and murders, which of all sins are most loathed of most men, are in no men so much, nor so perniciously and mischievously, as in rebels. For the most arrant thieves and cruelest murderers that ever were, so long as they refrain from rebellion, as they are not many in number, so spreadeth their wickedness and damnation unto a few: they spoil<sup>8</sup> but a few, they shed the blood but of few in comparison. But rebels are the cause of infinite robberies and murders of great multitudes, and of those also whom they should defend from the spoil and violence of other; and, as rebels are many in number, so doth their wickedness and damnation spread itself unto many. And if whoredom and adultery amongst such persons as are agreeable to such wickedness are (as they indeed be) most damnable, what are the forcible oppressions<sup>9</sup> of matrons and men's wives, and the violating and deflowering of virgins and maids, which are most rife with rebels; how horrible and damnable, think you, are they? Now, besides that rebels, by breach of their faith given and oath made to their prince, be guilty of most damnable perjury, it is wondrous to see what false colors and feigned causes, by slanderous lies made upon their prince and the counselors, rebels will devise to cloak their rebellion withal, which is the worst and most damnable of all false-witness-bearing that may be possible. For what should I speak of coveting or desiring of other men's wives, houses, lands, goods, and servants in rebels, who by their wills would leave unto no man anything of his own?

Thus you see that all God's laws are by rebels violated and broken, and that all sins possible to be committed against God or man be contained in rebellion: which sins, if a man list<sup>1</sup> to name by the accustomed names of the seven capital or deadly sins, as pride, envy, wrath, covetousness, sloth, gluttony, and lechery, he shall find them all in rebellion, and amongst rebels. For first, as ambition and desire to be aloft, which is the property of pride, stirreth up many men's minds to rebellion, so cometh it of a luciferian pride and presumption that a few rebellious subjects should set themselves up against the majesty of their prince, against the wisdom of the counselors, against the power and force of all nobility, and the faithful subjects and people of the whole realm. As for envy, wrath, murder, and desire of blood, and covetousness of other men's goods, lands, and livings, they are the inseparable accidents of all rebels, and peculiar properties<sup>2</sup> that do usually stir up wicked men unto rebellion. Now such as by riotousness, gluttony, drunkenness, excess of apparel, and unthrifty<sup>3</sup> games have wasted their own goods unthriftily, the same are most apt unto and most desirous of rebellion, whereby they trust to come by other men's goods unlawfully and violently. And where other gluttons and drunkards take too much of such meats and drinks as are served to tables, rebels waste and consume in short space all corn in barns, fields, or elsewhere, whole graners,<sup>4</sup> whole storehouses, whole cellars, devour whole flocks of sheep, whole droves of oxen and kine.<sup>5</sup> And as rebels that are married, leaving their own wives at home, do most ungraciously, so much more do unmarried men than any stallions or horses, being now by rebellion set at liberty from correction of laws which bridled them before, which abuse by force other men's wives and daughters, and ravish virgins and maidens most shamefully, abominably, and damnably. Thus all sins, by all names that sins may be named, and by all means that all sins may be committed and wrought, do all wholly upon heaps follow rebellion, and are to be found all together amongst rebels.

ANNE VAUGHAN LOCKE

Born to parents who served in the court of Henry VIII, Anne Vaughan Locke (ca. 1530–ca. 1590) received a privileged education in languages and became deeply involved in the Protestant Reformation, living among English exiles in Calvinist Geneva during the reign of Mary I and later exerting her influence in England, in part by translating religious works and writing her own. Her verse paraphrase of Psalm 51 is arguably the first English sonnet sequence as well as an early example of the Protestant devotional lyric that led to the religious poetry of John Donne and George Herbert.

From A Meditation of a Penitent Sinner

Sonnet 4

Have mercy, Lord, have mercy: for I know
How much I need thy mercy in this case.
The horror of my guilt doth daily grow,
And, growing, wears<sup>1</sup> my feeble hope of grace.
5 I feel and suffer in my thrallèd<sup>2</sup> breast
Secret remorse and gnawing of my heart.
I feel my sin, my sin that hath oppressed
My soul with sorrow and surmounting smart.<sup>3</sup>
Draw me to mercy: for so oft as I
Presume to mercy to direct my sight,
10 My Chaos<sup>4</sup> and my heap of sin doth lie
Between me and thy mercy's shining light.
Whatever way I gaze about for grace,
My filth and fault are ever in my face.<sup>o</sup>

RICHARD HOOKER

Out of the long and bitter controversy over the government of the church in sixteenth-century England emerged one literary masterpiece. It is a work in eight books called Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity (that is, the governmental system of the church). The author was the Oxford-educated Richard Hooker (1554–1600), a scholar and minister. In 1585 Hooker was master of the Temple, a royal church in London; one of his subordinates was a Puritan intellectual named Walter Travers (1548–1635). Between them a contentious debate developed on the question of how the Church should be governed. The Puritan view was that no organization or authority in the church was valid unless it was based clearly and specifically on the Bible; the whole hierarchical system of the English Church, with its deacons, priests, bishops, and archbishops, was accordingly wrong, along with its liturgy and most of its rituals. The position Hooker undertook to defend was that the scriptures, or divine revelation, are not the only guide given to Christians for organizing and administering the Church. Another guide is the law of nature, also divinely given, but able to be discerned by the use of human reason unassisted by revelation.

In the book that grew out of his controversy with Travers, Hooker explained how the law of nature affords principles that justify the existing organization and practices of the English Church. Book 1 of Ecclesiastical Polity deals with law in general and the several kinds of law; it pictures the entire universe, and also human society, as founded on reason and operating under various natural and divine laws. Book 2 deals with the nature, authority, and adequacy of scripture. Books 3 to 5 explain and defend the rites, ceremonies, worship, and government of the English Church. Books 6, 7, and 8 deal with various embodiments of authority, legitimate and illegitimate—elders, bishops, kings, and popes.

Hooker was a close and effective reasoner; avoiding the fiery invective or impassioned rhetoric that characterized most disputants of his time, he wrote in a calm, reasonable, and judicious manner. His defense of existing ecclesiastical practices went back to fundamental principles, to a philosophy of nature and our place in it, to the subordination of the individual to a larger community and to God. It is this worldview, set forth in what is perhaps the period's most sonorous and quietly elegant prose, that makes Ecclesiastical Polity of enduring interest.

[ON THE SEVERAL KINDS OF LAW, AND ON THE NATURAL LAW]

I am not ignorant that by law eternal the learned for the most part do understand the order, not which God hath eternally purposed himself in all his works to observe, but rather that which with himself he hath set down as expedient to be kept by all his creatures, according to the several<sup>1</sup> conditions wherewith he hath indued them. They who thus are accustomed to speak apply the name of Law unto that only rule of working which superior authority imposeth; whereas we, somewhat more enlarging the sense thereof, term any kind of rule or canon whereby actions are framed<sup>2</sup> a law. Now that law, which as it is laid up in the bosom of God they call eternal, receiveth according unto the different kinds of things which are subject unto it different and sundry kinds of names. That part of it which ordereth natural agents,<sup>3</sup> we call usually nature's law; that which angels do clearly behold, and without any swerving observe, is a law celestial and heavenly; the law of reason that which bindeth creatures reasonable in this world, and with which by reason they may most plainly perceive themselves bound; that which bindeth them, and is not known but by special revelation from God, divine law; human law, that which, out of the law either of reason or of God, men probably<sup>4</sup> gathering to be expedient, they make it a law. All things, therefore, which are as they ought to be, are conformed unto this second law eternal, and even those things which to this eternal law are not conformable are notwithstanding in some sort ordered by the first eternal law. For what good or evil is there under the sun, what action correspondent to or repugnant unto the law which God hath imposed upon his creatures, but in or upon it God doth work according to the law which himself hath eternally purposed to keep, that is to say, the first law eternal? So that a twofold law eternal being thus made, it is not hard to conceive how they both take place in all things. Wherefore to come to the law of nature, albeit thereby we sometimes mean that manner of working which God hath set for each created thing to keep, yet forasmuch as those things are termed most properly natural agents, which keep the law of their kind<sup>5</sup> unwittingly, as the heavens and elements of the world, which can do no otherwise than they do, and forasmuch as we give unto intellectual natures the name of voluntary agents, that so we may distinguish them from the other, expedient it will be that we sever<sup>6</sup> the law of nature observed by the one from that which the other is tied unto. Touching the former, their strict keeping of one tenure statute<sup>7</sup> and law is spoken of by all, but hath in it more than men have as yet attained to know, or perhaps ever shall attain, seeing the travail of wading herein is given of God to the sons of men, that perceiving how much the least thing in the world hath in it more than the wisest are able to reach unto, they may by this means learn humility. Moses in describing the work of creation attributeth speech unto God: "God said, Let there be light, Let there be a firmament; Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together into one place; Let the earth bring forth; Let there be lights in the firmament of heaven."<sup>8</sup> Was this only the intent of Moses, to signify the greatness of God's power by the easiness of his accomplishing such effects without travail, pain, or labor? Surely it seemeth that Moses had herein besides this a further purpose: namely, first to teach that God did not work as a necessary, but a voluntary, agent, intending beforehand and decreeing with himself that which did outwardly proceed from him; secondly, to show that God did then institute a law natural to be observed by creatures, and therefore according to the manner of laws, the institution thereof is described as being established by solemn injunction. His commanding those things to be which are, and to be in such sort as they are, to keep that tenure and course which they do, importeth<sup>9</sup> the establishment of nature's law. This world's first creation, and the preservation since of things created, what is it but only so far forth a manifestation by execution, what the eternal law of God is concerning things natural? And as it cometh to pass in a kingdom rightly ordered, that after a law is once published, it presently<sup>1</sup> takes effect far and wide, all states<sup>2</sup> framing themselves thereunto; even so let us think it fareth<sup>3</sup> in the natural course of the world: since the time that God did first proclaim the edicts of his law upon it, heaven and earth have hearkened unto his voice, and their labor hath been to do his will. He made a law for the rain. He gave his decree unto the sea, that the waters should not pass his commandment.<sup>4</sup>

Now if Nature should intermit<sup>5</sup> her course and leave altogether, though it were but for a while, the observation of her own laws; if those principal and mother elements of the world, whereof all things in this lower world are made, should lose the qualities which now they have; if the frame of that heavenly arch erected over our heads should loosen and dissolve itself; if celestial spheres should forget their wonted<sup>6</sup> motions and by irregular volubility<sup>7</sup> turn themselves any way as it might happen; if the prince of the lights of heaven, which now as a giant doth run his unwearied course, should as it were through a languishing faintness begin to stand<sup>8</sup> and to rest himself; if the moon should wander from her beaten way, the times and seasons of the year blend themselves by disordered and confused mixture, the winds breathe out their last gasp, the clouds yield no rain, the earth be defeated<sup>9</sup> of heavenly influence, the fruits of the earth pine away as children at the withered breasts of their mother no longer able to yield them relief, what would become of man himself, whom these things now do all serve? See we not plainly that obedience of creatures unto the law of nature is the stay<sup>1</sup> of the whole world? Notwithstanding with nature it cometh sometimes to pass as with art. Let Phidias<sup>2</sup> have rude<sup>3</sup> and obstinate stuff to carve, though his art do that<sup>4</sup> it should, his work will lack that beauty which otherwise in fitter matter it might have had. He that striketh an instrument with skill may cause notwithstanding a very unpleasant sound, if the string whereon he striketh chance to be incapable of harmony. In the matter whereof natural things consist, that of Theophrastus taketh place:<sup>5</sup> "much of it is oftentimes such as will by no means yield to receive that impression which were best and most perfect." Which defect in the matter of things natural, they who gave themselves unto the contemplation of nature among the heathen observed often; but the true original cause thereof divine malediction,<sup>6</sup> laid for the sin of man upon those creatures which God had made for the use of man. This, being an article of that saving truth which God hath revealed unto his church, was above the reach of their<sup>7</sup> merely natural<sup>8</sup> capacity and understanding. But howsoever these swervings<sup>9</sup> are now and then incident into<sup>1</sup> the course of nature, nevertheless so constantly the laws of nature are by natural agents observed, that no man denieth but those things which nature worketh are wrought either always or for the most part after one and the same manner. * * *

ROBERT SOUTHWELL

Robert Southwell (1561–1595), the younger son of a prominent Roman Catholic family, went to the English seminary for Catholics at Douai, France, in his youth, and then to Rome, where he entered the Society of Jesus (the Jesuits). In 1586 he returned to England to minister to English Catholics. His mission was dangerous because of laws that proscribed Roman Catholic worship and banished priests; in 1592 he was apprehended, imprisoned, tortured, and, three years later, executed as a traitor in the usual grisly manner—by being hanged, disemboweled, and then beheaded. Southwell wrote a good deal of religious prose and verse; the most famous of his lyrics is “The Burning Babe.” Ben Jonson told his friend William Drummond of Hawthornden that if he had written “The Burning Babe” he would have been content to destroy many of his own poems.

The Burning Babe

As I in hoary winter's night stood shivering in the snow,
Surprised I was with sudden heat which made my heart to glow;
And lifting up a fearful eye to view what fire was near,
A pretty babe all burning bright did in the air appear;
Who, scorched with excessive heat, such floods of 5 tears did shed
As though his floods should quench his flames which with his tears were fed.
"Alas," quoth he, "but newly born in fiery heats I fry, o
Yet none approach to warm their hearts or feel my fire but I!
My faultless breast the furnace is, the fuel wounding thorns,
10 Love is the fire, and sighs the smoke, the ashes shame and scorns;
The fuel justice layeth on, and mercy blows the coals,
The metal in this furnace wrought are men's defiled souls,
For which, as now on fire I am to work them to their good,
So will I melt into a bath to wash them in my blood."
With this he vanished out of sight and swiftly shrunk
15 away,
And straight<sup>1</sup> I callèd unto mind that it was Christmas day.

ROGER ASCHAM

1515–1568

When she heard of the death of her former tutor and Latin secretary, Queen Elizabeth is said to have exclaimed, "I would rather have cast ten thousand pounds in the sea than parted from my Ascham."

Educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, one of the great centers of humanism in England, Roger Ascham passionately believed in the study of the Greek and Latin classics, not merely for erudition and aesthetic pleasure but for guidance in moral values and in political activity. He both corresponded widely in Latin with learned men on the Continent and was eager to influence his countrymen, whether they read Latin or not. His important books written in English include Toxophilus, a dialogue in praise of archery with the traditional English longbow, and A Report and Discourse of the State of Germany, based on his experience as secretary to the English ambassador there in 1550–53. His most famous work in English was The Schoolmaster, published two years after his death.

The Schoolmaster eloquently opposes the widespread use of corporal punishment in schools. Instilling a love of learning, rather than a fear of physical pain, inspires young children to excel in their studies. Ascham advocates "double translation" as the most effective way of acquiring a sound Latin style: students would translate a passage from Latin to English and then, without consulting the Latin original, translate the English back into Latin; they would then compare their version with the author's. The approach thus downplays rote learning of the rules of grammar and emphasizes instead a sense of style.

Misused, Ascham's method (which included discouraging students from speaking Latin, for fear that engagement with everyday life would corrupt the linguistic purity of classical antiquity) could, like so many other educational reforms, become torturous. But his ultimate goal was not to make students into gifted imitators but to fashion them ethically and aesthetically. Deeply fearing what he called the "divorce between the tongue and the heart," he believed that education should teach a person to join language and values in a way that achieved what The Schoolmaster calls "decorum." Ascham's most despairing vision of a society without this moral decorum comes in his account of a brief trip to Italy, which he viewed as an evil seductress, luring unwitting Englishmen away from their ethical and religious values.

[TEACHING LATIN]

There is a way, touched in the first book of Cicero De oratore,<sup>1</sup> which, wisely brought into schools, truly taught, and constantly used, would not only take wholly away this butcherly fear in making of Latins<sup>2</sup> but would also, with ease and pleasure and in short time, as I know by good experience, work a true choice and placing of words, a right ordering of sentences, an easy understanding of the tongue, a readiness to speak, a facility to write, a true judgment both of his own and other men's doings, what tongue soever he doth use.

The way is this. After the three concordances<sup>3</sup> learned, as I touched before, let the master read unto him the epistles of Cicero gathered together and chosen out by Sturmius<sup>4</sup> for the capacity of children.

First, let him teach the child, cheerfully and plainly, the cause and matter<sup>5</sup> of the letter; then, let him construe<sup>6</sup> it into English so oft as the child may easily carry away the understanding of it; lastly, parse<sup>7</sup> it over perfectly. This done thus, let the child, by and by,<sup>8</sup> both construe and parse it over again so that it may appear that the child doubteth in nothing that his master taught him before. After this, the child must take a paper book and, sitting in some place where no man shall prompt him, by himself, let him translate into English his former lesson. Then, showing it to his master, let the master take from him his Latin book, and, pausing an hour at the least, then let the child translate his own English into Latin again in another paper book. When the child bringeth it turned into Latin, the master must compare it with Tully's<sup>9</sup> book and lay them both together, and where the child doth well, either in choosing or true placing of Tully's words, let the master praise him and say, "Here ye do well." For I assure you, there is no such whetstone to sharpen a good wit and encourage a will to learning as is praise.

But if the child miss, either in forgetting a word, or in changing a good with a worse, or misordering the sentence, I would not have the master either frown or chide with him, if the child have done his diligence and used no truantship therein. For I know by good experience that a child shall take more profit of two faults gently warned of than of four things rightly hit. For then the master shall have good occasion to say unto him:

M[omen],<sup>1</sup> Tully would have used such a word, not this; Tully would have placed this word here, not there; would have used this case, this number, this person, this degree,<sup>2</sup> this gender; he would have used this mood, this tense, this simple rather than this compound; this adverb here, not there; he would have ended the sentence with this verb, not with that noun or participle, etc.

In these few lines I have wrapped up the most tedious part of grammar and also the ground of almost all the rules that are so busily taught by the master, and so hardly<sup>3</sup> learned by the scholar, in all common schools, which after this sort<sup>4</sup> the master shall teach without all error, and the scholar shall learn without great pain, the master being led by so sure a guide, and the scholar being brought into so plain and easy a way. And therefore we do not contemn<sup>5</sup> rules, but we gladly teach rules, and teach them more plainly, sensibly, and orderly than they be commonly taught in common schools. For when the master shall compare Tully's book with his scholar's translation, let the master, at the first, lead and teach his scholar to join the rules of his grammar book with the examples of his present lesson, until the scholar by himself be able to fetch out of his grammar every rule for every example, so as the grammar book be ever in the scholar's hand and also used of him, as a dictionary, for every present use. This is a lively and perfect way of teaching of rules, where the common way, used in common schools, to read the grammar alone by itself, is tedious for the master, hard for the scholar, cold and uncomfortable to them both.

Let your scholar be never afraid to ask you any doubt,<sup>6</sup> but use discreetly the best allurements ye can to encourage him to the same, lest his overmuch fearing of you drive him to seek some disorderly shift,<sup>7</sup> as to seek to be helped by some other book, or to be prompted by some other scholar, and so go about to beguile you much, and himself more.

[THE ITALIANATE ENGLISHMAN]

* * * But I am afraid that overmany of our travelers into Italy do not eschew the way to Circe's court but go<sup>8</sup> and ride and run and fly thither; they make great haste to come to her; they make great suit<sup>9</sup> to serve her; yea, I could point out some with my finger that never had<sup>1</sup> gone out of England but only to serve Circe in Italy. Vanity and vice and any license to ill-living in England was counted stale and rude<sup>2</sup> unto them. And so, being mules and horses before they went, returned very<sup>3</sup> swine and asses home again; yet everywhere very foxes with subtle and busy heads and, where they may, very wolves with cruel malicious hearts. A marvelous monster which for filthiness of living, for dullness to learning himself, for wiliness in dealing with others, for malice in hurting without cause, should carry at once in one body the belly of a swine, the head of an ass, the brain of a fox, the womb of a wolf. If you think we judge amiss and write too sore against you, hear what the Italian saith of the Englishman, what the master reporteth of the scholar, who uttereth plainly what is taught by him and what is learned by you, saying, Inglese italianato è un diavolo incarnato; that is to say, "You remain men in shape and fashion but become devils in life and condition." This is not the opinion of one, for some private spite, but the judgment of all in a common proverb which riseth of that learning and those manners which you gather in Italy—a good schoolhouse of wholesome doctrine, and worthy masters of commendable scholars, where the master had rather defame himself for his teaching than not shame his scholar for his learning: a good nature of the master, and fair conditions of the scholars. And now choose you, you Italian Englishmen, whether you will be angry with us for calling you monsters, or with the Italians for calling you devils, or else with your own selves, that take so much pains and go so far to make yourselves both. If some yet do not well understand what is an Englishman Italianated, I will plainly tell him: he that by living and traveling in Italy bringeth home into England out of Italy the religion, the learning, the policy,<sup>4</sup> the experience, the manners<sup>5</sup> of Italy. That is to say, for religion, papistry<sup>6</sup> or worse; for learning, less, commonly, than they carried out with them; for policy, a factious heart, a discoursing head, a mind to meddle in all men's matters; for experience, plenty of new mischiefs never known in England before; for manners, variety of vanities and change of filthy living. These be the enchantments of Circe brought out of Italy to mar men's manners in England: much by example of ill life but more by precepts of fond<sup>7</sup> books, of late translated out of Italian into English, sold in every shop in London, commended by honest titles the sooner to corrupt honest manners, dedicated overboldly to virtuous and honorable personages, the easilier to beguile simple and innocent wits. It is pity that those which have authority and charge to allow and disallow books to be printed be no more circumspect herein than they are. Ten sermons at Paul's Cross<sup>8</sup> do not so much good for moving men to true doctrine as one of those books do harm with enticing men to ill-living. Yea, I say farther, those books tend not so much to corrupt honest living as they do to subvert true religion. More papists be made by your merry books of Italy than by your earnest books of Louvain.<sup>9</sup> And because our great physicians do wink at the matter and make no count<sup>1</sup> of this sore, I, though not admitted one of their fellowship, yet having been many years a prentice to God's true religion, and trust to continue a poor journeyman therein all days of my life, for the duty I owe and love I bear both to true doctrine and honest living, though I have no authority to amend the sore myself, yet I will declare my good will to discover<sup>2</sup> the sore to others.

St. Paul saith that sects and ill opinions be the works of the flesh and fruits of sin.<sup>3</sup> This is spoken no more truly for the doctrine than sensibly for the reason. And why? For ill-doings breed ill-thinkings, and of corrupted manners spring perverted judgments. And how? There be in man two special<sup>4</sup> things: man's will, man's mind. Where will inclineth to goodness the mind is bent to truth; where will is carried from goodness to vanity the mind is soon drawn from truth to false opinion. And so the readiest way to entangle the mind with false doctrine is first to entice the will to wanton living. Therefore, when the busy and open<sup>5</sup> papists abroad could not by their contentious books turn men in England fast enough from truth and right judgment in doctrine, then the subtle<sup>6</sup> and secret papists at home procured bawdy books to be translated out of the Italian tongue, whereby overmany young wills and wits, allured to wantonness, do now boldly contemn all severe books that sound to<sup>7</sup> honesty and godliness. In our forefathers' time, when papistry as a standing pool covered and overflowed all England, few books were read in our tongue, saving certain books of chivalry, as they said, for pastime and pleasure, which, as some say, were made in monasteries by idle monks or wanton canons; as one for example, Morte Darthur,<sup>8</sup> the whole pleasure of which book standeth in two special points—in open manslaughter and bold bawdry; in which book those be counted the noblest knights that do kill most men without any quarrel and commit foulest adulteries by subtlest shifts:<sup>9</sup> as Sir Lancelot with the wife of King Arthur his master, Sir Tristram with the wife of King Mark his uncle, Sir Lamorak with the wife of King Lot that was his own aunt. This is good stuff for wise men to laugh at or honest men to take pleasure at. Yet I know when God's Bible was banished the court and Morte Darthur received into the prince's chamber.<sup>1</sup> * * *

SIR THOMAS HOBY

1530–1566

One of the most influential books of the Renaissance was Il Cortegiano (The Courtier), published in 1528 in Italian by Count Baldassare Castiglione (1478–1529) and soon translated into all the major European languages. The English translation, by the humanist and diplomat Sir Thomas Hoby, was not published until 1561 but had been written earlier, probably during the reign of Queen Mary (1553–58), when Hoby was living abroad as a Protestant exile.

Castiglione's book describes, by means of four fictitious dialogues—on successive evenings, among actual men and women living at the court of the duke of Urbino in 1504–08—the qualities of the ideal courtier. Supreme among these qualities is grace, the mysterious attribute that renders a person's speech and actions not merely impressive or accomplished but persuasive, touching, and beautiful. Though few people are born with grace, it is possible to acquire it by the mastery of certain techniques. In a famous passage, one of The Courtier's speakers, Count Lodovico Canossa, defines the most important of these techniques as sprezzatura, or, as Hoby translates it, "recklessness." Sprezzatura is in fact close to the opposite of recklessness, as we ordinarily understand the term; it is a device for manipulating appearances and masking all the tedious memorizing of lines and secret rehearsals that underlie successful social performances. The paradox here is still evident in many social settings: success requires the painstaking mastery of complex codes of behavior, yet there is no surer recipe for failure than to be seen to be trying too hard.

The most famous passage in The Courtier presents an elegant version of an ideal of love that ultimately derives from Plato's Symposium. In the ancient Greek original, dating from the late fourth century B.C.E., that ideal is principally focused on the love of men for beautiful boys; in Castiglione's dialogue, the poet and scholar Peter Bembo recasts it as both heterosexual and Christian. Bembo declares that love is not the mere gratification of the senses but is the yearning of the soul after beauty, which is finally identical with the eternal good, as perceived by such holy visionaries as Saint Francis and Saint Paul. Love properly understood is, therefore, a kind of ladder by which the soul progresses from lower to higher things. As he pursues his theme, Bembo becomes more and more enraptured and ends with a vision of the soul ravished by heavenly beauty, purged of the flesh, and admitted to the feast of the angels. One of the spirited ladies in the court, Emilia Pia, plucks his garment and gently reminds him that he also has a body.

[GRACE]

"* * * Perhaps I am able to tell you what a perfect Courtier ought to be, but not to teach you how ye should do to be one. Notwithstanding, to fulfill your request in what I am able, although it be (in manner) in a proverb that Grace<sup>1</sup> is not to be learned, I say unto you, whoso mindeth to be gracious or to have a good grace in the exercises of the body (presupposing first that he be not of nature unapt) ought to begin betimes, and to learn his principles of cunning<sup>2</sup> men. The which thing how necessary a matter Philip, king of Macedonia,<sup>3</sup> thought it, a man may gather in that his will was that Aristotle, so famous a philosopher, and perhaps the greatest that ever hath been in the world, should be the man that should instruct Alexander, his son, in the first principles of letters. And of men whom we know nowadays, mark how well and with what a good grace Sir Galeazzo Sanseverino, master of the horse to the French king, doth all exercises of the body; and that because, besides the natural disposition of person that is in him, he hath applied all his study to learn of cunning men, and to have continually excellent men about him, and, of every one, to choose the best of that they have skill in. For as in wrestling, in vaulting, and in learning to handle sundry kind of weapons he hath taken for his guide our Master Peter Mount, who (as you know) is the true and only master of all artificial<sup>4</sup> force and sleight, so in riding, in jousting, and in every other feat, he hath always had before his eyes the most perfectest that hath been known to be in those professions.

"He therefore that will be a good scholar, beside the practicing of good things, must evermore set all his diligence to be like his master, and, if it were possible, change himself into him. And when he hath had some entry,<sup>5</sup> it profiteth him much to behold sundry men of that profession; and, governing himself with that good judgment that must always be his guide, go about to pick out, sometime of one and sometime of another, sundry matters. And even as the bee in the green meadows flieth always about the grass choosing out flowers, so shall our Courtier steal this grace from them that to his seeming have it, and from each one that parcel<sup>6</sup> that shall be most worthy praise. And not do as a friend of ours whom you all know, that thought he resembled much King Ferdinand the Younger, of Aragon, and regarded not to resemble him in any other point but in the often lifting up his head, wrying, therewithal,<sup>7</sup> a part of his mouth, the which custom the king had gotten by infirmity. And many such there are that think they do much, so they resemble a great man in somewhat, and take many times the thing in him that worst becometh him."

"But I, imagining with myself often times how this grace cometh, leaving apart such as have it from above, find one rule that is most general which in this part (methink) taketh place<sup>8</sup> in all things belonging to a man, in word or deed, above all other. And that is to eschew as much as a man may, and as a sharp and dangerous rock, Affectation or curiosity,<sup>9</sup> and, to speak a new word, to use in everything a certain Recklessness, to cover art<sup>1</sup> withal, and seem whatsoever he doth and sayeth to do it without pain, and, as it were, not minding<sup>2</sup> it. And of this do I believe grace is much derived, for in rare matters and well brought to pass every man knoweth the hardness of them, so that a readiness therein maketh great wonder. And contrariwise to use force and, as they say, to hale by the hair, giveth a great disgrace and maketh everything, how great soever it be, to be little esteemed. Therefore that may be said to be a very<sup>3</sup> art that appeareth not to be art; neither ought a man to put more diligence in anything than in covering it, for in case it be open, it loseth credit clean, and maketh a man little set by.<sup>4</sup> And I remember that I have read in my days that there were some most excellent orators which among other their cares enforced themselves to make every man believe that they had no sight<sup>5</sup> in letters, and dissembling their cunning, made semblant<sup>6</sup> their orations to be made very simply, and rather as nature and truth made them than study and art, the which if it had been openly known would have put a doubt in the people's mind, for fear lest he beguiled them. You may see then how to show art and such bent<sup>7</sup> study taketh away the grace of everything. * * *

[THE LADDER OF LOVE]

Then the Lord Gaspar:<sup>8</sup> “I remember,” quoth he, “that these lords yester-night, reasoning of the Courtier’s qualities, did allow him to be a lover; and in making rehearsal<sup>9</sup> of as much as hitherto hath been spoken, a man may pick out a conclusion that the Courtier which with his worthiness and credit must incline his prince to virtue<sup>1</sup> must in manner of necessity be aged, for knowledge cometh very seldom-time before years, and specially in matters that be learned with experience. I cannot see, when he is well drawn<sup>2</sup> in years, how it will stand well with him to be a lover, considering, as it hath been said the other night, love frameth not with<sup>3</sup> old men, and the tricks that in young men be gallantness, courtesy, and preciseness<sup>4</sup> so acceptable to women, in them are mere follies and fondness<sup>5</sup> to be laughed at, and purchase him that useth them hatred of women and mocks of others. Therefore, in case this your Aristotle, an old Courtier, were a lover and practiced the feats that young lovers do, as some that we have seen in our days, I fear me he would forget to teach his prince; and peradventure boys would mock him behind his back, and women would have none other delight in him but to make him a jesting-stock.”

Then said the Lord Octavian:<sup>6</sup> “Since all the other qualities appointed to the Courtier are meet<sup>7</sup> for him, although he be old, methink we should not then bar him from this happiness to love.”

“Nay rather,” quoth the Lord Gaspar, “to take this love from him is a perfection over and above, and a making him to live happily out of misery and wretchedness.”

* * *

Then M. Peter<sup>8</sup> after a while's silence, somewhat settling himself as though he should entreat upon a weighty matter, said thus: "My lords, to show that old men may love not only without slander, but otherwhile<sup>9</sup> more happily than young men, I must be enforced to make a little discourse to declare what love is, and wherein consisteth the happiness that lovers may have. Therefore I beseech you give the hearing with needfulness, for I hope to make you understand that it were not unfitting for any man here to be a lover, in case he were fifteen or twenty years elder than M. Morello."<sup>1</sup>

And here, after they had laughed awhile, M. Peter proceeded: "I say, therefore, that according as it is defined of the wise men of old time, love is nothing else but a certain coveting to enjoy beauty;<sup>2</sup> and forsomuch as coveting longeth for nothing but for things known, it is requisite that knowledge go evermore before coveting, which of his own nature willeth the good, but of himself is blind and knoweth it not. Therefore hath nature so ordained that to every virtue<sup>3</sup> of knowledge there is annexed a virtue of longing. And because in our soul there be three manner ways to know, namely, by sense, reason, and understanding:<sup>4</sup> of sense ariseth appetite or longing, which is common to us with brute beasts; of reason ariseth election or choice, which is proper<sup>5</sup> to man; of understanding, by the which man may be partner with angels, ariseth will. Even as therefore the sense knoweth not but sensible matters and that which may be felt, so the appetite or coveting only desireth the same; and even as the understanding is bent but to behold things that may be understood, so is that will only fed with spiritual goods. Man of nature endowed with reason, placed, as it were, in the middle between these two extremities, may, through his choice inclining to sense or reaching to understanding, come nigh to the coveting sometime of the one, sometime of the other part. In these sorts therefore may beauty be coveted; the general name whereof may be applied to all things, either natural or artificial, that are framed in good proportion and due temper,<sup>6</sup> as their nature beareth. But speaking of the beauty that we mean, which is only it that appeareth in bodies, and especially in the face of man, and moveth this fervent coveting which we call love, we will term it an influence of the heavenly bountifulness, the which for all it stretcheth over all things that be created (like the light of the sun), yet when it findeth out a face well proportioned, and framed with a certain lively agreement of several colors, and set forth with lights and shadows, and with an orderly distance and limits of lines, thereinto it distilleth itself and appeareth most well favored, and decketh out and lighteneth the subject where it shineth with a marvelous grace and glistening,<sup>7</sup> like the sunbeams that strike against beautiful plate of fine gold wrought and set with precious jewels, so that it draweth unto it men's eyes with pleasure, and piercing through them imprinteth himself in the soul, and with an unwonted sweetness all to-stirreth<sup>8</sup> her and delighteth, and setting her on fire maketh her to covet him.

"Do you believe, M. Morello," quoth then Count Lewis,<sup>9</sup> that beauty is always so good a thing as M. Peter Bembo speaketh of?"

"Not I, in good sooth," answered M. Morello. "But I remember rather that I have seen many beautiful women of a most ill inclination, cruel and spiteful, and it seemeth that, in a manner, it happeneth always so, for beauty maketh them proud, and pride, cruel."

Count Lewis said, smiling: "To you perhaps they seem cruel, because they content you not with it that you would have. But cause M. Peter Bembo to teach you in what sort old men ought to covet beauty, and what to seek at their ladies' hands, and what to content themselves withal; and in not passing out of these bounds ye shall see that they shall be neither proud nor cruel, and will satisfy you with what you shall require."

M. Morello seemed then somewhat out of patience, and said: "I will not know the thing that toucheth<sup>1</sup> me not. But cause you to be taught how the young men ought to covet this beauty that are not so fresh and lusty as old men be."

Here Sir Frederick,<sup>2</sup> to pacify M. Morello and to break their talk, would not suffer Count Lewis to make answer, but interrupting him said: "Perhaps M. Morello is not altogether out of the way in saying that beauty is not always good, for the beauty of women is many times cause of infinite evils in the world—hatred, war, mortality, and destruction, whereof the razing of Troy<sup>3</sup> can be a good witness; and beautiful women for the most part be either proud and cruel, as is said, or unchaste; but M. Morello would find no fault with that. There be also many wicked men that have the comeliness of a beautiful countenance, and it seemeth that nature hath so shaped them because they may be the readier to deceive, and that this amiable look were like a bait that covereth the hook."

Then M. Peter Bembo: "Believe not," quoth he, "but<sup>4</sup> beauty is always good."

Here Count Lewis, because he would return again to his former purpose, interrupted him and said: "Since M. Morello passeth<sup>5</sup> not to understand that which is so necessary for him, teach it me, and show me how old men may come by this happiness of love, for I will not care to be counted old, so it may profit me."

M. Peter Bembo laughed, and said: "First will I take the error out of these gentlemen's mind, and afterward will I satisfy you also." So beginning afresh: "My Lords," quoth he, "I would not that with speaking ill of beauty, which is a holy thing, any of us as profane and wicked should purchase him the wrath of God. Therefore, to give M. Morello and Sir Frederick warning, that they lose not their sight, as Stesichorus did—a pain most meet<sup>6</sup> for whoso dispraiseth beauty—I say that beauty cometh of God and is like a circle, the goodness whereof is the center. And therefore, as there can be no circle without a center, no more can beauty be without goodness. Whereupon doth very seldom an ill<sup>7</sup> soul dwell in a beautiful body. And therefore is the outward beauty a true sign of the inward goodness, and in bodies this comeliness is imprinted, more and less, as it were, for a mark of the soul, whereby she is outwardly known; as in trees, in which the beauty of the buds giveth a testimony of the goodness of the fruit. And the very same happeneth in bodies, as it is seen that palmisters<sup>8</sup> by the visage know many times the conditions and otherwhile the thoughts of men. And, which is more, in beasts also a man may discern by the face the quality of the courage,<sup>9</sup> which in the body declareth itself as much as it can. Judge you how plainly in the face of a lion, a horse, and an eagle, a man shall discern anger, fierceness, and stoutness; in lambs and doves, simpleness and very innocency; the crafty subtlety in foxes and wolves; and the like, in a manner, in all other living creatures. The foul,<sup>1</sup> therefore, for the most part be also evil, and the beautiful good. Therefore it may be said that beauty is a face pleasant, merry, comely, and to be desired for goodness; and foulness a face dark, ugly,<sup>2</sup> unpleasant, and to be shunned for ill. And in case you will consider all things, you shall find that whatsoever is good and profitable hath also evermore the comeliness of beauty. Behold the state of this great engine of the world,<sup>3</sup> which God created for the health and preservation of everything that was made: the heaven round beset with so many heavenly lights; and in the middle the earth environed with the elements and upheld with the very weight of itself; the sun, that compassing about<sup>4</sup> giveth light to the whole, and in winter season draweth to the lowermost sign,<sup>5</sup> afterward by little and little climbeth again to the other part; the moon, that of him taketh her light, according as she draweth nigh or goeth farther from him; and the other five stars<sup>6</sup> that diversely keep the very same course. These things among themselves have such force by the knitting together of an order so necessarily framed that, with altering them any one jot, they should all be loosed and the world would decay. They have also such beauty and comeliness that all the wits men have cannot imagine a more beautiful matter.

“Think now of the shape of man, which may be called a little world, in whom every parcel of his body is seen to be necessarily framed by art and not by hap,<sup>7</sup> and then the form altogether most beautiful, so that it were a hard matter to judge whether the members (as the eyes, the nose, the mouth, the ears, the arms, the breast, and in like manner the other parts) give either more profit to the countenance and the rest of the body, or comeliness. The like may be said of all other living creatures. Behold the feathers of fowls, the leaves and boughs of trees, which be given them of nature to keep them in their being, and yet have they withal a very great sightliness. Leave nature, and come to art. What thing is so necessary in sailing vessels as the forepart, the sides, the main yards, the mast, the sails, the stern, oars, anchors, and tacklings? All these things notwithstanding are so well-favored in the eye that unto whoso beholdeth them they seem to have been found out as well for pleasure as for profit. Pillars and great beams uphold high buildings and palaces, and yet are they no less pleasurable unto the eyes of the beholders than profitable to the buildings. When men began first to build, in the middle of temples and houses they reared the ridge of the roof, not to make the works to have a better show, but because the water might the more commodiously avoid<sup>8</sup> on both sides; yet unto profit there was forthwith adjoined a fair sightliness, so that if, under the sky where there falleth neither hail nor rain, a man should build a temple without a reared ridge, it is to be thought that it could have neither a sightly show nor any beauty. Besides other things, therefore, it giveth a great praise to the world in saying that it is beautiful. It is praised in saying the beautiful heaven, beautiful earth, beautiful sea, beautiful rivers, beautiful woods, trees, gardens, beautiful cities, beautiful churches, houses, armies. In conclusion, this comely and holy beauty is a wondrous setting out of everything. And it may be said that good and beautiful be after a sort one self<sup>9</sup> thing, especially in the bodies of men; of the beauty whereof the highest cause, I suppose, is the beauty of the soul; the which, as a partner of the right and heavenly beauty, maketh sightly and beautiful whatever she toucheth, and most of all if the body where she dwelleth be not of so vile a matter that she cannot imprint in it her property.<sup>1</sup> Therefore beauty is the true monument and spoil<sup>2</sup> of the victory of the soul, when she with heavenly influence beareth rule over material and gross nature, and with her light overcometh the darkness of the body. It is not, then, to be spoken that beauty maketh women proud or cruel, although it seem so to M. Morello. Neither yet ought beautiful women to bear the blame of that hatred, mortality, and destruction which the unbridled appetites of men are the cause of. I will not now deny but it is possible also to find in the world beautiful women unchaste; yet not because beauty inclineth them to unchaste living, for it rather plucketh them from it, and leadeth them into the way of virtuous conditions, through the affinity that beauty hath with goodness; but otherwhile<sup>3</sup> ill bringing-up, the continual provocations of lovers' tokens,<sup>4</sup> poverty, hope, deceits, fear, and a thousand other matters overcome the steadfastness, yea, of beautiful and good women; and for these and like causes may also beautiful men become wicked."

Then said the Lord Cesar:<sup>5</sup> "In case the Lord Gaspar's saying be true of yesternight, there is no doubt but the fair women be more chaste than the foul."

"And what was my saying?" quoth the Lord Gaspar.

The Lord Cesar answered: "If I do well bear in mind, your saying was that the women that are sued to always refuse to satisfy him that sueth to them, but those that are not sued to, sue to others. There is no doubt but the beautiful women have always more suitors, and be more instantly laid at<sup>6</sup> in love, than the foul. Therefore the beautiful always deny, and consequently be more chaste than the foul, which, not being sued to, sue unto others."

M. Peter Bembo laughed, and said: "This argument cannot be answered to."

Afterward he proceeded: "It chanceth also, oftentimes, that as the other senses, so the sight is deceived and judgeth a face beautiful which indeed is not beautiful. And because in the eyes and in the whole countenance of some woman a man beholdeth otherwhile a certain lavish wantonness painted, with dishonest flickerings,<sup>7</sup> many, whom that manner delighteth because it promiseth them an easiness to come by the thing that they covet, call it beauty; but indeed it is a cloaked un-shamefastness,<sup>8</sup> unworthy of so honorable and holy a name."

M. Peter Bembo held his peace, but those lords still were earnest upon him to speak somewhat more of this love and of the way to enjoy beauty aright, and at the last, "Methink," quoth he, "I have showed plainly enough that old men may love more happily than young, which was my drift;<sup>9</sup> therefore it belongeth not to me to enter any farther."

Count Lewis answered: "You have better declared the unluckiness of young men than the happiness of old men, whom you have not as yet taught what way they must follow in this love of theirs; only you have said that they must suffer themselves to be guided by reason, and the opinion of many is that it is impossible for love to stand with reason."

Bembo notwithstanding sought to make an end of reasoning, but the duchess<sup>1</sup> desired him to say on, and he began thus afresh: "Too unlucky were the nature of man, if our soul, in which this so fervent coveting may lightly<sup>2</sup> arise, should be driven to nourish it with that only which is common to her with beasts, and could not turn it to the other noble part,<sup>3</sup> which is proper to her. Therefore, since it is so your pleasure, I will not refuse to reason upon this noble matter. And because I know myself unworthy to talk of the most holy mysteries of Love, I beseech him to lead my thought and my tongue so that I may show this excellent Courtier how to love contrary to the wonted<sup>4</sup> manner of the common ignorant sort; and even as from my childhood I have dedicated all my whole life unto him, so also now that my words may be answerable to the same intent, and to the praise of him. I say, therefore, that since the nature of man in youthful age is so much inclined to sense, it may be granted the Courtier, while he is young, to love sensually; but in case afterward also, in his riper years, he chance to be set on fire with this coveting of love, he ought to be good and circumspect, and heedful that he beguile not himself to be led willfully into the wretchedness that in young men deserveth more to be pitied than blamed, and contrariwise in old men more to be blamed than pitied. Therefore when an amiable countenance of a beautiful woman cometh in his sight, that is accompanied with noble conditions and honest<sup>5</sup> behaviors, so that, as one practiced in love, he wotteth well that his hue<sup>6</sup> hath an agreement with hers, as soon as he is aware that his eyes snatch that image and carry it to the heart, and that the soul beginneth to behold it with pleasure, and feeleth within herself the influence that stirreth her and by little and little setteth her in heat, and that those lively spirits<sup>7</sup> that twinkle out through the eyes put continually fresh nourishment to the fire, he ought in this beginning to seek a speedy remedy and to raise up reason, and with her to fence the fortress of his heart, and to shut in such wise<sup>8</sup> the passages against sense and appetites that they may enter neither with force nor subtle practice.<sup>9</sup> Thus, if the flame be quenched, the jeopardy is also quenched. But in case it continue or increase, then must the Courtier determine, when he perceiveth he is taken, to shun thoroughly<sup>1</sup> all filthiness of common love, and so enter into the holy way of love with the guide of reason, and first consider that the body where that beauty shineth is not the fountain from whence beauty springeth, but rather because beauty is bodiless and, as we have said, an heavenly shining beam, she loseth much of her honor when she is coupled with that vile subject<sup>2</sup> and full of corruption: because the less she is partner thereof, the more perfect she is, and, clean sundered from it, is most perfect. And as a man heareth not with his mouth, nor smelleth with his ears, no more can he also in any manner wise enjoy beauty, nor satisfy the desire that she stirreth up in our minds, with feeling, but with the sense unto whom beauty is the very butt to level at,<sup>3</sup> namely, the virtue<sup>4</sup> of seeing. Let him lay aside, therefore, the blind judgment of the sense, and enjoy with his eyes the brightness, the comeliness, the loving sparkles, laughters, gestures, and all the other pleasant furnitures<sup>5</sup> of beauty, especially with hearing the sweetness of her voice, the tunableness<sup>6</sup> of her words, the melody of her singing and playing on instruments (in case the woman beloved be a musician); and so shall he with most dainty food feed the soul through the means of these two senses which have little bodily substance in them and be the ministers of reason, without entering farther toward the body with coveting unto any longing otherwise than honest. Afterward, let him obey, please, and honor with all reverence his woman, and reckon her more dear to him than his own life, and prefer all her commodities<sup>7</sup> and pleasures before his own, and love no less in her the beauty of the mind than of the body. Therefore let him have a care not to suffer her to run into any error, but with lessons and good exhortations seek always to frame her to modesty, to temperance, to true honesty, and so to work that there may never take place in her other than pure thoughts and far wide from all filthiness of vices. And thus in sowing of virtue in the garden of that mind, he shall also gather the fruits of most beautiful conditions, and savor them with a marvelous good relish. And this shall be the right engendering and imprinting of beauty in beauty, the which some hold opinion to be the end<sup>8</sup> of love. In this manner shall our Courtier be most acceptable to his lady, and she will always show herself toward him tractable, lowly,<sup>9</sup> and sweet in language, and as willing to please him as to be beloved of him; and the wills of them both shall be most honest and agreeable, and they consequently shall be most happy."

Here M. Morello: "The engendering," quoth he, "of beauty in beauty aright were the engendering of a beautiful child in a beautiful woman; and I would think it a more manifest token a great deal that she loved her lover, if she pleased him with this than with the sweetness of language that you speak of."

M. Peter Bembo laughed, and said: "You must not, M. Morello, pass your bounds. I may tell you it is not a small token that a woman loveth when she giveth unto her lover her beauty, which is so precious a matter; and by the ways that be a passage to the soul (that is to say, the sight and the hearing) sendeth the looks of her eyes, the image of her countenance, and the voice of her words, that pierce into the lover's heart and give a witness of her love."

M. Morello said: "Looks and words may be, and oftentimes are, false witnesses. Therefore whoso hath not a better pledge of love, in my judgment he is in an ill assurance. And surely I looked<sup>1</sup> still that you would have made this woman of yours somewhat more courteous and free toward the Courtier than my Lord Julian<sup>2</sup> hath made his; but meseemeth ye be both of the property<sup>3</sup> of those judges that, to appear wise, give sentence against their own."

Bembo said: "I am well pleased to have this woman much more courteous toward my Courtier not young than the Lord Julian's is to the young; and that with good reason, because mine coveteth but honest matters, and therefore may the woman grant him them all without blame. But my Lord Julian's woman, that is not so assured of the modesty of the young man, ought to grant him the honest matters only, and deny him the dishonest. Therefore more happy is mine, that hath granted him whatsoever he requireth, than the other, that hath part granted and part denied. And because<sup>4</sup> you may moreover the better understand that reasonable love is more happy than sensual, I say unto you that selfsame things in sensual ought to be denied otherwhile, and in reasonable granted; because in the one they be honest, and in the other dishonest. Therefore the woman, to please her good lover, besides the granting him merry countenances, familiar and secret talk, jesting, dallying, hand-in-hand, may also lawfully and without blame come to kissing, which in sensual love, according to the Lord Julian's rules, is not lawful. For since a kiss is a knitting together both of body and soul, it is to be feared lest the sensual lover will be more inclined to the part of the body than of the soul; but the reasonable lover wotteth well that although the mouth be a parcel<sup>5</sup> of the body, yet is it an issue for the words that be the interpreters of the soul, and for the inward breath, which is also called the soul; and therefore hath a delight to join his mouth with the woman's beloved with a kiss, not to stir him to any dishonest desire, but because he feeleth that that bond is the opening of an entry to the souls, which, drawn with a coveting the one of the other, pour themselves by turn the one into the other's body, and be so mingled together that each of them hath two souls, and one alone, so framed of them both, ruleth, in a manner, two bodies. Whereupon a kiss may be said to be rather a coupling together of the soul than of the body, because it hath such force in her that it draweth her unto it, and, as it were, separateth her from the body. For this do all chaste lovers covet a kiss as a coupling of souls together. And therefore Plato,<sup>6</sup> the divine lover, saith that in kissing his soul came as far as his lips to depart out of the body. And because the separating of the soul from the matters of the sense, and the thorough coupling of her with matters of understanding, may be betokened by a kiss, Solomon saith<sup>7</sup> in his heavenly book of ballads, 'Oh that he would kiss me with a kiss of his mouth,' to express the desire he had that his soul might be ravished through heavenly love to the beholding of heavenly beauty in such manner that, coupling herself inwardly with it, she might forsake the body."

They stood all hearkening heedfully to Bembo's reasoning, and after he had stayed<sup>8</sup> a while and saw that none spake, he said: "Since you have made me to begin to show our not-young Courtier this happy love, I will lead him yet somewhat farther forwards; because to stand still at this stay were somewhat perilous for him, considering, as we have oftentimes said, the soul is most inclined to the senses, and for all<sup>9</sup> reason with discourse chooseth well, and knoweth that beauty not to spring of the body, and therefore setteth a bridle to the unhonest desires, yet to behold it always in that body doth oftentimes corrupt the right judgment. And where no other inconvenience ensueth upon it, one's absence from the wight<sup>1</sup> beloved carrieth a great passion with it; because the influence of that beauty when it is present giveth a wondrous delight to the lover and, setting his heart on fire, quickeneth and melteth certain virtues in a trance and congealed in the soul, the which, nourished with the heat of love, flow about and go bubbling nigh the heart, and thrust out through the eyes those spirits which be most fine vapors made of the purest and clearest part of the blood, which receive the image of beauty<sup>2</sup> and deck it with a thousand sundry furnitures. Whereupon the soul taketh a delight, and with a certain wonder is aghast, and yet enjoyeth she it, and, as it were, astonished<sup>3</sup> together with the pleasure, feeleth the fear and reverence that men accustomedly have toward holy matters, and thinketh herself to be in paradise. The lover, therefore, that considereth only the beauty in the body loseth this treasure and happiness as soon as the woman beloved with her departure leaveth the eyes without their brightness, and consequently the soul as a widow without her joy. For since beauty is far off, that influence of love setteth not the heart on fire, as it did in presence. Whereupon the pores be dried up and withered, and yet doth the remembrance of beauty somewhat stir those virtues of the soul in such wise that they seek to scatter abroad the spirits, and they, finding the ways closed up, have no issue, and still they seek to get out, and so with those shootings enclosed prick the soul and torment her bitterly, as young children when in their tender gums they begin to breed teeth. And hence come the tears, sighs, vexations, and torments of lovers; because the soul is always in affliction and travail and, in a manner, waxeth wood,<sup>4</sup> until the beloved beauty cometh before her once again, and then she is immediately pacified and taketh breath, and, thoroughly bent to it, is nourished with most dainty food, and by her will would never depart from so sweet a sight. To avoid, therefore, the torment of this absence, and to enjoy beauty without passion, the Courtier by the help of reason must full and wholly call back again the coveting of the body to beauty alone, and, in what he can, behold it in itself simple and pure, and frame it within his imagination sundered from all matter, and so make it friendly and loving to his soul, and there enjoy it, and have it with him day and night, in every time and place, without mistrust ever to lose it; keeping always fast in mind that the body is a most diverse<sup>5</sup> thing from beauty, and not only not increaseth but diminisheth the perfection of it. In this wise shall our not-young Courtier be out of all bitterness and wretchedness that young men feel, in a manner continually, as jealousies, suspicions, disdains, angers, desperations, and certain rages full of madness, whereby many times they be led into so great error that some do not only beat the women whom they love, but rid themselves out of their life. He shall do no wrong to the husband, father, brethren, or kinsfolk of the woman beloved. He shall not bring her in slander. He shall not be in case with<sup>6</sup> much ado otherwhile to refrain his eyes and tongue from discovering his desires to others. He shall not take thought<sup>7</sup> at departure or in absence, because he shall evermore carry his precious treasure about with him shut fast within his heart. And besides, through the virtue of imagination, he shall fashion within himself that beauty much more fair than it is indeed. But among these commodities the lover shall find another yet far greater, in case he will take this love for a stair, as it were, to climb up to another far higher than it. The which he shall bring to pass, if he will go and consider with himself what a strait bond it is to be always in the trouble to behold the beauty of one body alone. And therefore, to come out of this so narrow a room,<sup>8</sup> he shall gather in his thought by little and little so many ornaments that, meddling<sup>9</sup> all beauties together, he shall make a universal concept, and bring the multitude of them to the unity of one alone, that is generally spread over all the nature of man. And thus shall he behold no more the particular beauty of one woman, but an universal, that decketh out all bodies. Whereupon, being made dim with this greater light, he shall not pass upon<sup>1</sup> the lesser, and, burning in a more excellent flame, he shall little esteem it that<sup>2</sup> he set great store by at the first. This stair of love, though it be very noble and such as few arrive at it, yet is it not in this sort to be called perfect, forsomuch as where the imagination is of force to make conveyance, and hath no knowledge but through those beginnings that the senses help her withal, she is not clean purged from gross darkness; and therefore, though she do consider that universal beauty in sunder and in itself alone, yet doth she not well and clearly discern it, nor without some doubtfulness, by reason of the agreement that the fancies have with the body. Wherefore such as come to this love are like young birds almost flush,<sup>3</sup> which for all they flutter a little their tender wings, yet dare they not stray far from the nest, nor commit themselves to the wind and open weather. When our Courtier, therefore, shall be come to this point, although he may be called a good and happy lover, in respect of them that be drowned in the misery of sensual love, yet will I not have him to set his heart at rest, but boldly proceed farther, following the highway, after his guide<sup>4</sup> that leadeth him to the point of true happiness. And thus, instead of going out of his wit<sup>5</sup> with thought, as he must do that will consider the bodily beauty, he may come into his wit to behold the beauty that is seen with the eyes of the mind, which then begin to be sharp and through-seeing when the eyes of the body lose the flower of their sightliness.

"Therefore the soul, rid of vices, purged with the studies of true philosophy, occupied in spiritual, and exercised in matters of understanding, turning her to the beholding of her own substance, as it were raised out of a most deep sleep, openeth the eyes that all men have and few occupy,<sup>6</sup> and seeth in herself a shining beam of that light which is the true image of the angel-like beauty partened<sup>7</sup> with her, whereof she also partneth with the body a feeble shadow; therefore, waxed blind about earthly matters, is made most quick of sight about heavenly. And otherwhile,<sup>8</sup> when the stirring virtues of the body are withdrawn alone through earnest beholding, either<sup>9</sup> fast bound through sleep, when she is not hindered by them, she feeleth a certain privy<sup>1</sup> smell of the right angel-like beauty, and, ravished with the shining of that light, beginneth to be inflamed, and so greedily followeth after, that in a manner she waxeth drunken and beside herself, for coveting to couple herself with it, having found, to her weening,<sup>2</sup> the footsteps of God, in the beholding of whom, as in her happy end, she seeketh to settle herself. And therefore, burning in this most happy flame, she ariseth to the noblest part of her, which is the understanding, and there, no more shadowed with the dark night of earthly matters, seeth the heavenly beauty; but yet doth she not for all that enjoy it altogether perfectly, because she beholdeth it only in her particular<sup>3</sup> understanding, which cannot conceive the passing<sup>4</sup> great universal beauty; whereupon, not thoroughly satisfied with this benefit, love giveth unto the soul a greater happiness. For like as through the particular beauty of one body he guideth her to the universal beauty of all bodies, even so in the last degree of perfection through particular understanding he guideth her to the universal understanding. Thus the soul kindled in the most holy fire of heavenly love fleeth to couple herself with the nature of angels, and not only clean forsaketh sense, but hath no more need of the discourse of reason, for, being changed into an angel, she understandeth all things that may be understood; and without any veil or cloud she seeth the main sea of the pure heavenly beauty, and receiveth it into her, and enjoyeth that sovereign happiness that cannot be comprehended of the senses. Since, therefore, the beauties which we daily see with these our dim eyes in bodies subject to corruption, that nevertheless be nothing else but dreams and most thin shadows of beauty, seem unto us so well favored and comely that oftentimes they kindle in us a most burning fire, and with such delight that we reckon no happiness may be compared to it that we feel otherwhile through the only look<sup>5</sup> which the beloved countenance of a woman casteth at us; what happy wonder, what blessed abashment, may we reckon that to be that taketh the souls which come to have a sight of the heavenly beauty? What sweet flame, what sweet incense, may a man believe that to be which ariseth of the fountain of the sovereign and right beauty? Which is the origin of all other beauty, which never increaseth nor diminisheth, always beautiful, and of itself, as well on the one part as on the other, most simple, only like itself, and partner of none other, but in such wise beautiful that all other beautiful things be beautiful because they be partners of the beauty of it.

“This is the beauty unseparable from the high bounty which with her voice calleth and draweth to her all things; and not only to the endowed with understanding giveth understanding, to the reasonable reason, to the sensual sense and appetite to live, but also partaketh with plants and stones, as a print of herself, stirring, and the natural provocation of their properties.<sup>6</sup> So much, therefore, is this love greater and happier than others, as the cause that stirreth it is more excellent. And therefore, as common fire trieth gold and maketh it fine, so this most holy fire in souls destroyeth and consumeth whatsoever is mortal in them, and relieveth and maketh beautiful the heavenly part, which at the first by reason of the sense was dead and buried in them. This is the great fire in the which, the poets write, that Hercules was burned on the top of the mountain Oeta,<sup>7</sup> and, through that consuming with fire, after his death was holy and immortal. This is the fiery bush of Moses;<sup>8</sup> the divided tongues of fire;<sup>9</sup> the inflamed chariot of Elias;<sup>1</sup> which doubleth grace and happiness in their souls that be worthy to see it, when they forsake this earthly baseness and flee up into heaven. Let us, therefore, bend all our force and thoughts of soul to this most holy light, which showeth us the way which leadeth to heaven; and after it, putting off the affections we were clad withal at our coming down, let us climb up the stairs which at the lowermost step have the shadow of sensual beauty, to the high mansion place where the heavenly, amiable, and right beauty dwelleth, which lieth hid in the innermost secrets of God, lest unhallowed eyes should come to the sight of it; and there shall we find a most happy end for our desires, true rest for our travails, certain remedy for miseries, a most healthful medicine for sickness, a most sure haven in the troublesome storms of the tempestuous sea of this life.

“What tongue mortal is there then, Oh most holy Love, that can sufficiently praise thy worthiness? Thou most beautiful, most good, most wise, art derived of the unity of heavenly beauty, goodness, and wisdom, and therein dost thou abide, and unto it through it, as in a circle, turnest about. Thou the most sweet bond of the world, a mean betwixt heavenly and earthly things, with a bountiful temper bendest the high virtues<sup>2</sup> to the government of the lower, and turning back the minds of mortal men to their beginning, couplest them with it. Thou with agreement bringest the elements in one, and stirrest nature to bring forth that which ariseth and is born for the succession of the life.<sup>3</sup> Thou bringest severed matters into one, to the unperfect givest perfection, to the unlike likeness, to enmity amity, to the earth fruits, to the sea calmness, to the heaven lively light. Thou art the father of true pleasures, of grace, peace, lowliness, and goodwill, enemy to rude wildness and sluggishness—to be short, the beginning and end of all goodness. And forso much as thou delightest to dwell in the flower of beautiful bodies and beautiful souls, I suppose that thy abiding-place is now here among us, and from above otherwhile showest thyself a little to the eyes and minds of them that be worthy to see thee. Therefore vouchsafe, Lord, to hearken to our prayers, pour thyself into our hearts, and with the brightness of thy most holy fire lighten our darkness, and, like a trusty guide in this blind maze, show us the right way; reform the falsehood of the senses, and after long wandering in vanity give us the right and sound joy. Make us to smell those spiritual savors that relieve the virtues of the understanding, and to hear the heavenly harmony so tunable that no discord of passion take place any more in us. Make us drunken with the bottomless fountain of contentation that always doth delight and never giveth fill, and that giveth a smack<sup>4</sup> of the right bliss unto whoso drinketh of the running and clear water thereof. Purge with the shining beams of thy light our eyes from misty ignorance, that they may no more set by<sup>5</sup> mortal beauty, and well perceive that the things which at the first they thought themselves to see be not indeed, and those that they saw not, to be in effect. Accept our souls that be offered unto thee for a sacrifice. Burn them in the lively flame that wasteth<sup>6</sup> all gross filthiness, that after they be clean sundered from the body they may be coupled with an everlasting and most sweet bond to the heavenly beauty. And we, severed from ourselves, may be changed like right lovers into the beloved, and, after we be drawn from the earth, admitted to the feast of the angels, where, fed with immortal ambrosia and nectar,<sup>7</sup> in the end we may die a most happy and lively death, as in times past died the fathers of old time, whose souls with most fervent zeal of beholding, thou didst hale from the body and coupledst them with God."

When Bembo had hitherto spoken with such vehemency that a man would have thought him, as it were, ravished and beside himself, he stood still without once moving, holding his eyes toward heaven as astonished; when the Lady Emilia,<sup>8</sup> which together with the rest gave most diligent ear to this talk, took him by the plait of his garment and plucking him a little, said: "Take heed, M. Peter, that these thoughts make not your soul also to forsake the body."

"Madam," answered M. Peter, "it should not be the first miracle that love hath wrought in me."

Then the Duchess and all the rest began afresh to be instant<sup>9</sup> upon M. Bembo that he would proceed once more in his talk, and everyone thought he felt in his mind, as it were, a certain sparkle of that godly love that pricked him, and they all coveted to hear farther; but M. Bembo: "My Lords," quoth he, "I have spoken what the holy fury of love hath, unsought for, indited<sup>1</sup> to me; now that, it seemeth, he inspireth me no more, I wot not what to say. And I think verily that Love will not have his secrets discovered any farther, nor that the Courtier should pass the degree that his pleasure is I should show him, and therefore it is not perhaps lawful to speak any more in this matter."

"Surely," quoth the Duchess, "if the not-young Courtier be such a one that he can follow this way which you have showed him, of right he ought to be satisfied with so great a happiness, and not to envy the younger."

Then the Lord Cesar Gonzaga: "The way," quoth he, "that leadeth to this happiness is so steep, in my mind, that I believe it will be much ado to get to it."

The Lord Gaspar said: "I believe it be hard to get up for men, but impossible for women."

The Lady Emilia laughed, and said: "If you fall so often to offend us, I promise you you shall be no more forgiven."

The Lord Gaspar answered: "It is no offense to you in saying that women's souls be not so purged from passions as men's be, nor accustomed in beholdings,<sup>2</sup> as M. Peter hath said is necessary for them to be that will taste of the heavenly love. Therefore it is not read that ever woman hath had this grace; but many men have had it, as Plato, Socrates, Plotinus,<sup>3</sup> and many other, and a number of our holy fathers, as Saint Francis, in whom a fervent spirit of love imprinted the most holy seal of the five wounds.<sup>4</sup> And nothing but the virtue<sup>5</sup> of love could hale up Saint Paul the Apostle to the sight of those secrets which is not lawful for man to speak of; nor show Saint Stephen the heavens open."<sup>6</sup>

Here answered the Lord Julian: "In this point men shall nothing pass women, for Socrates himself doth confess that all the mysteries of love which he knew were oped unto him by a woman, which was Diotima.<sup>7</sup> And the angel that with the fire of love imprinted the five wounds in Saint Francis hath also made some women worthy of the same print in our age. You must remember, moreover, that Saint Mary Magdalen<sup>8</sup> had many faults forgiven her, because she loved much; and perhaps with no less grace than Saint Paul was she many times through angelic love haled up to the third heaven. And many other, as I showed you yesterday more at large, that for love of the name of Christ have not passed upon<sup>9</sup> life, nor feared torments, nor any other kind of death how terrible and cruel ever it were. And they were not, as M. Peter will have his Courtier to be, aged, but soft and tender maidens, and in the age when he saith that sensual love ought to be borne withal<sup>1</sup> in men."

The Lord Gaspar began to prepare himself to speak, but the Duchess: "Of this," quoth she, "let M. Peter be judge, and the matter shall stand to his verdict, whether women be not as meet<sup>2</sup> for heavenly love as men. But because the plead<sup>3</sup> between you may happen be too long, it shall not be amiss to defer it until tomorrow."

"Nay, tonight," quoth the Lord Cesar Gonzaga.

"And how can it be tonight?" quoth the Duchess.

The Lord Cesar answered: "Because it is day already," and showed her the light that began to enter in at the clefts of the windows. Then every man arose upon his feet with much wonder, because they had not thought that the reasonings had lasted longer than the accustomed wont, saving only that they were begun much later, and with their pleasantness had deceived so the lords' minds that they wist<sup>4</sup> not of the going away of the hours. And not one of them felt any heaviness of sleep in his eyes, the which often happeneth when a man is up after his accustomed hour to go to bed. When the windows then were opened on the side of the palace that hath his prospect toward the high top of Mount Catri, they saw already risen in the east a fair morning like unto the color of roses, and all stars voided,<sup>5</sup> saving only the sweet governess of the heaven, Venus, which keepeth the bounds of the night and the day, from which appeared to blow a sweet blast that, filling the air with a biting cold, began to quicken the tunable notes of the pretty birds among the hushing woods of the hills at hand. Whereupon they all, taking their leave with reverence of the Duchess, departed toward their lodgings without torch, the light of the day sufficing.

And as they were now passing out at the great chamber door, the Lord General<sup>6</sup> turned him to the Duchess and said: "Madam, to take up the variance between the Lord Gaspar and the Lord Julian, we will assemble this night with the judge sooner than we did yesterday."

The Lady Emilia answered: "Upon condition that in case my Lord Gaspar will accuse women, and give them, as his wont is, some false report, he will also put us in surety to stand to trial:<sup>7</sup> for I reckon him a wavering starter."<sup>8</sup>

fl. 1566–1573

The poet Isabella Whitney was one of the small number of women in early modern England able to break through the social barriers that inhibited female appearance in print. Making her achievement even more impressive was that she, unlike most of the other women in this volume, apparently started her career not at court but as a maidservant—and, because of slander, she had even been dismissed from that position. That she was the sister of a well-known writer of emblems, Geoffrey Whitney, may have given her entrée to the up-and-coming London printer Richard Jones, who printed a set of her verse epistles on love and inconstancy (The Copy of a Letter, 1567), perhaps to help her with her family finances. In 1573 she followed this initial effort with A Sweet Nosegay or Pleasant Posy: Containing a Hundred and Ten Philosophical Flowers. This work begins with a series of moral adages adapted from Sir Hugh Plat's Flowers of Philosophy (1572). A second section returns to the genre of the epistle, with a collection of letters between family and friends that provide her an opportunity to comment on social and economic problems. The work's third and concluding section is the author's satirical "Will and Testament," included here.

Will and Testament

The author (though loath to leave the city) upon her friend's procurement is constrained to depart, wherefore she feigneth as she would die and maketh her will and testament, as followeth, with large legacies of such goods and riches which she most abundantly hath left behind her, and thereof maketh London sole executor to see her legacies performed.

A communication which the author had to London, before she made her will

The time is come I must depart from thee, ah famous city.
I never yet, to rue my smart,<sup>o</sup> did find that thou hadst pity.
Wherefore small cause there is that I
5 should grieve from thee [to] go.
But many women foolishly, like me, and other mo'e,<sup>o</sup>
Do such a fixèd fancy set on those which least deserve, 10 That long it is ere<sup>o</sup> wit we get, away from them to swerve.<sup>o</sup>
But time with pity oft will tell to those that will her try,
Whether it best be more to mell,<sup>o</sup>
15 or utterly defy.
And now hath time me put in mind
of thy great cruelty,
That never once a help would find
to ease me in distress.
20 Thou never yet wouldst credit give to board me for a year,

Nor with apparel me relieve except thou payèd were.
25 No, no, thou never didst me good,
nor ever wilt, I know;
Yet I am in no angry mood,
but will, or ere I go,
In perfect love and charity
30 my testament here write,
And leave to thee such treasury
as I in it recite.
Now stand aside and give me leave to write my latest will:
And see that none you do deceive
35 of that I leave them till.◊

The manner of her will, and what she left to London and to all those in it at her departing

I whole in body and in mind,
but very weak in purse,
Do make and write my testament
40 for fear it will be worse.
And first I wholly do commend my soul and body eke◊
To God the Father and the Son,
so long as I can speak.
And after speech, my soul to him,
45 and body to the grave,
Till time that all shall rise again,
their judgment for to have.
And then I hope they both shall meet to dwell for aye◊ in joy
50 Whereas◊ I trust to see my friends released from all annoy.

Thus have you heard touching my soul and body what I mean;
I trust you all will witness bear,
55 I have a steadfast brain.
And now let me dispose such things
as I shall leave behind,
That those which shall receive the same may know my willing mind.
60 I first of all to London leave,
because I there was bred,
Brave<sup>o</sup> buildings rare, of churches store,<sup>o</sup> and Paul's to the head.<sup>1</sup>
Between the same, fair streets there be 65 and people goodly store;
Because their keeping craveth<sup>o</sup> cost,
I yet will leave hem<sup>o</sup> more.
First for their food, I butchers leave,
that every day shall kill;
70 By Thames you shall have brewers store,
and bakers at your will.
And such as orders do observe,
and eat fish thrice a week,<sup>2</sup>
I leave two streets full fraught therewith;
75 they need not far to seek.
Watling Street and Canwick Street
I full of woolen leave,
And linen store in Friday Street,
if they me not deceive.
80 And those which are of calling such that costlier they require,
I mercers<sup>3</sup> leave, with silk so rich
as any would desire.
85 In Cheap,<sup>4</sup> of them they store shall find,
and likewise in that street
I goldsmiths leave, with jewels such as are for ladies meet.<sup>o</sup>

And plate<sup>o</sup> to furnish cupboards with full brave there shall you find, 90 With purl<sup>o</sup> of silver and of gold to satisfy your mind.
With hoods, bongraces,<sup>o</sup> hats, or caps,
such store are in that street,
As if on tone side you should miss,
95 the tother<sup>5</sup> serves you feat.<sup>o</sup>
For nets<sup>o</sup> of every kind of sort,
I leave within the pawn,<sup>6</sup>
French ruffs, high purls,<sup>o</sup> gorgets,<sup>o</sup> and sleeves of any kind of lawn.<sup>o</sup> 100 For purse or knives, for comb or glass, or any needful knack,
I by the Stocks<sup>7</sup> have left a boy will ask you what you lack.
I hose do leave in Birchin Lane,
105 of any kind of size,
For women stitched, for men both trunks and those of Gascon guise,<sup>8</sup>
Boots, shoes, or pantables<sup>o</sup> good store,
Saint Martin's hath for you;
110 In Cornwall,<sup>9</sup> there I leave you beds, and all that 'longs<sup>o</sup> thereto.
For women, shall you tailors have:
by Bow,<sup>1</sup> the chiefest dwell;
In every lane you some shall find 115 can do indifferent well.
And for the men, few streets or lanes,
but body-makers<sup>o</sup> be,
And such as make the sweeping cloaks with guards<sup>o</sup> beneath the knee.
120 Artillery<sup>o</sup> at Temple Bar and dagges<sup>o</sup> at Tower Hill;

Swords and bucklers of the best are nigh the Fleet until.<sup>o</sup>
Now when thy folk are fed and clad 125 with such as I have named,
For dainty mouths and stomachs weak some junkets<sup>o</sup> must be framed.
Wherefore I 'pothecaries<sup>2</sup> leave, with banquets in their shop;
130 Physicians also for the sick, diseases for to stop.
Some roisters<sup>o</sup> still must bide in thee and such as cut it out,<sup>o</sup>
That with the guiltless quarrel will,
135 to let their blood about.
For them I cunning surgeons leave,
some plasters<sup>o</sup> to apply,
That ruffians may not still be hanged,
nor quiet persons die.
140 For salt, oatmeal, candles, soap, or what you else do want,
In many places shops are full,
I left you nothing scant.<sup>o</sup>
If they that keep what I you leave
145 ask money, when they sell it,
At Mint there is such store it is impossible to tell it.
At Steelyard<sup>3</sup> store of wines there be,
your dullèd minds to glad,
150 And handsome men that must not wed except they leave their trade.<sup>4</sup>
They oft shall seek for proper girls, and some perhaps shall find
That need compels or lucre lures
155 to satisfy their mind.
And near the same I houses leave for people to repair,<sup>o</sup>

To bathe themselves, so to prevent infection of the air.
160 On Saturdays I wish that those which all the week do drug<sup>o</sup> Shall thither trudge to trim them up on Sundays to look smug.<sup>o</sup>
If any other thing be lacked
165 in thee, I wish them look;
For there it is: I little brought,
but nothing from thee took.
Now for the people in thee left,
I have done as I may,
170 And that the poor, when I am gone,
have cause for me to pray,
I will to prisons portions leave,
what though but very small,
Yet that they may remember me
175 occasion be it shall.
And first the Counter<sup>o</sup> they shall have,
lest they should go to wrack,<sup>o</sup>
Some coppers<sup>o</sup> and some honest men that sergeants<sup>o</sup> draw aback.
180 And such as friends will not them bail, whose coin is very thin,
For them I leave a certain hole,
and little ease within.
The Newgate<sup>o</sup> once a month shall have 185 a sessions<sup>o</sup> for his share, Lest being heaped,<sup>o</sup> infection might procure a further care.
And at those sessions some shall 'scape with burning near the thumb,<sup>o</sup> 190 And afterward to beg their fees<sup>5</sup> till they have got the sum.

And such whose deeds deserveth death,
and twelve<sup>o</sup> have found the same,
They shall be drawn up Holborn Hill
195 to come to further shame.<sup>6</sup>
Well, yet to such I leave a nag shall soon their sorrows cease,
For he shall either break their necks or gallop from the preace.<sup>o</sup> 200 The Fleet<sup>o</sup> not in their circuit is,
yet if I give him nought,
It might procure his curse, ere I unto the ground be brought.
Wherefore I leave some papist old
205 to underprop his roof,
And to the poor within the same,
a box<sup>o</sup> for their behoof.<sup>o</sup>
What makes you standers-by to smile,
and laugh so in your sleeve,
210 I think it is because that I to Ludgate<sup>o</sup> nothing give.
I am not now in case to<sup>o</sup> lie,
here is no place of jest:
I did reserve that for myself,
215 if I my health possessed<sup>o</sup>
And ever came in credit so a debtor for to be,
When days of payment did approach,
I thither meant to flee,
220 To shroud myself amongst the rest that choose to die in debt
Rather than any creditor should money from them get.
Yet 'cause I feel myself so weak
225 that none me credit dare,
I here revoke, and do it leave some bankrupts to his share.°

To all the bookbinders by Paul's,° because I like their art, 230 They every week shall money have when they from books depart.°
Amongst them all my printer must have somewhat to his share;
I will my friends these books to buy
235 of him, with other ware.
For maidens poor, I widowers rich do leave, that oft shall dote
And by that means shall marry them, to set the girls afloat.
240 And wealthy widows will I leave to help young gentlemen,
Which when you° have, in any case be courteous to them then.
And see their plate and jewels eke
245 may not be marred with rust,
Nor let their bags too long be full,
for fear that they do burst.
To every gate under the walls that compass thee about, 250 I fruitwives° leave to entertain such as come in and out.
To Smithfield<sup>7</sup> I must something leave,
my parents there did dwell:
So careless for to be of it,
255 none would accompt° it well.
Wherefore it thrice a week shall have of horse and neat° good store;
And in his spittle° blind and lame to dwell for evermore.
260 And Bedlam° must not be forgot,
for that was oft my walk:

I people there too many leave that out of tune do talk.
At Bridewell<sup>o</sup> there shall beadle be, 265 and matrons that shall still See chalk well-chopped and spinning plied, and turning of the mill.
For such as cannot quiet be,
but strive for house or land,
270 At th'Inns of Court<sup>8</sup> I lawyers leave to take their cause in hand.
And also leave I at each Inn
of Court or Chancery,
Of gentlemen a youthful rout<sup>o</sup>
275 full of activity:
For whom I store of books have left at each bookbinder's stall,
And part of all that London hath to furnish them withal.<sup>o</sup> 280 And when they are with study cloyed, to recreate their mind,
Of tennis courts, of dancing schools,
and fence<sup>o</sup> they store shall find.
And every Sunday at the least
285 I leave, to make them sport,
In divers places players<sup>o</sup> that of wonders shall report.
Now, London, have I (for thy sake), within thee and without,
290 As comes into my memory dispersèd round about Such needful things as they should have here left now unto thee:
When I am gone, with conscience
295 let them dispersèd be.
And though I nothing namèd have to bury me withal,

Consider that above the ground annoyance be I shall<sup>o</sup> 300 And let me have a shrouding sheet to cover me from shame,
And in oblivion bury me
and never more me name.
Ringings<sup>o</sup> nor other ceremonies
305 use you not for cost,<sup>o</sup>
Nor at my burial make no feast, your money were but lost.
Rejoice in God that I am gone out of this vale so vile,
310 And that of each thing left such store as may your wants exile.<sup>9</sup>
I make thee sole executor, because
I loved thee best.
And thee I put in trust to give 315 the goods unto the rest.
Because thou shalt a helper need in this so great a charge,<sup>o</sup>
I wish Good Fortune be thy guide, lest thou shouldst run at large.
320 The happy days and quiet times they both her servants be,
Which well will serve to fetch and bring such things as need<sup>o</sup> to thee.
Wherefore (good London) not refuse 325 for helper her to take:
Thus being weak and weary both,
an end here will I make.
To all that ask what end I made,
and how I went away, 330 Thou answer mayst: "like those which here no longer tarry may."

And unto all that wish me well or rue that I am gone,
Do me commend, and bid them cease
335 my absence for to moan.
And tell them further, if they would my presence still have had,
They should have sought to mend my luck,
which ever was too bad.
340 So fare thou well a thousand times,
God shield thee from thy foe,
And still make thee victorious of those that seek thy woe.
And though I am persuade that I
345 shall never more thee see,
Yet to the last I shall not cease to wish much good to thee.
This twenty of October, I,
in Anno Domini<sup>1</sup> 350 A thousand five hundred seventy-three, as almanacs descry,<sup>o</sup>
Did write this will with mine own hand and it to London gave,
In witness of the standers-by,
355 whose names if you will have,
Paper, Pen, and Standish<sup>o</sup> were at that same present by,
With Time, who promised to reveal,
so fast as she could hie,
360 The same, lest of my nearer kin for any thing should vary:<sup>2</sup>
So finally I make an end, no longer can I tarry.

Women and Power

An act of Parliament in 1544 reaffirmed the long-standing legal prohibition upon the writing of wills by certain groups or classes of people, including persons under the age of twenty-one, idiots, madmen—and wives. Thus for a woman to write her own will, let alone to publish it, was to lay claim to a certain legal, social, and economic independence. Isabella Whitney adopts this stance in order to survey the institutions, occupations, and commodities of London and, in leaving her mock bequests, to articulate a series of sharp criticisms. She writes in the voice of an impoverished gentlewoman who is compelled by her circumstances to leave the city and does so in a mood that mingles regret, complaint, irony, and aggression.

Though Tudor England was a patriarchal society, from 1553 to 1603 it experienced five uninterrupted decades of female rule. What effect did this have on the society's discourse of gender relations? On one level, precious little. Women governed the realm, but Tudor men, with very few exceptions, clung to and reiterated their misogynistic views. None of the royal women introduced in this section showed either an interest in improving the lot of less privileged women in their society or a sense of solidarity with their powerful female peers. Two of them, Mary Tudor and Elizabeth, signed the death warrants of the two others, Jane Grey and Mary Stuart (Queen of Scots). In addition, Mary Tudor probably came close to having her half-sister, Elizabeth, executed, and Mary Stuart plotted her cousin Elizabeth's assassination. These women are fascinating because they found themselves thrust into positions of almost unbelievable complexity, challenge, and danger. That one of them—Elizabeth I—not only flourished but also managed to use to her advantage the fact that she was a woman is one of the age's great stories.

Though public affirmations of male superiority continued, condemnations of the female sex could not, under Elizabeth, be quite so sweeping or absolute as in previous times. When the prominent humanist Sir Thomas Smith thought of how he should describe his country's social order, he declared that "we do reject women, as those whom nature hath made to keep home and to nourish their family and children, and not to meddle with matters abroad, nor to bear office in a city or commonwealth." Then, with a kind of nervous glance over his shoulder, he made an exception of those few in whom "the blood is respected, not the age nor the sex"—for example, the queen.

But even at the top, women could not easily escape being defined by their marital status, sexual behavior, and reproductive potential. Such was the case for Jane Grey, matched to Guildford Dudley as a move in a dangerous political game; for Mary Tudor, with her marriage to a foreign king and her phantom pregnancies; and for Mary Stuart, with her string of disastrous marriages and reputed sexual liaisons. Imagining how the careers of these contemporary women appeared in the eyes of Elizabeth helps explain her choice not to marry.

Before the Reformation, learned and ambitious women had been able, in convents, to gain a modicum of education that offered them scope for both literary expression and the exercise of authority. With the dissolution of the monasteries under Henry VIII, however, that option was closed; and as Protestantism gathered strength, the emphasis on marriage further narrowed for women the possibilities of an independent life. Nonetheless, many Tudor women ran households and businesses; others played prominent roles in city life and were influential in regional politics and church appointments. Though in practice many women had more influence and authority than official doctrine acknowledged, that doctrine affirmed the subordination of women in public, private, economic, and spiritual life. Sermon writers and moralists cited alleged scriptural, medical, moral, historical, and philosophical "proofs" of male superiority and urged women to be chaste, silent, and obedient. At the same time, Protestant insistence on scripture as the crucial guide to faith also placed a sharply increased emphasis on literacy, which contributed, over the course of the sixteenth century, to a gradual increase in the number of women writers. Translation was a field that educated women could enter, as it allowed them to claim to be the mouthpieces of men while giving them a medium for displaying their linguistic and technical skills. The dedicatory matter provided here, in which the translators Anne Cooke Bacon and Mary Tyler address their own “authorship” as well as that of the people they are translating, shows the extent to which women were able to exploit male voices to express their own concerns.

Women in Charge. This engraving is from a 1597 cookbook by Switzerland’s first culinary author, Anna Wecker. Intended for a popular, rather than aristocratic readership, the book provides simple, accessible recipes. Of the two women in this picture, the one on the left, proudly supervising her kitchen, is probably Wecker herself.

Two further dedications join Bacon’s and Tyler’s as early examples of querelles de femme. This French term, meaning “the woman question,” was used of a range of European books written from 1500 onward that discussed women's nature, abilities, and status in society—issues particularly pressing in England with Mary I and then Elizabeth I on the throne. Women who defend their right to authorship are participating in the querelles de femme debate; here two authors of original texts, Anne Dowriche and Jane Anger, explain why they feel they have the ability and right to write for themselves. Anne Dowriche tells her brother that she can pen an epic poem about the French wars because, though she is a woman, her subject justifies the Protestant Reformation; Jane Anger maintains that she can write as she does because she needs to confront the arrogant men who seduce and subjugate women. Anger's furious text is, however, further contradictory, as it is unclear whether it is genuinely by a woman or is by a man adopting an angry woman's voice and stance. In one way or another, the male voice regularly intrudes into the woman's—but, as these examples show, the reverse is also true.

MARY I (MARY TUDOR)

Mary Tudor (1516–1558) was the only surviving child of Henry VIII's first wife, Catherine of Aragon. The king saw his daughter as a useful bargaining chip in international diplomacy—at the age of six she was engaged to be married to her cousin Charles V, the Holy Roman Emperor and England's chief ally against France—but balked at the thought of leaving his kingdom to a female heir. Blaming Catherine for failing to produce a son, he determined to seek a divorce. The pope's refusal to grant it precipitated the Protestant Reformation in England.

In the years immediately following the royal divorce and the break with Rome, Mary had good reason to believe that her life was in danger. When she refused to take the Oaths of Succession and Supremacy (affirming, respectively, the invalidity of her parents' marriage and her father's supreme authority over the English Church), Henry came close to having her arrested for treason. At length, her own Catholic councillors prevailed on her to sign the oaths rather than lose her life. Sparing her no humiliation, the Privy Council insisted that she add a postscript acknowledging that Henry VIII's marriage to her mother had been "incestuous and unlawful," thus effectively declaring herself a bastard. In his will, however, Henry VIII made Mary second in line for the throne, after her younger half-brother, Edward.

Harassed for harboring priests and attending Mass during Edward's reign, Mary very nearly did not survive the attempt, at its end, to establish as successor the Protestant Jane Grey. But when, somewhat surprisingly, Protestants as well as Catholics rallied firmly to Mary's cause, she ascended the throne, and Jane Grey and her supporters went to the scaffold. The early eagerness of Protestants to accept Henry VIII's legitimate heir as their queen, regardless of her religion, diminished sharply when it became clear that Mary intended to marry a foreign ruler, Philip II of Spain. (Eleven years her junior, Philip was the son of her childhood fiancé, Charles V.) Sir Thomas Wyatt, son of the poet of the same name, led an uprising in January 1554 to prevent the match. Urged to flee, Mary instead went to the Guildhall in London and made a forceful speech that garnered popular support.

Wyatt's rebellion was subdued a week later, but there would never thereafter be real peace between Mary and her subjects. Her determination to restore the Catholic religion was probably welcomed by the majority, but there was no hope of avoiding confrontation with committed Protestants, and Mary did not attempt to avoid it. Between the beginning of 1555 and the end of her reign in 1558, she had 283 Protestants, from famous bishops to village zealots, executed for heresy. The immediate popular response of horror and resentment, which would soon solidify into the lurid historical legend of "Bloody Mary," had less to do with the number of executions than with the nature of the charge and with the grisly method employed. In reality both Henry VIII and Elizabeth executed many more people in the course of their reigns than did Mary. But Henry and Elizabeth, who were disposed to treat religious dissent as treason, typically had their victims executed as traitors—that is, hanged or beheaded. The pious Mary attempted to stamp out heresy and had her victims burned at the stake.

Impelled to marry for political reasons, Mary seemed to fall genuinely in love with her husband, who, however, did not reciprocate her feelings. On two occasions in her reign, she believed and announced herself to be pregnant, but both were phantom pregnancies. The melancholy from which she had always suffered intensified in the later years of her reign, when she grappled with bitter disappointments: many of her subjects incorrigibly heretical, her husband aloof and usually absent, her body apparently incapable of childbearing. In 1558 Mary died, leaving the throne to her Protestant half-sister. The two royal half-sisters are buried in a single tomb in Westminster Abbey.

Letter to Henry VIII

To the King's Most Gracious Highness, my father:<sup>1</sup>

Most humbly prostrate before the feet of Your Most Excellent Majesty, your most humble, faithful, and obedient subject, which hath so extremely offended Your Most Gracious Highness that my heavy and fearful heart dare not presume to call you father, ne<sup>2</sup> Your Majesty hath any cause by my deserts, saving the benignity of your most blessed nature doth surmount all evils, offenses, and trespasses, and is ever merciful and ready to accept the penitent calling for grace in any convenient time. Having received this Thursday at night certain letters from Mr. Secretary,<sup>3</sup> as well advising me to make my humble submission immediately to yourself, which because I durst not without your gracious license presume to do before, I lately sent unto him, as signifying that your most merciful heart and fatherly pity had granted me your blessing, with condition that I should persevere in that I had commenced and begun, and that I should not eftsoons<sup>4</sup> offend Your Majesty by the denial or refusal of any such articles and commandments as it may please Your Highness to address unto me for the perfect trial of mine heart and inward affection. For the perfect declaration of the bottom of my heart and stomach,<sup>5</sup> first, I knowledge<sup>6</sup> myself to have most unkindly and unnaturally offended Your Most Excellent Highness, in that I have not submitted myself to your most just and virtuous laws, and for mine offense therein, which I must confess were in me a thousandfold more grievous than they could be in any other living creature, I put myself wholly and entirely to your gracious mercy; at whose hands I cannot receive that punishment for the same<sup>7</sup> that I have deserved. Secondly, to open my heart to Your Grace in these things which I have hitherto refused to condescend<sup>8</sup> unto, and have now written with mine own hand, sending the same to Your Highness herewith; I shall never beseech Your Grace to have pity and compassion of me, if ever you shall perceive that I shall privily or apertly<sup>9</sup> vary or alter from one piece of that I have written and subscribed, or refuse to confirm, ratify, or declare the same where Your Majesty shall appoint me. Thirdly, as I have and shall, knowing your excellent learning, virtue, wisdom, and knowledge, put my soul into your direction, and, by the same, hath and will, in all things, from henceforth direct my conscience, so my body I do wholly commit to your mercy and fatherly pity; desiring no state, no condition, nor no manner degree of living, but such as Your Grace shall appoint unto me; knowledging and confessing that my state cannot be so vile as either the extremity of justice would appoint unto me, or as mine offenses have required and deserved. And whatsoever Your Grace shall command me to do, touching any of these points, either for things past, present, or to come, I shall as gladly do the same, as Your Majesty can command me. Most humbly therefore, beseeching your mercy, most gracious sovereign lord and benign father, to have pity and compassion of your miserable and sorrowful child, and with the abundance of your inestimable goodness so to overcome my iniquity towards God, Your Grace, and your whole realm, as I may feel some sensible<sup>1</sup> token of reconciliation, which, God is my judge, I only desire, without other respect.<sup>2</sup> To Whom I shall daily pray for the preservation of Your Highness, with the Queen's Grace,<sup>3</sup> and that it may please Him to send you issue. From Hunsdon, this Thursday, at 11 of the clock at night.

Your Grace's most humble and obedient daughter and handmaid, Mary

- Note 1:

After the execution of Anne Boleyn on May 19, 1536, Mary thought that she would quickly be restored to her father's favor. Henry, though, persisted in the demand that he had been making of her for several years: that she acknowledge in writing his supremacy over the English Church, as well as the invalidity of his marriage to her mother. In the weeks after Anne's beheading, Mary's continuing refusal to comply with this demand infuriated Henry to the point that he threatened her (not for the first time) with death. Finally, lambasted by Henry's secretary and principal adviser Thomas Cromwell, who had supported her until the king's rage made him fear for his own safety, and urged to submit even by her Spanish allies, Mary yielded, signing the prescribed articles on a Thursday night in June (either the 15th or the 22nd) and writing her father this supplicatory letter (which may have been drafted by Cromwell).

From An Ambassadorial Dispatch to the Holy Roman Emperor, Charles V: The Coronation of Mary I*<sup>1</sup>

Your Highness's own cousin,<sup>2</sup> Queen Mary, now wears the crown of this kingdom. She was crowned on the first day of this month,<sup>3</sup> with the pomp and ceremonies customary here, which are far grander than elsewhere, as I shall briefly show; and according to the rites of the old religion.<sup>4</sup> On the eve of her coronation-day, the queen was removed from the Tower and castle of London to Westminster Palace, where the sovereigns of England are by custom wont to reside in London. She was accompanied by the earls, lords, gentlemen, ambassadors, and officers, all dressed in rich garments. The queen was carried in an open litter covered with brocade. Two coaches followed her: the Lady Elizabeth and the Lady of Cleves<sup>5</sup> rode in one; some of the ladies of the court in the other. The streets were hung with tapestries and strewn with grass and flowers; and many triumphal arches were erected along her way. The next day, coronation-day, the queen went from the Hall of Parliament and Justice to the church,<sup>6</sup> in procession with the bishops and priests in full canonical dress, the streets being again covered with flowers and decked with stuffs.<sup>7</sup> She mounted a scaffolding that was erected at the church for this purpose, and showed herself to the people. The queen's coronation was proclaimed to them and the question asked of them if they were willing to accept her as their queen. All answered: Yes; and the ordinary ceremonies were then gone through, the queen making an offering of silver and silken stuffs. The bishop of Winchester, who officiated, gave her the scepter and the orb, fastened on the spurs, and girt her with the sword; he received the oath, and she was twice anointed and crowned with three crowns. The ceremonies lasted from ten in the morning till five o'clock in the afternoon. She was carried from the church to the Parliament Hall, where a banquet was prepared. The queen sat on a stone chair<sup>8</sup> covered with brocade, which they say was carried off from Scotland in sign of a victory, and was once used by the kings of Scotland at their crowning; she rested her feet upon two of her ladies, which is also a part of the prescribed ceremonial, and ate thus. She was served by the earls and lords, Knights of the Order<sup>9</sup> and officers, each one performing his own special office. The meats<sup>1</sup> were carried by the Knights of the Bath. These knights are made by the kings on the eve of their coronation and at no other time; and their rank is inferior to the other order. The queen instituted twenty fresh ones. They are called Knights of the Bath because they plunge naked into a bath with the king and kiss his shoulder. The queen being a woman, the ceremony was performed for her by the earl of Arundel, her great master of the household. The earl marshal and the lord steward<sup>2</sup> directed the ceremonies mounted on horseback in the great hall. When the banquet was over, an armed knight rode in upon a Spanish horse and flung down his glove,<sup>3</sup> while one of the kings-of-arms<sup>4</sup> challenged anyone who opposed the queen's rights to pick up the glove and fight the champion in single combat. The queen gave him a gold cup, as it is usual to do. Meanwhile the earls, vassals, and councillors paid homage to her, kissing her on the shoulder; and the ceremonies came to an end without any of the interruptions or troubles that were feared on the part of the Lutherans, who would rejoice in upsetting the queen's reign. They were feared especially because of the Lady Elizabeth, who does not feel sincerely the oath she took at the coronation; she has had intelligence with the king of France, which has been discovered.<sup>5</sup> A remedy is to be sought at the convocation of the estates,<sup>6</sup> which is to take place on the fifth of this month: Elizabeth is to be declared a bastard, having been born during the lifetime of Queen Catherine, mother of the queen. The affairs of the kingdom are unsettled because the vassals and people are prone to scandal, and seekers after novelties; they are strange and troublesome folk.

The Oration of Queen Mary in the Guildhall, on the First of February, 1554<sup>1</sup>

I am come unto you in mine own person, to tell you that which already you see and know; that is, how traitorously and rebelliously a number of Kentishmen have assembled themselves against both us and you. Their pretense (as they said at the first) was for a marriage determined for us: to the which, and to all the articles thereof, ye have been made privy. But since,<sup>2</sup> we have caused certain of our Privy Council to go again unto them, and to demand the cause of this their rebellion: and it appeared then unto our said council that the matter of the marriage seemed to be but a Spanish cloak to cover their pretended purpose against our religion; for that<sup>3</sup> they arrogantly and traitorously demanded to have the governance of our person, the keeping of the Tower,<sup>4</sup> and the placing of our councillors.

Now, loving subjects, what I am, ye right well know. I am your queen, to whom at my coronation, when I was wedded to the realm and laws of the same (the spousal ring whereof I have on my finger, which never hitherto was, nor hereafter shall be, left off), you promised your allegiance and obedience unto me. And that I am the right and true inheritor of the crown of this realm of England, I take all Christendom to witness. My father, as ye all know, possessed the same regal state, which now rightly is descended unto me: and to him always ye showed yourselves most faithful and loving subjects; and therefore I doubt not, but ye will show yourselves likewise to me, and that ye will not suffer a vile traitor to have the order and governance of our person, and to occupy our estate,<sup>5</sup> especially being so vile a traitor as Wyatt is; who most certainly, as he hath abused mine ignorant subjects which be on his side, so doth he intend and purpose the destruction of you, and spoil<sup>6</sup> of your goods.

And this I say to you, on the word of a prince: I cannot tell how naturally the mother loveth the child, for I was never the mother of any; but certainly, if a prince and governor may as naturally and earnestly love her subjects, as the mother doth the child, then assure yourselves that I, being your lady and mistress, do as earnestly and as tenderly love and favor you. And I, thus loving you, cannot but think that ye as heartily and faithfully love me; and then I doubt not but we shall give these rebels a short and speedy overthrow.

As concerning the marriage, ye shall understand that I enterprised not the doing thereof without advice, and that by the advice of all our Privy Council, who so considered and weighed the great commodities<sup>7</sup> that might ensue thereof, that they not only thought it very honorable, but also expedient, both for the wealth<sup>8</sup> of our realm and also of all you our subjects. And as touching myself, I assure you, I am not so bent to my will, neither so precise nor affectionate,<sup>9</sup> that either for mine own pleasure I would choose where I lust,<sup>1</sup> or that I am so desirous as needs<sup>2</sup> I would have one. For God, I thank him, to whom be the praise therefore, I have hitherto lived a virgin, and doubt nothing<sup>3</sup> but with God's grace am able so to live still. But if, as my progenitors have done before, it might please God that I might leave some fruit of my body behind me to be your governor, I trust ye would not only rejoice thereat, but also I know it would be to your great comfort. And certainly, if I either did think or know that this marriage were to the hurt of any of you my commons, or to the impeachment<sup>4</sup> of any part or parcel of the royal state of this realm of England, I would never consent thereunto, neither would I ever marry while I lived. And on the word of a queen I promise you that if it shall not probably<sup>5</sup> appear to all the nobility and commons in the high court of Parliament that this marriage shall be for the high benefit and commodity of the whole realm, then I will abstain from marriage while I live.

And now, good subjects, pluck up your hearts, and like true men stand fast against these rebels, both our enemies and yours, and fear them not; for I assure you, I fear them nothing at all. And I will leave with you my Lord Howard and my lord treasurer,<sup>6</sup> who shall be assistants with the mayor for your defense.

- Note 1:
When, in the early months of Mary's reign, it became clear that she intended to marry the heir to the Spanish throne (the future Philip II, son of her cousin Charles V), discontent broke into insurrection. In late January 1554, a sizable army led by the Kentishman Sir Thomas Wyatt II began an advance on London. In the crisis, Mary went to the Guildhall and made this rousing speech to the assembled Londoners. They rallied to her side, and when Wyatt reached the city he found an unreceptive populace. The uprising collapsed, and he and other rebel leaders were executed. The version of Mary's speech given here was printed, with grudging admiration, by the Protestant martyrologist John Foxe, in his Acts and Monuments.

LADY JANE GREY

Jane Grey (1537–1554) was unlucky in her parents, the Duke and Duchess of Suffolk. They were, by her own account, impossible to please, subjecting her to taunts, threats, and physical abuse whenever she made a minor error in performance or deportment. Much worse for Jane, her mother was a granddaughter of Henry VII with a distant but plausible claim to the English throne. This fact, more than any action of her own, determined the course of Jane's life and death.

In 1553 England was ruled in name by the boy-king Edward VI, but in reality by John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland (1504–1553), who as head of state (Lord Protector) stood atop an aggressively Protestant regime. With Edward's health in decline and his Catholic half-sister Mary next in line to the throne, Protestant nobles feared for their future and for England's. For Northumberland, Jane Grey's Protestantism and bloodline offered an elegant solution. At age fifteen, Lady Jane was married to Northumberland's son, Guildford Dudley. Within six weeks of the marriage, Edward VI was dead, having named Jane Grey as his successor. The Privy Council, pressured by Northumberland, denounced Mary Tudor as a bastard and declared Jane queen of England.

Jane's reign lasted a mere nine days, July 9–18. For the first seventy-two hours, there seemed some hope of success; even the hostile ambassadors of Catholic powers were ready to hail Jane as queen. But the nobility and the common people, Protestant as well as Catholic, soon began to shift their allegiance to Mary, who at the time downplayed her religion. Personal connections to Mary's household and local grievances, along with Catholic sympathies, motivated much of the gentry to rally around her. Within weeks Northumberland was defeated, arrested, and executed. Jane, who had briefly reigned from the Tower of London, was now made prisoner there. The victorious Mary initially had no intention of executing Jane or her young husband, who, she recognized, had been no more than pawns in their parents' political games. But in January 1554 the Duke of Suffolk, Jane's father, joined in an ill-fated rebellion intended to reinstate his daughter on the throne. Mary's councillors convinced her that Jane would pose a danger as long as she remained alive. On the morning of February 12, 1554, Jane watched from a Tower window as her husband, Guildford, went to his public execution; within an hour she too had been beheaded, privately, on Tower Green.

Jane Grey was never really a woman in power. Her ability to command her own destiny, let alone that of others, was hardly greater when she was queen of England than when she was prisoner in the Tower. Yet it is clear from her writings and the testimony of others that Jane possessed a firm, even fiery will. In her brief stint as queen, she shocked her controllers by refusing to allow Guildford to take the title of king and rule jointly with her, and again by insisting that Northumberland, rather than her father, Suffolk, should lead her forces against Mary. Her will was harnessed to a militant and unshakable Protestantism; from an early age she mocked Catholic beliefs. In the Tower, where a politic conversion to Catholicism might well have saved her life, she instead wrote a violent and soon public letter to her onetime tutor Thomas Harding, who had converted, lambasting him as a "seed of Satan." Yet far from being an ignorant bigot, Jane was, though dead at sixteen, among the most learned women of her century; she had mastered Latin and Greek and was a student of Hebrew. She rivaled Elizabeth in intellectual brilliance and—to her fatal cost—exceeded her greatly in religious fervor.

[A TALK WITH LADY JANE]

* * * One example whether love or fear doth work more in a child for virtue and learning I will gladly report; which may be heard with some pleasure and followed with more profit. Before I went into Germany,<sup>2</sup> I came to Broadgate in Leicestershire to take my leave of that noble Lady Jane Grey, to whom I was exceeding much beholding. Her parents, the duke and the duchess, with all the household, gentlemen and gentlewomen, were hunting in the park. I found her in her chamber reading Phaedon Platonis<sup>3</sup> in Greek, and that with as much delight as some gentleman would read a merry tale in Boccaccio.<sup>4</sup> After salutation and duty done, with some other talk, I asked her why she would lose<sup>5</sup> such pastime in the park. Smiling she answered me, "Iwis,<sup>6</sup> all their sport in the park is but a shadow to that pleasure that I find in Plato. Alas, good folk, they never felt what true pleasure meant." "And how came you, madam," quoth I, "to this deep knowledge of pleasure, and what did chiefly allure you unto it, seeing not many women, but very few men, have attained thereunto?" "I will tell you," quoth she, "and tell you a truth which perchance ye will marvel at. One of the greatest benefits that ever God gave me is that he sent me so sharp and severe parents and so gentle a schoolmaster. For when I am in presence either of father or mother, whether I speak, keep silence, sit, stand, or go,<sup>7</sup> eat, drink, be merry or sad, be sewing, playing, dancing, or doing anything else, I must do it, as it were, in such weight, measure, and number even so perfectly as God made the world, or else I am so sharply taunted, so cruelly threatened, yea, presently sometimes, with pinches, nips, and bobs,<sup>8</sup> and other ways which I will not name for the honor I bear them,<sup>9</sup> so without measure misordered, that I think myself in hell till time come that I must go to Master Aylmer,<sup>1</sup> who teacheth me so gently, so pleasantly, with such fair allurements to learning, that I think all the time nothing whilst I am with him. And when I am called from him, I fall on weeping, because whatsoever I do else but learning is full of grief, trouble, fear, and whole misliking unto me. And thus my book hath been so much my pleasure, and bringeth daily to me more pleasure and more, that in respect of it all other pleasures in very deed be but trifles and troubles unto me." I remember this talk gladly, both because it is so worthy of memory and because also it was the last talk that ever I had, and the last time that ever I saw, that noble and worthy lady.

From A Letter of the Lady Jane to M. H., Late Chaplain to the Duke of Suffolk, Her Father, and Then Fallen from the Truth of God's Most Holy Word<sup>1</sup>

So oft as I call to mind the dreadful and fearful saying of God, "That he which layeth hold upon the plough, and looketh back, is not meet for the kingdom of heaven,"<sup>2</sup> and, on the other side, the comfortable<sup>3</sup> words of our Savior Christ to all those that, forsaking themselves, do follow him, I cannot but marvel at thee, and lament thy case, which seemed sometime to be the lively member of Christ, but now the deformed imp<sup>4</sup> of the devil; sometime the beautiful temple of God, but now the stinking and filthy kennel of Satan; sometime the unspotted spouse of Christ, but now the unshamefaced paramour of Antichrist; sometime my faithful brother, but now a stranger and apostate; sometime a stout Christian soldier, but now a cowardly runaway. Yea, when I consider these things, I cannot but speak to thee, and cry out upon thee, thou seed of Satan, and not of Judah,<sup>5</sup> whom the devil hath deceived, the world hath beguiled, and the desire of life subverted, and made thee of a Christian an infidel. Wherefore hast thou taken the testament of the Lord in thy mouth? Wherefore hast thou preached the law and the will of God to others? Wherefore hast thou instructed others to be strong in Christ, when thou thyself dost now so shamefully shrink, and so horribly abuse the testament and law of the Lord? when thou thyself preachest not to steal, yet most abominably stealest, not from men but from God, and, committing most heinous sacrilege, robbest Christ thy Lord of his right members, thy body and thy soul, and choosest rather to live miserably with shame to the world, than to die and gloriously with honor to reign with Christ, in whom even in death is life? Why dost thou now show thyself most weak, when indeed thou oughtest to be most strong? The strength of a fort is unknown before the assault: but thou yieldest thy hold before any battery be made.

O wretched and unhappy man, what art thou, but dust and ashes? and wilt thou resist thy maker that fashioned thee and framed thee? Wilt thou now forsake Him that called thee from the custom gathering among the Romish Antichristians,<sup>6</sup> to be an ambassador and messenger of his eternal word? He that first framed thee, and since thy first creation and birth preserved thee, nourished, and kept thee, yea, and inspired thee with the spirit of knowledge (I cannot say of grace), shall he not now possess thee? Darest thou deliver up thyself to another, being not thine own, but his? How canst thou, having knowledge, or how darest thou neglect the law of the Lord and follow the vain traditions of men, and whereas thou hast been a public professor of his name, become now a defacer of his glory? Wilt thou refuse the true God, and worship the invention of man, the golden calf, the whore of Babylon,<sup>7</sup> the Romish religion, the abominable idol, the most wicked Mass? Wilt thou torment again, rend and tear the most precious body of our Savior Christ, with thy bodily and fleshly teeth?<sup>8</sup> Wilt thou take upon thee to offer up any sacrifice unto God for our sins, considering that Christ offered up himself, as Paul saith, upon the cross, a lively sacrifice once for all? Can neither the punishment of the Israelites (which, for their idolatry, they so oft received), nor the terrible threatenings of the prophets, nor the curses of God's own mouth, fear thee to honor any other god than him? Dost thou so regard Him that spared not his dear and only son for thee, so diminishing, yea, utterly extinguishing his glory, that thou wilt attribute the praise and honor due unto him to the idols, "which have mouths and speak not, eyes and see not, ears and hear not";<sup>9</sup> which shall perish with them that made them?

Return, return again into Christ's war, and, as becometh a faithful warrior, put on that armor that St. Paul teacheth to be most necessary for a Christian man.<sup>1</sup> And above all things take to you the shield of faith, and be you provoked by Christ's own example to withstand the devil, to forsake the world, and to become a true and faithful member of his mystical body, who spared not his own body for our sins.

Throw down yourself with the fear of his threatened vengeance for this so great and heinous an offense of apostasy; and comfort yourself, on the other part, with the mercy, blood, and promise of him that is ready to turn unto you whensoever you turn unto him. Disdain not to come again with the lost son,<sup>2</sup> seeing you have so wandered with him. Be not ashamed to turn again with him from the swill of strangers<sup>3</sup> to the delicacies of your most benign and loving Father, acknowledging that you have sinned against heaven and earth: against heaven, by staining the glorious name of God and causing his most sincere and pure word to be evil-spoken-of through you; against earth, by offending so many of your weak brethren, to whom you have been a stumbling-block through your sudden sliding. Be not abashed to come home again with Mary,<sup>4</sup> and weep bitterly with Peter,<sup>5</sup> not only with shedding the tears of your bodily eyes, but also pouring out the streams of your heart—to wash away, out of the sight of God, the filth and mire of your offensive fall. Be not abashed to say with the publican,<sup>6</sup> "Lord be merciful unto me a sinner."

Last of all, let the lively remembrance of the last day<sup>7</sup> be always before your eyes, remembering the terror that such shall be in at that time, with the runagates<sup>8</sup> and fugitives from Christ, which, setting more by the world than by heaven, more by their life than by him that gave them life, did shrink, yea did clean fall away, from him that forsook not them; and, contrariwise, the inestimable joys prepared for them that, fearing no peril nor dreading death, have manfully fought and victoriously triumphed over all power of darkness, over hell, death, and damnation, through their most redoubted<sup>9</sup> captain, Christ, who now stretcheth out his arms to receive you, ready to fall upon your neck and kiss you, and, last of all, to feast you with the dainties and delicacies of his own precious blood: which undoubtedly, if it might stand with his determinate purpose, he would not let<sup>1</sup> to shed again, rather than you should be lost. To whom, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be all honor, praise, and glory everlasting. Amen.

Be constant, be constant; fear not for pain:
Christ hath redeemed thee, and heaven is thy gain.

A Letter of the Lady Jane, Sent unto her Father<sup>1</sup>

Father, although it hath pleased God to hasten my death by you, by whom my life should rather have been lengthened; yet can I so patiently take it, as I yield God more hearty thanks for shortening my woeful days than if all the world had been given into my possession, with life lengthened at my own will. And albeit I am well assured of your impatient dolours, redoubled manifold ways, both in bewailing your own woe and especially, as I hear, my unfortunate state, yet, my dear father (if I may without offense rejoice in my own mishaps), meseems in this I may account myself blessed, that washing my hands with the innocency of my fact,<sup>2</sup> my guiltless blood may cry before the Lord, Mercy, mercy to the innocent! And yet, though I must needs acknowledge that, being constrained and, as you wot well enough, continually assayed,<sup>3</sup> in taking upon me I seemed to consent,<sup>4</sup> and therein grievously offended the queen and her laws: yet do I assuredly trust that this mine offense towards God is so much the less in that, being in so royal estate as I was, mine enforced honor never agreed with mine innocent heart. And thus, good father, I have opened unto you the state wherein I presently stand; whose death at hand, although to you perhaps it may seem right woeful, to me there is nothing that can be more welcome than from this vale of misery to aspire to that heavenly throne of all joy and pleasure with Christ our savior. In whose steadfast faith (if it may be lawful for the daughter so to write to the father) the Lord that hitherto hath strengthened you so continue you that at the last we may meet in heaven with the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.<sup>5</sup>

Written shortly before her execution and later published in Foxe's Acts and Monuments. Lady Jane's father, the Duke of Suffolk, had been pardoned by Mary I for his involvement in the attempt to put Jane on the throne following the death of Edward VI; Jane herself, though remaining in custody, also had good hopes of being pardoned. But when Suffolk joined in the insurrection of January 1554 against Mary, the queen decided that both must die. Suffolk was executed eleven days after his daughter, on February 23.

A Prayer of the Lady Jane<sup>1</sup>

O Lord, thou God and Father of my life, hear me, poor and desolate woman, which flieth unto thee only, in all troubles and miseries. Thou, O Lord, art the only defender and deliverer of those that put their trust in thee: and therefore I, being defiled with sin, encumbered with affliction, unquieted with troubles, wrapped in cares, overwhelmed with miseries, vexed with temptations, and grievously tormented with the long imprisonment of this vile mass of clay, my sinful body, do come unto thee, O merciful Savior, craving thy mercy and help, without the which so little hope of deliverance is left that I may utterly despair of any liberty.

Albeit it is expedient, that, seeing our life standeth upon trying,<sup>2</sup> we should be visited sometime with some adversity, whereby we might both be tried whether we be of thy flock or no, and also know thee and ourselves the better, yet thou, that saidst thou wouldst not suffer us to be tempted above our power,<sup>3</sup> be merciful unto me now, a miserable wretch, I beseech thee; which with Solomon<sup>4</sup> do cry unto thee, humbly desiring thee that I may neither be too much puffed up with prosperity, neither too much pressed down with adversity, lest I, being too full, should deny thee, my God, or being too low brought, should despair and blaspheme thee, my Lord and Savior.

O merciful God, consider my misery, best known unto thee; and be thou now unto me a strong tower of defense, I humbly require<sup>5</sup> thee. Suffer me not to be tempted above my power, but either be thou a deliverer unto me out of this great misery, either<sup>6</sup> else give me grace patiently to bear thy heavy hand and sharp correction. It was thy right hand that delivered the people of Israel out of the hands of Pharaoh, which for the space of four hundred years did oppress them and keep them in bondage. Let it, therefore, likewise seem good to thy fatherly goodness to deliver me, sorrowful wretch

(for whom thy son Christ shed his precious blood on the cross), out of this miserable captivity and bondage wherein I am now.

How long wilt thou be absent? forever? O Lord, hast thou forgotten to be gracious, and hast thou shut up thy loving-kindness in displeasure? Wilt thou be no more entreated? Is thy mercy clean gone forever, and thy promise come utterly to an end for evermore?<sup>7</sup> Why dost thou make so long tarrying? Shall I despair of thy mercy, O God? Far be that from me. I am thy workmanship, created in Christ Jesu: give me grace, therefore, to tarry thy leisure, and patiently to bear thy works; assuredly knowing that as thou canst, so thou wilt deliver me when it shall please thee, nothing doubting or mistrusting thy goodness towards me; for thou knowest better what is good for me than I do: therefore do with me in all things what thou wilt, and plague me what way thou wilt. Only in the meantime, arm me, I beseech thee, with thy armor,<sup>8</sup> that I may stand fast, my loins being girded about with verity, having on the breastplate of righteousness and shod with the shoes prepared by the gospel of peace; above all things, taking to me the shield of faith, wherewith I may be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked, and taking the helmet of salvation and the sword of the spirit, which is thy most holy Word: praying always with all manner of prayer and supplication, that I may refer myself wholly to thy will, abiding thy pleasure and comforting myself in those troubles that it shall please thee to send me; seeing such troubles be profitable for me, and seeing I am assuredly persuaded that it cannot be but well, all that thou doest.

Hear me, O merciful Father, for His sake whom thou wouldst should be a sacrifice for my sins: to whom with thee and the Holy Ghost, be all honor and glory. Amen.

The Lord comfort your grace, and that in his Word, wherein all creatures only are to be comforted. ### The Words and Behavior of the Lady Jane upon the Scaffold

These are the words that the Lady Jane spake upon the scaffold, at the hour of her death. First, when she mounted upon the scaffold, she said to the people standing thereabout, "Good people, I am come hither to die, and by a law I am condemned to the same. The fact<sup>2</sup> against the queen's highness was unlawful, and the consenting thereunto by me; but, touching the procurement and desire thereof by me, or on my behalf, I do wash my hands thereof in innocency before God and the face of you, good Christian people, this day." And therewith she wrung her hands, wherein she had her book.<sup>3</sup> Then said she, "I pray you all, good Christian people, to bear me witness that I die a true Christian woman, and that I do look to be saved by no other mean but only by the mercy of God,<sup>4</sup> in the blood of his only Son Jesus Christ; and I confess that when I did know the word of God I neglected the same, loved myself and the world; and therefore this plague and punishment is happily and worthily happened unto me for my sins; and yet I thank God of his goodness that he hath thus given me a time and respite to repent. And now, good people, while I am alive, I pray you assist me with your prayers."<sup>5</sup> And then, kneeling down, she turned her to Feckenham,<sup>6</sup> saying, "Shall I say this psalm?" And he said, "Yea." Then said she the psalm of Miserere mei Deus<sup>7</sup> in English, in most devout manner, throughout to the end; and then she stood up, and gave her maiden, Mistress Ellen, her gloves and handkerchief, and her book to Master Brydges.<sup>8</sup> And then she untied her gown, and the hangman pressed upon her to help her off with it;<sup>9</sup> but she, desiring him to let her alone, turned towards her two gentlewomen, who helped her off therewith, and also with her frau's paste<sup>1</sup> and neckerchief, giving her a fair handkerchief to knit about her eyes.

Then the hangman kneeled down and asked her forgiveness, whom she forgave most willingly. Then he willed her to stand upon the straw;<sup>2</sup> which doing, she saw the block. Then she said, "I pray you, dispatch me quickly." Then she kneeled down, saying, "Will you take it off before I lay me down?" And the hangman said, "No, madam." Then tied she the kerchief about her eyes, and feeling for the block she said, "What shall I do? Where is it? Where is it?" One of the standers-by guiding her thereunto, she laid her head down upon the block, and then stretched forth her body and said, "Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit";<sup>3</sup> and so finished her life, in the year of our Lord God 1554, the twelfth day of February.

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS

Mary Stuart (1542–1587) was born on December 8, and within a week, following the death of her father, King James V, she had inherited the throne of Scotland. Remembered as the “Queen of Scots,” she spent very few years in Scotland, never spoke its language as easily as French, and was forced to abdicate at the age of twenty-four.

Determined to foil the ambitions of Henry VIII, who sought to force a union between England and Scotland by having Mary married to his son, Edward, Mary’s guardians sent her at the age of five to the court of France, where she would be brought up. At age fifteen she married Francis, the French dauphin, who became king in 1559. A year later, Francis II died, and at eighteen Mary returned to her own kingdom, Scotland, a land she could barely remember. As a Catholic woman coming to rule over a patriarchal society in which militant Protestantism was gathering force, Mary could hardly hope for a unanimously warm welcome. Her subsequent decisions destroyed whatever chance she may have had of enjoying a peaceful reign. In 1565 she married her vain and erratic cousin, Henry Stewart, Lord Darnley (1546–1567), with whom she was soon deeply unhappy. In 1566 Darnley was implicated in the murder of Mary’s secretary, David Rizzio, who was rumored to be her lover. In 1567 Darnley was murdered in turn, certainly with the connivance of the powerful James Hepburn, Earl of Bothwell. Soon Mary was married to Bothwell, though her own will in the matter remains unclear. The scandal of this marriage alienated many of her supporters and helped provoke an uprising of the Scottish nobility. Mary was imprisoned at Lochleven Castle and forced to abdicate in favor of her one-year-old son, James. Though she escaped, she failed to rally the Scottish people to her side, and in 1568 she fled across the border into England, where she appealed for help from her cousin Elizabeth.

The arrival on English soil of the twenty-five-year-old Queen of Scots was not welcome news to the Protestant queen Elizabeth I and her wary advisers. As a descendant of Henry VII with a good claim to the English throne, Mary was seen to be a dangerous and destabilizing presence. She was immediately taken prisoner and remained so until her execution at the age of forty-four. She was tried in England in 1568–69 on the charge of murdering her second husband. At this point her Scottish accuser produced the notorious Casket Letters, which had supposedly been discovered in a silver casket seized from an associate of Bothwell's. The casket, it was said, contained eight letters and twelve sonnets, all in French, testifying (if they are authentic) to an adulterous relationship with Bothwell and, more ambiguously, to Mary's involvement in the murder of Darnley. Mary herself was not permitted to inspect the letters, which were withdrawn shortly after being displayed in court and subsequently disappeared, though not before translations of them had been made into English and Scots. The result of the trial was inconclusive; Elizabeth declared that nothing had been proven that would make her "conceive an evil opinion of her good sister"; yet she kept Mary prisoner, moving her from one place of confinement to another for the next nineteen years.

Mary quickly became the focus for the aspirations of discontented Catholics at home and abroad. She conspired with these adherents by means of secret messages, written in ciphers or in invisible ink on white taffeta, smuggled in and out of her prison hidden in such things as beer barrels. The conspiracies were monitored, and to some extent even engineered, by Elizabeth's spymaster, Francis Walsingham, who was setting a trap for the Queen of Scots and English Catholics generally. In 1586 Mary was found to be communicating with a young Englishman named Anthony Babington, who was plotting to assassinate Elizabeth and place Mary on the throne. Babington and his co-conspirators were drawn and quartered, their heads displayed on Tower Bridge. Though she insisted that, as the sovereign queen of another country, she could not be charged with treason against England's queen, Mary was convicted as a traitor and sentenced to death. Elizabeth vacillated for some time over carrying out the sentence, worrying about the reaction abroad and the precedent involved in executing a monarch. Eventually she was prevailed upon to sign the death warrant, and Mary was beheaded on February 8, 1587. A week later, Elizabeth wrote to the orphaned James VI of Scotland, lamenting the "miserable accident, which far contrary to my meaning hath befallen."

Many of the words that seem to speak to us most eloquently of Mary's self and circumstances are not in fact her own. Throughout her life, Mary encountered no shortage of people—some who were admirers and others deadly foes—who were eager to seize control of her voice. The controversy over the Casket Letters thus crystallizes the more general problem of locating the “real” Mary Stuart. It will probably never be possible to prove whether the letters are products of Mary's own hand or cunning forgeries designed to incriminate her, and indeed it is this impossibility that lends them much of their fascination, opening them up for the endless play of interpretation. Yet if the interpretation of the Casket Letters has become a kind of intellectual game, it began as a matter of life or death. If Mary was in one respect a text with many authors, she was also a singular woman inhabiting a body that, on the orders of another woman, was at last cut in two.

From Casket Letter Number 2<sup>1</sup>

* * * This day I have wrought<sup>2</sup> till two of the clock upon this bracelet, to put the key in the cleft<sup>3</sup> of it, which is tied with two laces. I have had so little time that it is very ill,<sup>4</sup> but I will make a fairer; and in the meantime take heed that none of those that be here do see it: for all the world would know it, for I have made it in haste in their presence. I go to my tedious talk.<sup>5</sup> You make me dissemble so much that I am afraid thereof with horror; and you make me almost to play the part of a traitor. Remember that if it were not for obeying you, I had rather be dead;<sup>6</sup> my heart bleedeth for it. To be short, he will not come<sup>7</sup> but with condition that I shall promise to be with him as heretofore at bed and board,<sup>8</sup> and that I shall forsake him no more; and upon my word<sup>9</sup> he will do whatsoever I will, and will come, but he hath prayed me to tarry till after tomorrow. * * * But now, to make him trust me, I must feign something unto him; and therefore when he desired me to promise that when he should be whole<sup>1</sup> we should make but one bed, I told him (feigning to believe his fair promises) [that if he]<sup>2</sup> did not change his mind between this time and that, I was contented, so as<sup>3</sup> he would say nothing thereof: for (to tell it between us two) the lords wished no ill to him,<sup>4</sup> but did fear lest (considering the threatenings which he made in case we did agree together) he would make them feel the small account<sup>5</sup> they have made of him, and that he would persuade me to pursue some of them; and for this respect should be in jealousy if at one instant,<sup>6</sup> without their knowledge, I did break a game made to the contrary in their presence.<sup>7</sup> And he said unto me, very pleasant and merry, "Think you that they do the more esteem you therefore? But I am glad that you talk to me of the lords. I hear<sup>8</sup> that you desire now that we shall live a happy life—for if it were otherwise, it could not be but greater inconvenience should happen to us both than you think. But I will do now whatsoever you will have me do, and will love all those that you shall love, so as you make them to love me also. For, so as they seek not my life, I love them all equally."

Coded Letter. Mary, Queen of Scots, was such a threat to the throne that she was imprisoned by Queen Elizabeth I for the last nineteen years of her life. During that time, she was involved in several plots to dethrone her cousin. In the secret, coded letter above, she writes about the poor conditions of her captivity and her hopes for release.

Thereupon I have willed this bearer to tell you many pretty<sup>9</sup> things; for I have too much to write, and it is late, and I trust him, upon your word. To be short, he<sup>1</sup> will go anywhere upon my word. Alas! and I never deceived anybody; but I remit<sup>2</sup> myself wholly to your will. And send me word what I shall do, and whatever happen to me, I will obey you. Think also if you will not find some invention more secret, by physic,<sup>3</sup> for he is to take physic at Craigmillar, and the baths also, and shall not come forth of<sup>4</sup> long time. To be short, for that that<sup>5</sup> I can learn, he hath great suspicion, and yet nevertheless trusteth upon my word, but not to tell me as yet anything. Howbeit, if you will that I shall avow<sup>6</sup> him, I will know all of him; but I shall never be willing<sup>7</sup> to beguile one who putteth his trust in me. Nevertheless, you may do all.<sup>8</sup> And do not esteem me the less therefore, for you are the cause thereof; for, for my own revenge, I would not do it.

He giveth me certain charges<sup>9</sup> (and those strong) of that that I fear: even to say that his faults be published, but there be that commit some secret faults and fear not to have them spoken of so loudly, and that there is speech of great and small. And even touching the Lady Reres,<sup>1</sup> he said, "God grant that she serve you to your honor," and that men may not think, nor he neither, that mine own power was not in myself,<sup>2</sup> seeing I did refuse his offers. To conclude, for a surety he mistrusteth us of that that you know,<sup>3</sup> and for his life. But in the end, after I had spoken two or three good words to him, he was very merry and glad. I have not seen him this night, for ending<sup>4</sup> your bracelet; but I can find no clasps for it. It is ready thereunto,<sup>5</sup> and yet I fear lest it should bring you ill hap, or that it should be known if you were hurt.<sup>6</sup> Send me word whether you will have it, and more money,<sup>7</sup> and when I shall return, and how far I may speak. * * *

He hath sent to me, and prayeth me to see him rise tomorrow in the morning early. To be short, this bearer shall declare unto you the rest; and if I shall learn anything, I will make every night a memorial<sup>8</sup> thereof. He shall tell you the cause of my stay.<sup>9</sup> Burn this letter, for it is too dangerous; neither is there anything well said in it, for I think upon nothing but upon grief if you be at Edinburgh.<sup>1</sup>

Now if to please you, my dear life, I spare neither honor, conscience, nor hazard, nor greatness, take it in good part, and not according to the interpretation of your false brother-in-law,<sup>2</sup> to whom I pray you give no credit against the most faithful lover that ever you had, or shall have.

See not also her whose feigned tears you ought not more to regard than the true travails which I endure to deserve her place, for obtaining of which, against my own nature I do betray those that could let<sup>3</sup> me. God forgive me, and give you, my only friend,<sup>4</sup> the good luck and prosperity that your humble and faithful lover doth wish unto you: who hopeth shortly to be another thing unto you, for the reward of my pains. I have not made<sup>5</sup> one word, and it is very late, although I should never be weary in writing to you, yet will I end, after kissing of your hands. Excuse my evil<sup>6</sup> writing, and read it over twice. Excuse also that [I scribbled,<sup>7</sup> for I had yesternight no paper, when I took the paper of a memorial.<sup>8</sup> . . . Remember your friend, and write unto her, and often. Love me al[ways, as I shall do you].<sup>9</sup>

A Letter to Elizabeth I, May 17, 1568<sup>1</sup>

Madam my good sister,<sup>2</sup> I believe you are not ignorant how long certain of my subjects, whom from the least of my kingdom I have raised to be the first, have taken upon themselves to involve me in trouble, and to do what it appears they had in view from the first. You know how they purposed to seize me and the late king my husband, from which attempt it pleased God to protect us, and to permit us to expel them from the country, where, at your request, I again afterwards received them; though, on their return, they committed another crime, that of holding me a prisoner, and killing in my presence a servant of mine, I being at the time in a state of pregnancy.<sup>3</sup> It again pleased God that I should save myself from their hands; and, as above said, I not only pardoned them, but even received them into favor. They, however, not yet satisfied with so many acts of kindness, have, on the contrary, in spite of their promises, devised, favored, subscribed to, and aided in a crime<sup>4</sup> for the purpose of charging it falsely upon me, as I hope fully to make you understand. They have, under this pretence, arrayed themselves against me, accusing me of being ill-advised, and pretending a desire of seeing me delivered from bad counsels, in order to point out to me the things that required reformation. I, feeling myself innocent, and desirous to avoid the shedding of blood, placed myself in their hands, wishing to reform what was amiss.<sup>5</sup> They immediately seized and imprisoned me. When I upbraided them with a breach of their promise, and requested to be informed why I was thus treated, they all absented themselves. I demanded to be heard in council, which was refused me. In short, they have kept me without any servants, except two women, a cook, and a surgeon; and they have threatened to kill me, if I did not sign an abdication of my crown, which the fear of immediate death caused me to do,<sup>6</sup> as I have since proved before the whole of the nobility, of which I hope to afford you evidence.

After this, they again laid hold of me in parliament, without saying why, and without hearing me; forbidding, at the same time, every advocate to plead for me; and, compelling the rest to acquiesce in their unjust usurpation of my rights, they have robbed me of everything I had in the world, not permitting me either to write or to speak, in order that I might not contradict their false inventions.

At last, it pleased God to deliver me,<sup>2</sup> when they thought of putting me to death, that they might make more sure of their power, though I repeatedly offered to answer any thing they had to say to me, and to join them in the punishment of those who should be guilty of any crime. In short, it pleased God to deliver me, to the great content of all my subjects, except Moray, Morton, the Humes, Glencairn, Mar, and Sempill, to whom, after that my whole nobility was come from all parts, I sent to say that, notwithstanding their ingratitude and unjust cruelty employed against me, I was willing to invite them to return to their duty, and to offer them security of their lives and estates, and to hold a parliament for the purpose of reforming every thing. I sent twice. They seized and imprisoned my messengers, and made proclamation, declaring traitors all those who should assist me, and guilty of that odious crime. I demanded that they should name one of them, and I would give him up, and begged them, at the same time, to deliver to me such as should be named to them. They seized upon my officer and my proclamation. I sent to demand a safe-conduct for my Lord Boyd, in order to treat of an accommodation, not wishing, as far as I might be concerned, for any effusion of blood. They refused, saying that those who had not been true to their regent and to my son, whom they denominate king, should leave me and put themselves at their disposal, a thing at which the whole nobility were greatly offended.

Seeing, therefore, that they were only a few individuals, and that my nobility were more attached to me than ever, I was in hope that, in course of time, and under your favor, they would be gradually reduced; and, seeing that they said they would either retake me or all die, I proceeded toward Dumbarton,<sup>8</sup> passing at the distance of two miles from them, my nobility accompanying me, marching in order of battle between them and me; which they seeing, sallied forth, and came to cut off my way and take me. My people seeing this, and moved by that extreme malice of my enemies, with a view to check their progress, encountered them without order, so that, though they were twice their number, their sudden advance caused them so great a disadvantage that God permitted them to be discomfited, and several killed and taken; some of them were cruelly put to death when taken on their retreat. The pursuit was immediately interrupted, in order to take me on my way to Dumbarton; they stationed people in every direction, either to kill or take me. But God through his infinite goodness has preserved me, and I escaped to my Lord Herries's,<sup>9</sup> who, as well as other gentlemen, have come with me into your country,<sup>1</sup> being assured that, hearing the cruelty of my enemies, and how they have treated me, you will, conformably to your kind disposition and the confidence I have in you, not only receive me for the safety of my life but also aid and assist me in my just quarrel; and I shall solicit other princes to do the same. I entreat you to send to fetch me as soon as you possibly can,<sup>2</sup> for I am in a pitiable condition, not only for a queen, but for a gentlewoman; for I have nothing in the world but what I had on my person when I made my escape, traveling across the country the first day, and not having since ever ventured to proceed except in the night, as I hope to declare before you, if it pleases you to have pity, as I trust you will, upon my extreme misfortune; of which I will forbear complaining, in order not to importune you, and pray to God that he may give to you a happy state of health and long life, and to me patience, and that consolation which I expect to receive from you, to whom I present my humble commendations. From Workington, the 17th of May.

Your most faithful and affectionate good sister, and cousin, and escaped prisoner,

- Note 1:
This letter (translated from the French by Agnes Strickland) was written just after Mary, in flight from her Scottish enemies, made her fateful crossing into England. Its account of her troubles is, though not exaggerated, inevitably one-sided. In 1565, Mary's ill-advised marriage to her cousin Lord Darnley had upset the power structure of the nation's factious and violent nobility. A group of nobles rebelled against her, led by Mary's illegitimate half-brother James Stewart, Earl of Moray, who had previously been her key supporter and adviser.

From Narrative of the Execution of the Queen of Scots. In a Letter to the Right Honorable Sir William Cecil<sup>1</sup>

It may please your lordship to be advertised<sup>2</sup> that, according as your honor gave me in command, I have here set down in writing the true order and manner of the execution of the Lady Mary, late queen of Scots, the 8th of February last, in the great hall within the castle of Fotheringhay,<sup>3</sup> together with relation of all such speeches and actions spoken and done by the said queen or any others, and all other circumstances and proceedings concerning the same, from and after the delivery of the said Scottish queen to Thomas Andrews, Esquire, high sheriff for Her Majesty's county of Northampton, unto the end of the said execution: as followeth.

It being certified the 6th of February last to the said queen, by the right honorable the earl of Kent, the earl of Shrewsbury, and also by Sir Amyas Paulet and Sir Drue Drury, her governors,<sup>4</sup> that she was to prepare herself to die the 8th of February next, she seemed not [to] be in any terror, for aught that appeared by any her outward gesture or behavior (other than marveling she should die), but rather with smiling cheer and pleasing countenance digested and accepted the said admonition of preparation to her (as she said) unexpected execution, saying that her death should be welcome unto her, seeing Her Majesty was so resolved, and that that soul were too too far unworthy the fruition of joys of heaven forever, whose body would not in this world be content to endure the stroke of the executioner for a moment. And that spoken, she wept bitterly and became silent.

The said 8th day of February being come, and time and place appointed for the execution, the said queen, being of stature tall, of body corpulent, round-shouldered, her face fat and broad, double-chinned, and hazel-eyed, her borrowed hair auburn, her attire was this. On her head she had a dressing of lawn edged with bone lace,<sup>5</sup> a pomander chain<sup>6</sup> and an Angus Dei about her neck,<sup>7</sup> a crucifix in her hand, a pair of beads at her girdle,<sup>8</sup> with a silver cross at the end of them. A veil of lawn fastened to her caul,<sup>9</sup> bowed out with wire and edged round about with bone lace. Her gown was of black satin painted, with a train and long sleeves to the ground, set with acorn buttons of jet trimmed with pearl, and short sleeves of satin black cut,<sup>1</sup> with a pair of sleeves of purple velvet whole under them. Her kirtle<sup>2</sup> whole, of figured black satin, and her petticoat skirts of crimson velvet, her shoes of Spanish leather with the rough side outward, a pair of green silk garters, her nether stockings<sup>3</sup> worsted colored watchet,<sup>4</sup> clocked<sup>5</sup> with silver, and edged on the tops with silver, and next her leg a pair of jersey<sup>6</sup> hose, white, etc. Thus apparelled, she departed her chamber, and willingly bended her steps towards the place of execution.

As the commissioners and divers other knights were meeting the queen coming forth, one of her servants, called Melvin,<sup>7</sup> kneeling on his knees to his queen and mistress, wringing his hands and shedding tears, used these words unto her: "Ah, Madam, unhappy me: what man on earth was ever before the messenger of so important sorrow and heaviness as I shall be, when I report that my good and gracious queen and mistress is beheaded in England?" This said, tears prevented him of further speaking. Whereupon the said queen, pouring forth her dying tears, thus answered him: "My good servant, cease to lament, for thou hast cause rather to joy than to mourn. For now shalt thou see Mary Stuart's troubles receive their long-expected end and determination. For know (said she), good servant, all the world is but vanity, and subject still to more sorrow than a whole ocean of tears can bewail. But I pray thee (said she), carry this message from me, that I die a true woman to my religion, and like a true queen of Scotland and France. But God forgive them (said she) that have long desired my end and thirsted for my blood, as the hart doth for the water brooks. Oh God (said she), thou that art the author of truth, and truth itself, knowest the inward chamber of my thought, how that I was ever willing that England and Scotland should be united together. Well (said she), commend me to my son, and tell him that I have not done anything prejudicial to the state and kingdom of Scotland"; and so resolving<sup>8</sup> herself again into tears, said, "Good Melvin, farewell"; and with weeping eyes and her cheeks all besprinkled with tears as they were, kissed him, saying once again, "Farewell, good Melvin, and pray for thy mistress and queen."

And then she turned herself unto the lords, and told them she had certain requests to make unto them. One was, for certain money to be paid to Curle, her servant. Sir Amyas Paulet, knowing of that money, answered to this effect, "it should." Next, that her poor servants might have that with quietness<sup>9</sup> which she had given them by her will, and that they might be favorably entreated,<sup>1</sup> and to send them safely into their countries. "To this (said she) I conjure<sup>2</sup> you." Last, that it would please the lords to permit her poor distressed servants to be present about her at her death, that their eyes and hearts may see and witness how patiently their queen and mistress would endure her execution, and so make relation, when they came into their country, that she died a true constant Catholic to her religion. Then the earl of Kent did answer thus: "Madam, that which you have desired cannot conveniently be granted. For if it should, it were to be feared lest some of them, with speeches or other behavior, would both be grievous to Your Grace and troublesome and displeasing to us and our company, whereof we have had some experience. For if such an access might be allowed, they would not stick to put some superstitious trumpery in practice, and if it were but dipping their handkerchiefs in Your Grace's blood, whereof it were very unmeet<sup>3</sup> for us to give allowance."

"My lord," said the queen of Scots, "I will give my word, although it be but dead, that they shall not deserve any blame in any the actions you have named. But alas, poor souls, it would do them good to bid their mistress farewell; and I hope your mistress" (meaning the queen), "being a maiden queen, will vouchsafe in regard of<sup>4</sup> womanhood that I shall have some of my own people about me at my death: and I know Her Majesty hath not given you any such strait<sup>5</sup> charge or commission but that you might grant me a request of far greater courtesy than this is, if I were a woman of far meaner calling<sup>6</sup> than the queen of Scots." And then, perceiving that she could not obtain her request without some difficulty, burst out into tears, saying, "I am cousin to your queen, and descended from the blood royal of Henry the Seventh, and a married queen of France, and an anointed queen of Scotland." Then, upon great consultation had betwixt the two earls and the others in commission, it was granted to her what she instantly<sup>7</sup> before earnestly entreated, and desired her to make choice of six of her best-beloved men and women. Then of her men she chose Melvin, her apothecary, her surgeon, and one old man more;<sup>8</sup> and of her women, those two which did lie in her chamber. Then, with an unappalled countenance, without any terror of the place, the persons, or the preparations, she came out of the entry into the hall, stepped up to the scaffold, being two foot high and twelve foot broad, with rails round about, hanged and covered with black, with a low stool, long fair cushion, and a block covered also with black. The stool brought her, she sat down. The earl of Kent stood on the right hand, the earl of Shrewsbury on the other, other knights and gentlemen stood about the rails. The commission for her execution was read (after silence made) by Mr. Beale, clerk of the council;<sup>9</sup> which done, the people with a loud voice said, "God save the Queen!" During the reading of this commission, the said queen was very silent, listening unto it with so careless a regard as if it had not concerned her at all, nay, rather with so merry and cheerful a countenance as if it had been a pardon from Her Majesty for her life; and withal<sup>1</sup> used such a strangeness in her words as if she had not known any of the assembly, nor had been anything seen<sup>2</sup> in the English tongue.

Then Mr. Doctor Fletcher, dean of Peterborough,<sup>3</sup> standing directly before her without<sup>4</sup> the rails, bending his body with great reverence, uttered the exhortation following:

"Madam, the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty (whom God preserve long to reign over us), having (notwithstanding this preparation for the execution of justice justly to be done upon you for your many trespasses against her sacred person, state, and government) a tender care over your soul, which presently departing out of your body must either be separated in the true faith in Christ or perish forever, doth for Jesus Christ offer unto you the comfortable<sup>5</sup> promises of God, wherein I beseech Your Grace, even in the bowels of Jesus Christ,<sup>6</sup> to consider these three things:

“First, your state past, and transitory glory;

“Secondly, your condition present, of death;

“Thirdly, your estate to come, either in everlasting happiness or perpetual infelicity.

“For the first, let me speak to Your Grace with David the King: Forget, Madam, yourself, and your own people, and your father’s house; forget your natural birth, your regal and princely dignity: so shall the King of Kings have pleasure in your spiritual beauty, etc.<sup>7</sup>

“Madam, even now, Madam, doth God Almighty open you a door into a heavenly kingdom; shut not therefore this passage by the hardening of your heart, and grieve not the Spirit of God, which may seal your hope to a day of redemption.”

The queen three or four times said unto him, “Mr. Dean, trouble not yourself nor me: for know that I am settled in the ancient Catholic and Roman religion, and in defense thereof, by God’s grace, I mind to spend my blood.”

Then said Mr. Dean, “Madam, change your opinion, and repent you of your former wickedness. Settle your faith only upon this ground, that in Christ Jesus you hope to be saved.” She answered again and again, with great earnestness, “Good Mr. Dean, trouble yourself not anymore about this matter, for I was born in this religion, have lived in this religion, and am resolved to die in this religion.”

Then the earls, when they saw how far uncomfortable<sup>8</sup> she was to hear Mr. Dean’s good exhortation, said, “Madam, we will pray for Your Grace with Mr. Dean, that you may have your mind lightened with the true knowledge of God and his word.”

"My lords," answered the queen, "if you will pray with me, I will even from my heart thank you, and think myself greatly favored by you; but to join in prayer with you in your manner, who are not of one<sup>9</sup> religion with me, it were a sin, and I will not."

Then the lords called Mr. Dean again, and bade him say on, or what he thought good else. The dean kneeled and prayed. * * *<sup>1</sup>

All the assembly, save the queen and her servants, said the prayer after Mr. Dean as he spake it, during which prayer the queen sat upon her stool, having her Agnus Dei, crucifix, beads, and an office<sup>2</sup> in Latin. Thus furnished with superstitious trumpery, not regarding what Mr. Dean said, she began very fastly<sup>3</sup> with tears and a loud voice to pray in Latin, and in the midst of her prayers, with overmuch weeping and mourning, slipped off her stool, and kneeling presently said diverse other Latin prayers. Then she rose, and kneeled down again, praying in English for Christ's afflicted church, an end of her troubles, for her son, and for the Queen's Majesty, to God for forgiveness of the sins of them in this island: she forgave her enemies with all her heart, that had long sought her blood. This done, she desired all saints to make intercession for her to the Savior of the World, Jesus Christ. Then she began to kiss her crucifix and to cross herself, saying these words: "Even as thy arms, oh Jesu Christ, were spread here upon the cross, so receive me into the arms of mercy." Then the two executioners kneeled down unto her, desiring her to forgive them her death. She answered, "I forgive you with all my heart. For I hope this death shall give an end to all my troubles." They, with her two women helping, began to disrobe her, and then she laid the crucifix upon the stool. One of the executioners took from her neck the Agnus Dei, and she laid hold of it, saying she would give it to one of her women, and, withal, told the executioner that he should have money for it.<sup>4</sup> Then they took off her chain. She made herself unready<sup>5</sup> with a kind of gladness, and, smiling, putting on a pair of sleeves with her own hands, which the two executioners before had rudely<sup>6</sup> put off, and with such speed as if she had longed to be gone out of the world.

During the disrobing of this queen, she never altered her countenance, but smiling said she never had such grooms before to make her unready, nor ever did put off her clothes before such a company. At length, unattired and unapparelled to her petticoat and kirtle, the two women burst out into a great and pitiful shrieking, crying, and lamentation, crossed themselves, and prayed in Latin. The queen turned towards them: "Ne criez vous; j'ai promis pour vous";<sup>7</sup> and so crossed and kissed them, and bade them pray for her.

Then with a smiling countenance she turned to her menservants, Melvin and the rest, crossed them, bade them fare well, and pray for her to the last.

One of the women having a Corpus Christi cloth,<sup>8</sup> lapped<sup>9</sup> it up three-corner-wise and kissed it, and put it over the face of her queen, and pinned it fast upon the caul of her head. Then the two women departed. The queen kneeled down upon the cushion resolutely, and without any token of fear of death, said aloud in Latin the Psalm "In te, Domine, confido."<sup>1</sup> Then, groping for the block, she laid down her head, putting her chain over her back with both her hands, which, holding there still,<sup>2</sup> had been cut off, had they not been espied.

The Execution of Mary, Queen of Scots. Though this watercolor image was not painted until some years after Mary's execution, it reflects eyewitness accounts. The minister depicted is likely Dr. Richard Fletcher, dean of Peterborough, who was so nervous that he stammered and never actually delivered his sermon because he was interrupted by Mary herself. Mary wears a Corpus Christi cloth around her head as a blindfold. On the stool beside her is a prayer book, and in her hands a crucifix. Her gentlewomen stand weeping to the left of the scaffold, which is covered in black cloth. On the far left of the image is a bonfire, for burning any cloth or other items with Mary's blood on them so that they could not serve as Catholic relics after her death.

Then she laid herself upon the block most quietly, and stretching out her arms and legs cried out: "In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum,"<sup>3</sup> three or four times.

At last, while one of the executioners held her straitly<sup>4</sup> with one of his hands, the other gave two strokes with an axe before he did cut off her head, and yet left a little gristle behind.

She made very small noise, no part stirred from the place where she lay. The executioners lifted up the head, and bade God save the Queen. Then her dressing of lawn fell from her head,<sup>5</sup> which appeared as gray as if she had been threescore and ten years old,<sup>6</sup> polled<sup>7</sup> very short. Her face much altered, her lips stirred up and down almost a quarter of an hour after her head was cut off. Then said Mr. Dean: "So perish all the Queen's enemies!" The earl of Kent came to the dead body, and with a loud voice said, "Such end happen to all the Queen's and Gospel's enemies." One of the executioners, plucking off her garters, espied her little dog, which was crept under her clothes, which would not be gotten forth but with force, and afterwards would not depart from the dead corpse, but came and laid between her head and shoulders: a thing much noted. The dog, imbrued in her blood, was carried away and washed, as all things else were that had any blood, save those things which were burned. The executioners were sent away with money for their fees, not having any one thing that belonged unto her. Afterwards everyone was commanded forth of the hall, saving<sup>8</sup> the sheriff and his men, who carried her up into a great chamber made ready for the surgeons to embalm her; and there she was embalmed.

And thus I hope (my very good lord) I have certifieth Your Honor of all actions, matters, and circumstances as did proceed from her or any other at her death: wherein I dare promise unto your good lordship (if not in some better or worse words than were spoken I am somewhat mistaken), in matter I have not in any whit offended.<sup>9</sup> Howbeit,<sup>1</sup> I will not so justify my duty herein but that<sup>2</sup> many things might well have been omitted, as not worthy noting. Yet because it is your lordship's fault to desire to know all, and so I have certified all, it is an offense pardonable. So, resting at Your Honor's further commandment, I take my leave this 11th of February, 1587.

Your Honor's in all humble service to command,
R. W.

ELIZABETH I

Elizabeth I (1533–1603), queen of England from 1558 to her death, set her mark indelibly on the age that has come to bear her name. Endowed with intelligence, courage, eloquence, and a talent for self-display, she managed to survive and flourish in a world that would easily have crushed a weaker person. Her birth was a disappointment to her father, Henry VIII, who had hoped for a male heir to the throne, and her prospects were further dimmed when her mother, Anne Boleyn, was executed a few years later on charges of adultery and treason. By an act of Parliament she was ruled illegitimate. At six years old, observers noted, Elizabeth had as much gravity as if she had been forty.

Under distinguished tutors, including the Protestant humanist Roger Ascham, the young princess received a rigorous education, with training in classical and modern languages, history, rhetoric, theology, and moral philosophy. Her own religious orientation was also Protestant, which put her in great danger during the reign of her Catholic older half-sister, Mary. Imprisoned in the Tower of London, interrogated and constantly spied upon, Elizabeth steadfastly professed innocence, loyalty, and a pious abhorrence of heresy. Upon Mary's death, she ascended the throne and quickly made clear that the official religion of the land would be Protestantism.

When she came to the throne, at twenty-five, speculation about a suitable match, already widespread, intensified. It remained for decades at a fever pitch, for the stakes were high. If Elizabeth died childless, the Tudor line would come to an end. The nearest heir was her cousin Mary, Queen of Scots, a Catholic whose claim was supported by France and by the papacy, and whose penchant for sexual and political intrigue soon confirmed the worst fears of English Protestants. The obvious way to avert the nightmare was for Elizabeth to marry and produce an heir, and the pressure on her to do so was intense.

Princess Elizabeth. This picture depicts Elizabeth at the age of thirteen, standing by the Old Testament, and holding the New. Designed to show her modesty and piety, it equally broadcasts the fact that she is a woman of learning. The portrait dates from

ca. 1546 and may be by Guillim Scrots, an artist from the Netherlands.

---

More than the royal succession hinged on the question of the queen's marriage; Elizabeth's perceived eligibility was a vital factor in the complex machinations of international diplomacy. A dynastic marriage between the queen of England and a foreign ruler could forge an alliance sufficient to alter the balance of power in Europe. The English court hosted a steady stream of ambassadors from kings and princelings eager to win the hand of the royal maiden, and Elizabeth played her romantic part with exemplary skill, sighing and spinning the negotiations out for months and even years. Most probably, she never meant to marry any of her numerous foreign (and domestic) suitors. "She is determined," a shrewd Spanish observer wrote to his king, at the moment that Elizabeth ascended to the throne, "to be governed by no one." Marriage would have meant the end of her independence as well as the end of the complex diplomatic game by which she played off one power against another. One day she would seem to be on the verge of accepting a proposal; the next, she would vow never to forsake her virginity. "She is a princess," the French ambassador remarked, "who can act any part she pleases." Ultimately she refused all offers and declared repeatedly that she was wedded to her country.

In the face of deep skepticism about the ability of any woman to rule, Elizabeth strategically blended imperiousness with an elaborate cult of love. Quickly making it clear that she would not be a figurehead, she gathered around her an able group of advisers, but she held firmly to the reins of power, subtly manipulating factional disputes, conducting diplomacy, and negotiating with an often contentious Parliament. Her courtiers and advisers, on their knees, approached the queen, glittering in jewels and gorgeous gowns, and addressed her in extravagant terms that conjoined romantic passion and religious veneration. Artists and poets celebrated her in mythological guise—as Diana, the chaste goddess of the moon; Astraea, the goddess of justice; Gloriana, the queen of the fairies.

Though she could suddenly veer, whenever she chose, toward bluntness and anger, Elizabeth often contrived to transform the language of politics into the language of love. "We all loved her," her godson John Harington wrote, "for she said she loved us."

Throughout her life, Elizabeth took pride in her command of languages (she spoke fluent French and Italian and read Latin and Greek) and in her felicity of expression. Her own writing includes carefully crafted letters and speeches on several state occasions; a number of prayers; prose and verse translations, including works of Horace, Seneca, Plutarch, Boethius, Calvin, and the French Protestant Queen Margaret of Navarre; and a few original poems. The original poems known to be hers deal with actual events in her life. They show her to have been an exceptionally agile, poised, and self-conscious writer, a gifted role-player fully in control of the rhetorical as well as political situation in which she found herself. The texts printed here, occasionally altered in light of variant versions, are from Elizabeth I: Collected Works, ed. Leah Marcus, Janel Mueller, and Mary Beth Rose (2000).

- Note 1:

This is the heading given to the verses in John Foxe's Acts and Monuments. After the insurrection of January 1554 against Mary I, Elizabeth was imprisoned in the Tower of London. Extensive interrogation and investigation yielded against her no firm evidence of treason, but she was transferred to the royal manor at Woodstock in Oxfordshire and held there in close custody for a year.

From The Passage of Our Most Dread Sovereign Lady Queen Elizabeth through the City of London to Westminster on the Day before Her Coronation<sup>1</sup>

* * * Her grace, by holding up her hands and merry countenance to such as stood far off, and most tender and gentle language to those that stood nigh to her grace, did declare herself no less thankfully to receive her people's goodwill than they lovingly offered it unto her. To all that wished her grace well she gave hearty thanks, and to such as bade God save her grace she said again,<sup>2</sup> God save them all, and thanked them with all her heart. So that on either side there was nothing but gladness, nothing but prayer, nothing but comfort. The queen's majesty rejoiced marvelously to see it so exceedingly showed toward her grace which all good princes have ever desired: I mean, so earnest love of subjects, so evidently declared even to her grace's own person being carried in the midst of them. The people, again, were wonderfully ravished with welcoming answers and gestures of their princess, like to the which they had before tried at her first coming to the Tower from Hatfield.<sup>3</sup> This her grace's loving behavior, preconceived in the people's heads, upon these considerations was thoroughly confirmed, and indeed implanted a wonderful hope in them touching her worthy government in the rest of her reign. For in all her passage she did not only show her most gracious love toward the people in general, but also privately. If the baser personages had either offered her grace any flowers or such like as a signification of their goodwill, or moved to her any suit, she most gently, to the common rejoicing of all the lookers-on and private comfort of the party, stayed her chariot<sup>4</sup> and heard their requests. So that if a man should say well, he could not better term the City of London that time than a stage wherein was showed the wonderful spectacle of a noble-hearted princess toward her most loving people and the people's exceeding comfort in beholding so worthy a sovereign and hearing so princelike a voice. * * *

Out at the windows and penthouses of every house did hang a number of rich and costly banners and streamers, till her grace came to the upper end of Cheap.<sup>5</sup> And there, by appointment, the right worshipful Master Ranulph Cholmley, recorder<sup>6</sup> of the City, presented to the queen's majesty a purse of crimson satin richly wrought with gold, wherein the City gave unto the queen's majesty a thousand marks<sup>7</sup> in gold, as Master Recorder did declare briefly unto the queen's majesty, whose words tended to this end: that the lord mayor, his brethren, and commonality of the City, to declare their gladness and goodwill towards the queen's majesty, did present her grace with that gold, desiring her grace to continue their good and gracious queen and not to esteem the value of the gift, but the mind of the givers. The queen's majesty with both her hands took the purse and answered to him again marvelous pithily, and so pithily that the standers-by, as they embraced entirely her gracious answer, so they marveled at the couching thereof, which was in words, truly reported these:

I thank my lord mayor, his brethren, and you all. And whereas your request is that I should continue your good lady and queen, be ye ensured that I will be as good unto you as ever queen was to her people. No will in me can lack, neither do I trust shall there lack any power. And persuade yourselves that for the safety and quietness of you all I will not spare, if need be, to spend my blood. God thank you all.

Which answer of so noble an hearted princess, if it moved a marvelous shout and rejoicing, it is nothing to be marveled at, since both the heartiness thereof was so wonderful, and the words so jointly<sup>8</sup> knit.

But because princes be set in their seat by God's appointing and therefore they must first and chiefly tender<sup>9</sup> the glory of Him from whom their glory issueth, it is to be noted in her grace that forsomuch as God hath so wonderfully placed her in the seat of government over this realm, she in all doings doth show herself most mindful of His goodness and mercy showed unto her. And amongst all other, two principal signs thereof were noted in this passage. First in the Tower, where her grace, before she entered her chariot, lifted up her eyes to heaven and said:

O Lord, almighty and everlasting God, I give Thee most hearty thanks that Thou hast been so merciful unto me as to spare me to behold this joyful day. And I acknowledge that Thou hast dealt as wonderfully and as mercifully with me as Thou didst with Thy true and faithful servant Daniel, Thy prophet, whom Thou deliveredst out of the den from the cruelty of the greedy and raging lions.<sup>1</sup> Even so was I overwhelmed and only by Thee delivered. To Thee (therefore) only be thanks, honor, and praise forever, amen.

The second was the receiving of the Bible at the Little Conduit<sup>2</sup> in Cheap. For when her grace had learned that the Bible in English<sup>3</sup> should there be offered, she thanked the City therefor, promised the reading thereof most diligently, and incontinent<sup>4</sup> commanded that it should be brought. At the receipt whereof, how reverently did she with both her hands take it, kiss it, and lay it upon her breast, to the great comfort of the lookers-on! God will undoubtedly preserve so worthy a prince, which at His honor so reverently taketh her beginning. For this saying is true and written in the book of truth: he that first seeketh the kingdom of God shall have all other things cast unto him.<sup>5</sup>

Now, therefore, all English hearts and her natural people must needs praise God's mercy, which hath sent them so worthy a prince, and pray for her grace's long continuance amongst us.

Speech to the House of Commons, January 28, 1563<sup>1</sup>

Williams,<sup>2</sup> I have heard by you the common request of my Commons, which I may well term (methinketh) the whole realm, because they give, as I have heard, in all these matters of Parliament their common consent to such as be here assembled. The weight and greatness of this matter might cause in me, being a woman wanting both wit<sup>3</sup> and memory, some fear to speak and bashfulness besides, a thing appropriate to my sex. But yet the princely seat and kingly throne wherein God (though unworthy) hath constituted me, maketh these two causes to seem little in mine eyes, though grievous perhaps to your ears, and boldeneth me to say somewhat in this matter, which I mean only to touch but not presently to answer. For this so great a demand<sup>4</sup> needeth both great and grave advice. I read of a philosopher whose deeds upon this occasion I remember better than his name<sup>5</sup> who always when he was required to give answer in any hard question of school points would rehearse over his alphabet before he would proceed to any further answer therein, not for that he could not presently have answered, but have his wit the riper and better sharpened to answer the matter withal.<sup>6</sup> If he, a common man, but<sup>7</sup> in matters of school took such delay the better to show his eloquent tale, great cause may justly move me in this, so great a matter touching the benefits of this realm and the safety of you all, to defer mine answer till some other time, wherein I assure you the consideration of my own safety (although I thank you for the great care that you seem to have thereof) shall be little in comparison of that great regard that I mean to have of the safety and surety of you all. And although God of late seemed to touch me rather like one that He chastised than one that He punished, and though death possessed almost every joint of me,<sup>8</sup> so as I wished then that the feeble thread of life, which lasted (methought) all too long, might by Clotho's hand<sup>9</sup> have quietly been cut off, yet desired I not then life (as I have some witnesses here) so much for mine own safety, as for yours. For I know that in exchanging of this reign I should have enjoyed a better reign where residence is perpetual.

There needs no boding of my bane.<sup>1</sup> I know now as well as I did before that I am mortal. I know also that I must seek to discharge myself of that great burden that God hath laid upon me; for of them to whom much is committed, much is required.<sup>2</sup> Think not that I, that in other matters have had convenient<sup>3</sup> care of you all, will in this matter touching the safety of myself and you all be careless. For I know that this matter toucheth me much nearer than it doth you all, who if the worst happen can lose but your bodies. But if I take not that convenient care that it behoveth me to have therein, I hazard to lose both body and soul. And though I am determined in this so great and weighty a matter to defer mine answer till some other time because I will not in so deep a matter wade with so shallow a wit, yet have I thought good to use these few words, as well to show you that I am neither careless nor unmindful of your safety in this case, as I trust you likewise do not forget that by me you were delivered whilst you were hanging on the bough ready to fall into the mud—yea, to be drowned in the dung; neither<sup>4</sup> yet the promise which you have here made concerning your duties and due obedience, wherewith, I assure you, I mean to charge<sup>5</sup> you, as, further, to let you understand that I neither mislike any of your requests herein, nor the great care that you seem to have of the surety and safety of yourselves in this matter.

Lastly, because I will discharge<sup>6</sup> some restless heads in whose brains the needless hammers beat with vain judgment that I should mislike this their petition, I say that of the matter and sum thereof I like and allow very well. As to the circumstances, if any be, I mean upon further advice further to answer. And so I assure you all that though after my death you may have many stepdames, yet shall you never have any a more mother than I mean to be unto you all.

From A Speech to a Joint Delegation of Lords and Commons, November 5, 1566<sup>1</sup>

* * * Was I not born in the realm? Were my parents born in any foreign country? Is there any cause I should alienate myself from being careful over this country? Is not my kingdom here? Whom have I oppressed? Whom have I enriched to others' harm? What turmoil have I made in this commonwealth, that I should be suspected to have no regard to the same? How have I governed since my reign? I will be tried by envy itself.<sup>2</sup> I need not to use many words, for my deeds do try me.

Well, the matter whereof they<sup>3</sup> would have made their petition, as I am informed, consisteth in two points: in my marriage and in the limitation of the succession of the crown, wherein my marriage was first placed as for manner<sup>4</sup> sake. I did send them answer by my Council I would marry, although of mine own disposition I was not inclined thereunto. But that was not accepted nor credited, although spoken by their prince. And yet I used so many words that I could say no more. And were it not now I had spoken those words, I would never speak them again. I will never break the word of a prince spoken in public place, for my honor<sup>5</sup> sake. And therefore I say again I will marry as soon as I can conveniently, if God take not him away with whom I mind to marry, or myself, or else some other great let<sup>6</sup> happen. I can say no more except<sup>7</sup> the party were present. And I hope to have children; otherwise I would never marry. A strange order of petitioners, that will make a request and cannot be otherwise ascertained<sup>8</sup> but by the prince's word, and yet will not believe it when it is spoken! But they, I think, that moveth the same will be as ready to dislike him with whom I shall marry as they are now to move it, and then it will appear they nothing meant it. I thought they would have been rather ready to have given me thanks than to have made any new request for the same. There hath been some that have, ere this, said unto me they never required more than that they might once hear me say I would marry. Well, there was never so great a treason but might be covered under as fair a pretense.

The second point was the limitation of the succession of the crown, wherein was nothing said for my safety, but only for themselves. A strange thing that the foot should direct the head in so weighty a cause, which cause hath been so diligently weighed by us for that<sup>9</sup> it toucheth us more than them. I am sure there was not one of them that ever was a second person,<sup>1</sup> as I have been, and have tasted of the practices against my sister, who I would to God were alive again. I had great occasions to hearken to their motions,<sup>2</sup> of whom some of them are of the Common House. But when friends fall out truth doth appear, according to the old proverb, and were it not for my honor, their knavery should be known. There were occasions in me at that time: I stood in danger of my life, my sister was so incensed against me. I did differ from her in religion and I was sought for divers ways; and so shall never be my successor.

I have conferred before this time with those that are well learned and have asked their opinions touching the limitation of succession, who have been silent—not that by their silence after lawlike manner<sup>3</sup> they have seemed to assent to it, but that indeed they could not tell what to say, considering the great peril to the realm and most danger to myself. But now the matter must needs go trimly and pleasantly, when the bowl runneth all on the one side.<sup>4</sup> And alas, not one amongst them all would answer for us, but all their speeches was for the surety<sup>5</sup> of their country. They would have twelve or fourteen limited in succession, and the mo<sup>6</sup> the better. And those shall be of such uprightness and so divine as in them shall be divinity itself. Kings were wont to honor philosophers, but if I had such<sup>7</sup> I would honor them as angels, that should have such piety in them that they would not seek where they are the second to be the first, and where the third to be the second, and so forth.

It is said I am no divine.<sup>8</sup> Indeed, I studied nothing else but divinity till I came to the crown, and then I gave myself to the study of that which was meet<sup>9</sup> for government, and am not ignorant of stories wherein appeareth what hath fallen out for<sup>1</sup> ambition of kingdoms, as in Spain, Naples, Portingal,<sup>2</sup> and at home. And what cocking<sup>3</sup> hath been between the father and the son for the same! You would have a limitation of succession. Truly if reason did not subdue will in me, I would cause you to deal in it, so pleasant a thing it should be unto me. But I stay<sup>4</sup> it for your benefit; for if you should have liberty to treat of it, there be so many competitors—some kinsfolk, some servants, and some tenants; some would speak for their master, and some for their mistress, and every man for his friend—that it would be an occasion of a greater charge than a subsidy.<sup>5</sup> And if my will did not yield to reason, it should be that thing I would gladly desire, to see you deal in it.

Well, there hath been error—I say not errors, for there were too many in the proceeding in this matter. But we will not judge that these attempts were done of any hatred to our person, but even for lack of good foresight. I do not marvel though Domini Doctores<sup>6</sup> with you, my lords, did so use themselves therein, since after my brother's<sup>7</sup> death they openly preached and set forth that my sister and I were bastards.<sup>8</sup> Well, I wish not the death of any man, but only this I desire: that they which have been the practitioners herein may before their deaths repent the same and show some open confession of their faults, whereby the scabbed<sup>9</sup> sheep may be known from the whole. As for my own part, I care not for death, for all men are mortal; and though I be a woman, yet I have as good a courage answerable to my place as ever my father had. I am your anointed queen. I will never be by violence constrained to do anything. I thank God I am indeed endued with such qualities that if I were turned out of the realm in my petticoat, I were able to live in any place of Christendom.

- Note 1:
The birth on June 19, 1566, of a son—James—to Mary, Queen of Scots, imparted new urgency to the concern about Elizabeth's unmarried state. Mary was Elizabeth's second cousin and, in the absence of any child of Elizabeth's own, had a strong claim to be her heir; Mary's male child would have an even stronger one. On November 5, a delegation of sixty members of the Lords and Commons met with Elizabeth, to urge her to marry and also to establish formally the line of succession. After the meeting, a member of the delegation wrote down Elizabeth's impromptu response.

From A Letter to Mary, Queen of Scots, February 24, 1567<sup>1</sup>

Madame:

My ears have been so deafened and my understanding so grieved and my heart so affrighted to hear the dreadful news of the abominable murder of your mad husband and my killed cousin<sup>2</sup> that I scarcely yet have the wits to write about it. And inasmuch as my nature compels me to take his death in the extreme, he being so close in blood, so it is that I will boldly tell you what I think of it. I cannot dissemble that I am more sorrowful for you than for him. O madame, I would not do the office of faithful cousin or affectionate friend if I studied rather to please your ears than employed myself in preserving your honor. However, I will not at all dissemble what most people are talking about: which is that you will look through your fingers at<sup>3</sup> the revenging of this deed, and that you do not take measures that touch those who have done as you wished, as if the thing had been entrusted in a way that the murderers felt assurance in doing it.<sup>4</sup> Among the thoughts in my heart I beseech you to want no such thought to stick at this point. Through all the dealings of the world I never was in such miserable haste to lodge and have in my heart such a miserable opinion of any prince as this would cause me do. Much less will I have such of her to whom I wish as much good as my heart is able to imagine or as you were able a short while ago to wish. However, I exhort you, I counsel you, and I beseech you to take this thing so much to heart that you will not fear to touch even him whom you have nearest to you<sup>5</sup> if the thing touches him, and that no persuasion will prevent you from making an example out of this to the world: that you are both a noble princess and a loyal wife. I do not write so vehemently out of doubt that I have, but out of the affection that I bear you in particular. For I am not ignorant that you have no wiser counselors than myself. Thus it is that, when

I remember that our Lord had one Judas out of twelve, and I assure myself that there could be no one more loyal than myself, I offer you my affection in place of this prudence.

The Doubt of Future Foes<sup>1</sup>

The doubt<sup>o</sup> of future foes exiles my present joy,
And wit<sup>o</sup> me warns to shun such snares as threatens mine annoy.<sup>2</sup>
For falsehood now doth flow, and subjects' faith doth ebb,<sup>3</sup>
Which should not be, if reason ruled or wisdom weaved the web.
But clouds of toys<sup>o</sup> untried do cloak aspiring minds, 5 Which turns to rain of late repent, by course of changed winds.<sup>4</sup>
The top of hope supposed, the root of rue<sup>o</sup> shall be,
And fruitless all their grafted guile,<sup>5</sup> as shortly you shall see.
Their dazzled eyes with pride, which great ambition blinds,
10 Shall be unsealed<sup>o</sup> by worthy wights<sup>o</sup> whose foresight falsehood finds.
The daughter of debate,<sup>6</sup> that discord aye<sup>o</sup> doth sow,
Shall reap no gain where former rule<sup>7</sup> still<sup>o</sup> peace hath taught to grow.
No foreign banished wight shall anchor in this port:
Our realm brooks no seditious sects—let them elsewhere resort.
15 My rusty sword through rest<sup>8</sup> shall first his edge employ
To poll their tops<sup>9</sup> who seek such change or gape for future joy.

On Monsieur's Departure<sup>1</sup>

I grieve and dare not show my discontent,
I love and yet am forced to seem to hate,
I do, yet dare not say I ever meant,
I seem stark mute but inwardly do prate.<sup>o</sup>
5 I am and not, I freeze and yet am burned,
Since from myself another self I turned.

My care is like my shadow in the sun,
Follows me flying, flies when I pursue it,
Stands and lies by me, doth what I have done.<sup>2</sup>
10 His too familiar care<sup>3</sup> doth make me rue<sup>o</sup> it.
No means I find to rid him from my breast,
Till by the end of things it be suppressed.

Some gentler passion slide into my mind,
For I am soft and made of melting snow;
Or be more cruel, love, and so be kind.
15 Let me or<sup>o</sup> float or sink, be high or low.
Or let me live with some more sweet content,
Or die and so forget what love e'er<sup>o</sup> meant.

A Letter to Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, February 10, 1586<sup>1</sup>

How contemptuously we conceive ourselves to have been used by you, you shall by this bearer<sup>2</sup> understand: whom we have expressly sent unto you to charge you withal. We could never have imagined (had we not seen it fall out<sup>3</sup> in experience) that a man raised up by ourself and extraordinarily favored by us, above any other subject of this land, would have in so contemptible a sort broken our commandment in a cause that so greatly toucheth us in honor. Whereof although you have showed yourself to make but little account in so most undutiful a sort, you may not therefore think that we have so little care of the reparation thereof as we mind to pass so great a wrong in silence unredressed. And therefore our express pleasure and commandment is that, all delays and excuses laid apart, you do presently upon the duty of your allegiance obey and fulfill whatsoever the bearer hereof shall direct you to do in our name.<sup>4</sup> Whereof fail you not, as you will answer the contrary at your uttermost peril.

Leicester (ca. 1532–1588) had been the queen's greatest favorite from the beginning of her reign and was for a time her suitor and possibly lover. Sent to the Netherlands to assist the revolt of the Dutch Protestants against Spanish rule, however, he incurred her rage by accepting, without her permission, the offer of the Dutch to make him their absolute governor. They had been without a leader since the assassination of William of Orange, in 1584, and had offered Elizabeth herself the sovereignty of the United Provinces (which she declined) the preceding summer.

A Letter to Sir Amyas Paulet, August 1586<sup>1</sup>

Amyas, my most careful and faithful servant,

God reward thee treblefold in the double for thy most troublesome charge<sup>2</sup> so well discharged. If you knew, my Amyas, how kindly, besides dutifully, my careful<sup>3</sup> heart accepts your double labors and faithful actions, your wise orders and safe regards performed in so dangerous and crafty<sup>4</sup> a charge, it would ease your troubles' travail and rejoice your heart. In which I charge you to carry this most highest thought: that I cannot balance in any weight of my judgment the value that I prize you at. And suppose no treasure to countervail<sup>5</sup> such a faith, and condemn me in that behalf which I never committed if I reward not such deserts. Yea, let me lack when I have most need if I acknowledge not such a merit with a reward non omnibus datum.<sup>6</sup>

But let your wicked mistress know how, with hearty sorrow, her vile deserts compels these orders; and bid her, from me, ask God forgiveness for her treacherous dealing towards the saver of her life many years, to the intolerable peril of her own.<sup>7</sup> And yet not content with so many forgivenesses, must fall again so horribly, far passing a woman's thought, much more a princess', instead of excusing, whereof not one can serve, it being so plainly confessed by the actors<sup>8</sup> of my guiltless death. Let repentance take place; and let not the fiend possess her so as her best part be lost, which I pray with hands lifted up to Him that may both save and spill,<sup>9</sup> with my loving adieu and prayer for thy long life.

Your most assured and loving sovereign in heart, by good desert induced, Elizabeth Regina.

- Note 1:

Paulet was the keeper of Mary, Queen of Scots. In 1586 a number of her supporters, led by Anthony Babington, plotted to murder Elizabeth and place Mary on the throne. The plot was discovered, and the plotters were executed in September. Mary, who had been complicit with them, was placed under stricter confinement, and then tried for treason.

Elizabeth's letter to Paulet circulated widely in manuscript: to her contemporaries, it was evidently the single best-known of the queen's letters.

A Letter to King James VI of Scotland, February 14, 1587

My dear brother,<sup>1</sup>

I would you knew though not felt the extreme dolor that overwhelms my mind for that miserable accident,<sup>2</sup> which far contrary to my meaning hath befallen. I have now sent this kinsman of mine,<sup>3</sup> whom ere now it hath pleased you to favor, to instruct you truly of that which is too irksome for my pen to tell you. I beseech you that—as God and many more know—how innocent I am in this case, so you will believe me that if I had bid aught I would have bid by it.<sup>4</sup> I am not so base minded that fear of any living creature or prince should make me afraid to do that<sup>5</sup> were just or, done, to deny the same. I am not of so base a lineage nor carry so vile a mind; but as not to disguise fits most a king, so will I never dissemble my actions but cause them show even as I meant them. Thus assuring yourself of me that, as I know this was deserved, yet if I had meant it I would never lay it on others' shoulders, no more will I not damnify<sup>6</sup> myself that thought it not. The circumstance it may please you to have of this bearer. And for your part, think you have not in the world a more loving kinswoman nor a more dear friend than myself, nor any that will watch more carefully to preserve you and your estate.<sup>7</sup> And who shall otherwise persuade you, judge them more partial to others than you. And thus in haste, I leave to trouble you, beseeching God to send you a long reign. The 14 of February, 1587.

Your most assured, loving sister and cousin,
Elizabeth R.<sup>8</sup>

Mary was sentenced to death, and Elizabeth, after much vacillation, signed the warrant for her execution. # Verse Exchange between Elizabeth and Sir Walter Raleigh<sup>1</sup>

[RALEGH TO ELIZABETH]

Fortune hath taken away my love,
My life's joy and my soul's heaven above.
Fortune hath taken thee away, my princess,
My world's joy and my true fantasy's mistress.

5 Fortune hath taken thee away from me;
Fortune hath taken all by taking thee.
Dead to all joys, I only live to woe:
So is Fortune become my fantasy's foe.

10 In vain, my eyes, in vain ye waste your tears;
In vain, my sights,<sup>o</sup> the smoke of my despairs,
In vain you search the earth and heaven above.
In vain you search, for Fortune keeps my love.

15 Then will I leave my love in Fortune's hand;
Then will I leave my love in worldlings' band,<sup>o</sup>
And only love the sorrows due to me—
Sorrow, henceforth, that shall my princess be—

20 And only joy that Fortune conquers kings.
Fortune, that rules the earth and earthly things,
Hath taken my love in spite of virtue's might:
So blind a goddess did never virtue right.

With wisdom's eyes had but blind Fortune seen,
Then had my love, my love forever been.
But love, farewell—though Fortune conquer thee,

No fortune base nor frail shall alter me.

[ELIZABETH TO RALEGH]

Ah, silly Pug,<sup>2</sup> wert thou so sore afraid?
Mourn not, my Wat,<sup>3</sup> nor be thou so dismayed.
It passeth fickle Fortune's power and skill
To force my heart to think thee any ill.
5 No Fortune base, thou sayest, shall alter thee?
And may so blind a witch so conquer me?
No, no, my Pug, though Fortune were not blind,
Assure thyself she could not rule my mind.
Fortune, I know, sometimes doth conquer kings,
10 And rules and reigns on earth and earthly things,
But never think Fortune can bear the sway
If virtue watch, and will her not obey.
Ne<sup>o</sup> chose I thee by fickle Fortune's rede,<sup>o</sup>
Ne she shall force me alter with such speed
15 But if<sup>4</sup> to try this mistress' jest with thee.<sup>5</sup>
Pull up thy heart, suppress thy brackish tears,
Torment thee not, but put away thy fears.
Dead to all joys and living unto woe,
Slain quite by her that ne'er gave wise men blow,
20 Revive again and live without all dread,
The less afraid, the better thou shalt speed.<sup>o</sup>

Speech to the Troops at Tilbury<sup>1</sup>

My loving people, I have been persuaded by some that are careful of<sup>2</sup> my safety, to take heed how I committed myself to armed multitudes, for fear of treachery. But I tell you that I would not desire to live to distrust my faithful and loving people. Let tyrants fear! I have so behaved myself that, under God, I have placed my chiefest strength and safeguard in the loyal hearts and goodwill of my subjects. Wherefore I am come among you at this time but for my recreation and pleasure, being resolved in the midst and heat of the battle to live and die amongst you all,<sup>3</sup> to lay down for my God and for my kingdom and for my people mine honor and my blood even in the dust. I know I have the body but of a weak and feeble woman; but I have the heart and stomach of a king, and of a king of England too<sup>4</sup>—and take foul scorn that Parma<sup>5</sup> or any prince of Europe should dare to invade the borders of my realm. To the which, rather than any dishonor shall grow by me, I myself will venter<sup>6</sup> my royal blood; I myself will be your general, judge, and rewarder of your virtue in the field. I know that already for your forwardness you have deserved rewards and crowns,<sup>7</sup> and I assure you in the word of a prince you shall not fail of them. In the meantime, my lieutenant general<sup>8</sup> shall be in my stead, than whom never prince commanded a more noble or worthy subject; not doubting but by your concord in the camp and valor in the field, and your obedience to myself and my general, we shall shortly have a famous victory over these enemies of my God and of my kingdom.

The “Golden Speech” A speech to Elizabeth’s last Parliament, delivered November 30, 1601, and here given as recorded by one of the members. The designation “Golden Speech” stems from the headnote to a version of the speech printed near the end of the Puritan interregnum (1659?): “This speech ought to be set in letters of gold, that as well the majesty, prudence, and virtue of this royal queen might in general most exquisitely appear, as also that her religious love and tender respect which she particularly and constantly did bear to her Parliament in unfeigned sincerity might (to the shame and perpetual disgrace and infamy of some of her successors) be nobly and truly vindicated.”

The royal prerogatives included the right to grant or sell “letters patent,” which gave the recipient monopoly control of some branch of commerce. (Sir Walter Raleigh, for example, was given the exclusive right, for a period of thirty years, to license all taverns.) Discontent with the monopolies—which had resulted in higher prices for a wide range of commodities, including such basic ones as salt and starch—came to a head in the Parliament of 1601. Under parliamentary pressure (and in return for a subsidy granted to her treasury), Elizabeth agreed to revoke some of the most obnoxious patents and to allow the courts to rule freely on charges brought against the holders of others. She invited members of Parliament who wished to offer thanks for this largesse to come to her in a body, and on November 30 received about 150 of them at Whitehall Palace. After effusive remarks by the speaker of the House of Commons (Sir John Croke), the queen responded more or less as recorded here. (Elizabeth revised the speech for publication; and none of the surviving versions of it—which differ considerably—was printed earlier than about 1628.)

The "Golden Speech"<sup>1</sup>

Mr. Speaker, we have heard your declaration and perceive your care of our estate,<sup>2</sup> by falling into the consideration of a grateful acknowledgment of such benefits as you have received; and that your coming is to present thanks unto us, which I accept with no less joy than your loves can have desire to offer such a present.

I do assure you that there is no prince that loveth his subjects better, or whose love can countervail<sup>3</sup> our loves. There is no jewel, be it of never so rich a price, which I set before this jewel—I mean your loves. For I do more esteem it than any treasure or riches: for that we know how to prize, but love and thanks I count unvaluable.<sup>4</sup> And though God hath raised me high, yet this I count the glory of my crown, that I have reigned with your loves. This makes me that I do not so much rejoice that God hath made me to be a queen, as to be a queen over so thankful a people. Therefore I have cause to wish nothing more than to content the subjects, and that is a duty which I owe. Neither do I desire to live longer days than that I may see your prosperity, and that is my only desire. And as I am that person that still,<sup>5</sup> yet under God, hath delivered you, so I trust, by the almighty power of God, that I shall be His instrument to preserve you from envy, peril, dishonor, shame, tyranny, and oppression, partly by means of your intended helps, which we take very acceptable because it manifesteth the largeness of your loves and loyalties unto your sovereign.

Of myself I must say this: I never was any greedy, scraping grasper, nor a strait, fast-holding prince, nor yet a waster. My heart was never set on worldly goods, but only for my subjects' good. What you bestow on me, I will not hoard it up, but receive it to bestow on you again. Yea, my own properties I account yours to be expended for your good, and your eyes shall see the bestowing of all for your good. Therefore render unto them from me, I beseech you,

Mr. Speaker, such thanks as you imagine my heart yieldeth but my tongue cannot express.

Mr. Speaker, I would wish you and the rest to stand up, for I shall yet trouble you with longer speech.<sup>6</sup>

Mr. Speaker, you give me thanks, but I doubt<sup>7</sup> me that I have more cause to thank you all than you me; and I charge you to thank them of the Lower House<sup>8</sup> from me. For had I not received a knowledge from you, I might have fallen into the lapse of an error only for lack of true information.

Since I was queen yet did I never put my pen to any grant but that upon pretext and semblance made unto me, it was both good and beneficial to the subject in general, though a private profit to some of my ancient servants who had deserved well. But the contrary being found by experience, I am exceedingly beholding to such subjects as would move the same at the first.<sup>9</sup> And I am not so simple to suppose but that there be some of the Lower House whom these grievances never touched; and for them I think they speak out of zeal to their countries<sup>1</sup> and not out of spleen or malevolent affection, as being parties grieved. And I take it exceedingly gratefully from them, because it gives us to know that no respects or interests had moved them other than the minds they bear to suffer<sup>2</sup> no diminution of our honor and our subjects' love unto us, the zeal of which affection, tending to ease my people and knit their hearts unto me, I embrace with a princely care.

For above all earthly treasures I esteem my people's love, more than which I desire not to merit. That my grants should be grievous to my people and oppressions to be privileged under color<sup>3</sup> of our patents, our kingly dignity shall not suffer it. Yea, when I heard it I could give no rest unto my thoughts until I had reformed it.<sup>4</sup> Shall they (think you) escape unpunished that have thus oppressed you and have been disrespectful of their duty and regardless of our honor? No, no, Mr. Speaker, I assure you were it not more for conscience' sake than for any glory or increase of love that I desire, these errors, troubles, vexations, and oppressions done by these varlets and low persons (not worthy the name of subjects) should not escape without condign punishment. But I perceive they dealt with me like physicians who, ministering a drug, make it more acceptable by giving it a good aromatical savor; or when they give pills, do gild them all over.

I have ever used<sup>5</sup> to set the Last Judgment Day before my eyes and so to rule as I shall be judged, to answer before a higher Judge. To whose judgment seat I do appeal that never thought was cherished in my heart that tended not unto my people's good. And now if my kingly bounties have been abused and my grants turned to the hurts of my people, contrary to my will and meaning, or if any in authority under me have neglected or perverted what I have committed to them, I hope God will not lay their culps<sup>6</sup> and offenses to my charge. Who, though there were danger in repealing our grants, yet what danger would I not rather incur for your good than I would suffer them still to continue?

I know the title of a king is a glorious title, but assure yourself that the shining glory of princely authority hath not so dazzled the eyes of our understanding but that we well know and remember that we also are to yield an account of our actions before the great Judge. To be a king and wear a crown is more glorious to them that see it than it is pleasant to them that bear it. For myself, I was never so much enticed with the glorious name of a king or royal authority of a queen as delighted that God hath made me His instrument to maintain His truth and glory, and to defend this kingdom (as I said) from peril, dishonor, tyranny, and oppression.

There will never queen sit in my seat with more zeal to my country, care to my subjects, and that will sooner with willingness venture her life for your good and safety, than myself. For it is not my desire to live nor reign longer than my life and reign shall be for your good. And though you have had and may have many princes more mighty and wise sitting in this seat, yet you never had or shall have any that will be more careful and loving.

Shall I ascribe anything to myself and my sexly<sup>7</sup> weakness? I were not worthy to live then, and of all most unworthy of the mercies I have had from God, who hath ever yet given me a heart which yet never feared any foreign or home enemy. I speak it to give God the praise as a testimony before you, and not to attribute anything unto myself. For I, O Lord, what am I, whom practices and perils past should not fear?<sup>8</sup> O, what can I do, that I should speak for any glory? God forbid!

This, Mr. Speaker, I pray you deliver unto the House, to whom heartily recommend me. And so I commit you all to your best fortunes and further counsels. And I pray you, Mr. Comptroller, Mr. Secretary,<sup>9</sup> and you of my council, that before these gentlemen depart into their countries,<sup>1</sup> you bring them all to kiss my hand.

ANNE COOKE BACON

Anne Cooke Bacon (ca. 1527–1610) here introduces her translation of the sermons of Bernadino Ochino from Italian to English. In this pointed dedication to her mother, who had clearly argued that learning Italian would not help God's cause, she notes that learning the language has enabled her to translate these holy texts. Thus this short epistle shows defiance in its reverence. Ochino (1487–1564) was a Catholic turned Protestant reformer and Calvinist; through his works Bacon, here at the age of twenty-two, first broadcast her own as well as his powerful Protestant beliefs. This translation paved the way for her later translation of Jewel's Apology, included earlier in this volume.

To the Right Worshipful and Worthily Beloved Mother, the Lady F., Her Humble Daughter Wisheth Increase of Spiritual Knowledge, with Full Fruition of the Fruits Thereof

Since the original of whatsoever is or may be converted to any good use in me hath freely proceeded—though as the minister of God—of your ladyship's mere careful and motherly goodness, as well in procuring<sup>1</sup> all things thereunto belonging, as in your many and most Godly exhortations (wherein among the rest it hath pleased you, often, to reprove my vain study in the Italian tongue, accounting the seed thereof to have been sown in baren, unfruitful ground, since God thereby is no whit magnified), I have at the last perceived it my duty to prove how much the understanding of your will could work in me towards the accomplishing of the same. And—for that I have well known your chief delight to rest in the destroying of man his glory, and exalting wholly the glory of God, which may not be unless we acknowledge that He doth foresee and determine, from without beginning, all things, and cannot alter or reward after our deserved works, but remain steadfast, according to his immutable will—I have taken in hand to dedicate unto your Ladyship this small number of sermons for the excellent fruit sake in them contained, proceeding from the happy spirit of the sanctified Barnardine, which treat of the election and predestination of God, with the rest (although not of the self-title) appertaining to the same effect, to the end it might appear that your so many worthy sentences touching the same have not utterly been without some note in my weak memory. And albeit they be not done<sup>2</sup> in such perfection as the dignity of the matter doth require, yet I trust and know ye will accept the humble will of the presenter, not weighing so much the excellency of the translation —although of right it ought to be such as should not by the grossness<sup>3</sup> thereof deprive the author of his worthiness. But not meaning to take upon me the reach to his high style of theology, and fearing also, lest in enterprising<sup>4</sup> to set forth the brightness of his eloquence I should manifest myself unapt to attain unto the lowest degree thereof, I descend therefore, to the understanding of mine own debility, only requiring that it may please your ladyship to vouchsafe<sup>5</sup> that this my small labor may be allowed at your hands, under whose protection only it is committed, with humble reverence, as yielding some part of the fruit of your motherly admonitions in this my willing service.

Your ladyship's daughter most boundenly<sup>6</sup> obedient. A.C.

MARGARET TYLER

The background of Margaret Tyler (ca. 1540–ca. 1590), translator of Spanish, is unknown. As she dedicates this, her only known printed work, to Lord Thomas Howard, it is assumed she was a servant to his aristocratic family. Her Mirror of Princely Deeds is a translation of book 1 of Diego Ortúñez de Calahorra, Espejo de Príncipes y Cavalleros (1555), a racy romance featuring sorcerers, magic, courageous deeds, and hopeless love; it was regularly reprinted and became a source and model for subsequent English romances. Tyler seems, from the confident dedication supplied here, to have been of mature age when her text, the first romance from a woman's pen in English, came out. She offers here an impassioned defense of women's right to translate stories in addition to pious works, stating that if a woman is allowed to read a story, and be its dedicatee, she should be allowed to translate one too.

To the Reader

Thou hast here, gentle Reader, the history of Trebatio, an Emperor in Greece, whether a true history of him indeed, or a feigned fable, I wot not,<sup>1</sup> neither did I greatly seek after it in the translation, but by me it is done into English for thy profit and delight. The chief matter therein contained is of exploits of wars, and the parties therein named are especially renowned for their magnanimity and courage. The author's purpose appeareth to be this: to animate thereby, and to set on fire, the lusty<sup>2</sup> courages of young gentlemen to the advancement of their line by ensuing<sup>3</sup> suchlike steps. The first tongue wherein it was penned was the Spanish (in which nation, by common report, the inheritance of all worldly commendation hath to this day rested); the whole discourse in respect of the end not unnecessary, for the variety and continual shift of fresh matter very delightful, in the speeches short and sweet, wise in sentence, and wary in the provision of contrary accidents.<sup>4</sup> For I take the grace thereof to be rather in the reporter's device than in the truth of this report, as I would that I could so well impart with thee that delight which myself findeth in reading the Spanish: but seldom is the tale carried clean<sup>5</sup> from another's mouth.

Such delivery<sup>6</sup> as I have made, I hope thou wilt friendly accept, the rather for that it is a woman's work, though<sup>7</sup> in a story profane and a matter more manlike than becometh my sex. But as for the manliness of the matter, thou knowest that it is not necessary for every trumpeter or drumsler<sup>8</sup> in the war to be a good fighter. They take wage only to incite others, though themselves have privy maims and are thereby recureless.<sup>9</sup> So, gentle reader, if my travail in Englishing this author may bring thee to a liking of the virtues herein commended, and by example thereof in thy princes and country's quarrel to hazard thy person and purchase good name, as for<sup>1</sup> hope of well deserving myself that way, I neither bend myself thereto, nor yet fear the speech of people if I be found backward.<sup>2</sup> I trust every man holds not the plough which would<sup>3</sup> the ground were tilled, and it is no sin to talk of Robin Hood, though you never shot in<sup>4</sup> his bow. * * * The invention, disposition, trimming, and what else<sup>5</sup> in this story, is wholly another man's, my part none therein but the translation, as it were only in giving entertainment to a stranger before this time unacquainted with our country guise.<sup>6</sup> Marry, the worst perhaps is this: that among so many strangers<sup>7</sup> as daily come over, some more ancient, and some but new set forth, some penning matters of great weight and sadness in divinity or other studies (the profession whereof more nearly beseemeth<sup>8</sup> my years), other some discoursing of matters more easy and ordinary in common talk wherein a gentlewoman may honestly employ her travail, I have notwithstanding made countenance only to<sup>9</sup> this gentleman, whom neither his personage might sufficiently commend itself unto my sex, nor his behavior (being light and soldierlike) might in good order acquaint itself<sup>1</sup> with my years.

So the question now ariseth of my choice, not of my labor, wherefore<sup>2</sup> I preferred this story before matter of more importance. For answer whereto, gentle reader, the truth is that as the first motion to<sup>3</sup> this kind of labor came not from myself, so was this piece of work put upon me by others, and they which first counselled me to fall to work took upon them also to be my taskmasters and overseers lest I should be idle. And yet because the refusal was in my power, I must stand<sup>4</sup> to answer for my easy yielding, and may not be unprovided of excuse, wherein if I should allege for myself that matters of less worthiness by as aged years have been taken in hand, and that daily new devices<sup>5</sup> are published, in songs, sonnets, interludes, and other discourses, and yet are borne out<sup>6</sup> without reproach only to please the humor of some men, I think I should make no good plea therein; for besides that I should find thereby so many known enemies as known men have been authors of such idle conceits, yet would my other adversaries be never the rather quieted. For they would say that as well the one as the other were all naught, and though peradventure<sup>7</sup> I might passe unknown amongst a multitude, and not be the only gaze or odd party in my ill<sup>8</sup> doing, yet because there is less merit of pardon if the fault be excused as common, I will not make that my defense which cannot help me, and doth hinder other men. But my defense is by example of the best, amongst which many have dedicated their labors, some stories, some of war, some physic, some law, some as concerning government, some divine matters, unto diverse<sup>9</sup> ladies and gentlewomen. And if men may and do bestow such of their travails upon gentlewomen, then may we women read such of their works as they dedicate unto us, and if we may read them, why not farther wade in them to the search of a truth? And then, much more, why not deal by translation in such arguments, especially this kind of exercise, being a matter of more heed than of deep invention or exquisite<sup>1</sup> learning? And they must needs leave this as confessed: that in their dedications they mind<sup>2</sup> not only to borrow names of worthy personages, but the testimonies also for their further credit, which neither the one may demand without ambition, nor the other grant without over-lightness. If women be excluded from the view of such works as appear in their name, or if glory only be sought in our common inscriptions, it mattereth not whether the parties be men or women, whether alive or dead. But to return, whatsoever<sup>3</sup> the truth is, whether that women may not at all discourse in learning (for men lay in<sup>4</sup> their claim to be sole possessioners of knowledge), or whether they may in some manner, that is by limitation or appointment in some kind of learning, my persuasion hath been thus, that it is all one<sup>5</sup> for a woman to pen a story, as for a man to address his story to a woman. But amongst all my ill-willers, some I hope are not so straight<sup>6</sup> that they would enforce me necessarily either not to write or to write of divinity. Whereas neither durst I trust mine own judgment sufficiently, if matter of controversy were handled, nor yet could I find any book in the tongue which would not breed offence to some, but I perceive some may be rather angry to see their Spanish delight turned to an English pastime:<sup>7</sup> they could well allow the story in Spanish, but they may not afford it so cheap, or they would have it proper<sup>8</sup> to themselves. What natures such men be of, I list<sup>9</sup> not greatly dispute, but my meaning hath been to make other partners of my liking, as I doubt not, gentle reader, but if it shall please thee—after serious matters—to sport thyself<sup>1</sup> with this Spaniard, that thou shalt find in him the just reward of malice and cowardice, with the good speed<sup>2</sup> of honesty and courage, being able to furnish thee with sufficient store<sup>3</sup> of foreign example to both purposes. And as in such matters which have been rather devised to beguile time than to breed matter of sad<sup>4</sup> learning, he hath ever borne away the prize which could season such delights with some profitable reading, so shalt thou have this stranger an honest man when need serveth, and at other times either a good companion to drive out a weary night or a merry jest at thy board.<sup>5</sup>

And thus much concerning this present story: that it is neither unseemly for a woman to deal in, neither greatly requiring a less staid age than mine is. But of these two points gentle reader, I thought to give thee warning, lest perhaps understanding of my name and years, thou mightest be carried into a wrong suspect of my boldness and rashness, from which I would gladly free myself by this plain excuse; and if I may deserve thy good favor by like labor, when the choice is mine own, I will have a special regard<sup>6</sup> of thy liking. So I wish thee well.

Thine to use, M[argaret]. T[yler].

ANNE DOWRICHE

Anne Dowriche (1560–after 1613) was a Puritan poet and historian who was married to a minister, Hugh Dowriche, a rector in Honiton, Devon. Her long narrative poem, The French Historie, published in 1589, told in gruesome detail the story of the recent French wars of religion—her attempt to justify the Protestant Reformation and vilify Catholicism. The dedication, addressed to her much older brother, Sir Pearse Edgecombe (1536–1607/8), details her joy in writing the poem and expresses the hope that its content will make her work acceptable to him. While she seemingly dismisses her own style and writing ability, the length (2,400 lines) and gore of the text point to her boldness.

To the Right Worshipful Her Loving Brother, Master Pearse Edgecombe of Mount Edgecombe in Devon Esquire, Mercy and Peace from Jesus Christ

Right worshipful and my loving brother, I have heard it often and truly reported that laws may be broken but nature cannot be forgotten. I find the force of this in myself: if I find not the like in you, I blame not your nature, but the contrary crossings of those politic affections that hinder the working of it. When I had ended this present pamphlet, I saw that the simplicity<sup>1</sup> of it required a patron, and the often remembrance of your former courtesies enforced me to make bold<sup>2</sup> with you. Consider not therefore the worthiness of the work, but rather the will of the worker: for though the one may justly be condemned, yet the other deserves to be accepted. This book which proceeds under your protection, if you consider the matter, I assure you it is most excellent and well worth the reading; but if you weigh the manner, I confess it is base and scarce worth the seeing. This is therefore my desire: that the simple attire of this outward form may not discourage you from seeking the comfortable<sup>3</sup> taste of the inward substance. You shall find here many things for comfort worthy the considering, and for policy the observing. This hath been my ordinary exercise for recreation at times of leisure for a long space<sup>4</sup> together. If I were sure that you would but take half so much pleasure in reading it as I have in collecting and disposing<sup>5</sup> it, I should not need any farther to commend it. If you find anything that fits not your liking, remember, I pray, that it is a woman's doing. The thing itself will sufficiently prove this to be true. Thus, committing the patronage of this my recreation unto your protection, and you with my good sister-in-law your wife, and all your children to the Lord's tuition,<sup>6</sup> I cease to trouble you.

Honiton, the 25 day of July 1589
Your loving sister Anne Dowriche

JANE ANGER

Jane Anger her Protection for women. To defend them against the scandalous reports of a late surfeiting lover, and all other like Venerians that complain so to be overcloyed with women's kindness (1589) announces its content in its title. It was written as a response to a contemporary pamphlet now lost, Thomas Orwin's Surfeit in Love, with a farwel to the folies of his own fantasy (1588)—an attack on women. How we assess Anger's work depends on whether it is taken to be a defense of women by an actual woman or an experiment in arguing the women's cause written by a man. In the period, the nature of women (known as the querelle des femmes, the "woman question") was often discussed as an intellectual debate, with arguments put forward in favor of or against women, their natures, and their rights. This contribution to the querelle may be a powerful offering by a genuine woman—there were women named Jane Anger in early modern England—or by a woman writing under a pseudonym, or by a man taking on an outraged woman's voice. In this dedication, Anger wishes ruin on men who take advantage of women sexually and then complain about them. In her final poem she considers how she has planted her seed of anger in and for women readers.

To All Women in General, and Gentle Reader[s] Whatsoever

Fie on the falsehood of men, whose minds go oft a-madding,<sup>1</sup> and whose tongues cannot so soon be wagging but straight they fall a-railing. Was there ever any so abused, so slandered, so railed upon, or so wickedly handled undeservedly, as are we women? Will the gods permit it, the goddesses stay<sup>2</sup> their punishing judgments, and we ourselves not pursue their undoings<sup>3</sup> for such devilish practices? O Paul's steeple and Charing Cross!<sup>4</sup> A halter<sup>5</sup> hold all such persons! Let the streams of the channels in London streets<sup>6</sup> run so swiftly as they may be able alone to carry them from that sanctuary. Let the stones be as ice, the soles of their shoes as glass, the ways steep like Etna,<sup>7</sup> and every blast a whirlwind puffed out of Boreas<sup>8</sup> his long throat, that these may hasten their passage to the devils' haven. Shall surfeiters rail on our kindness,<sup>9</sup> you stand still and say nought, and shall not Anger stretch the veins of her brains, the strings of her fingers, and the lists<sup>1</sup> of her modesty, to answer their surfeitings? Yes truly. And herein I conjure<sup>2</sup> all you to aide and assist me in defense of my willingness, which shall make me rest at your commands. Fare you well.

Though sharp the seed by Anger sown

EDMUND SPENSER

1552?–1599

Edmund Spenser set out, consciously and deliberately, to become the great English poet of his age. In a culture in which most accomplished poetry was written by those who were, or at least professed to be, principally interested in something else—advancement at court, diplomacy, statecraft, or the Church—Spenser's ambition was altogether remarkable, and it is still more remarkable that he succeeded in reaching his goal. Unlike such poets as Wyatt, Surrey, and Sidney, born to privilege and social distinction, Spenser was born—in London, probably in 1552—to parents of modest social class and limited means. He nonetheless received an impressive education, first at the Merchant Taylors' School—under its demanding, humanist headmaster, Richard Mulcaster—and then at Pembroke College, Cambridge, where he was enrolled as a "sizar," a student who received financial aid in exchange for waiting on tables and other menial tasks. In the Puritan environment of Cambridge, where the popular preacher Thomas Cartwright was beginning to make the authorities uneasy, Spenser began as a poet by translating some poems for a volume of anti-Catholic propaganda. He also began his friendship with Gabriel Harvey, an eccentric Cambridge don, humanist, and pamphleteer. Their correspondence shows they shared a passionate interest in heightening the power and prestige of poetry written in English.

After receiving the B.A. degree in 1573 and the M.A. in 1576, Spenser served as personal secretary and aide to several prominent men, including both Dr. John Young, bishop of Rochester, and Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester and the queen's principal favorite. During his employment in Leicester's household, Spenser came to know Sir Philip Sidney and his friend Sir Edward Dyer, courtiers who sought to promote a new English poetry. Spenser's contribution to the movement was The Shepheardes Calender, published in 1579 and dedicated to Sidney.

In The Shepheardes Calender Spenser used a deliberately archaic language—partly in homage to Chaucer, whose work he praised as a “well of English undefiled,” and partly to achieve a rustic effect, in keeping with the feigned simplicity of pastoral poetry's shepherd singers. Sidney did not entirely approve, and another contemporary, Ben Jonson, growled that Spenser “writ no language.” In the eighteenth century Samuel Johnson described the language of The Shepheardes Calender as “studied barbarity.” Johnson's characterization is, in a way, quite accurate, for Spenser was attempting to conjure up a native English style to which he could wed the classical mode of the pastoral. Moreover, because pastoral was traditionally viewed as the prelude in a great poet's career, Spenser was also in effect announcing his extravagant ambition to become England's national poet.

Spenser was a prolific and daring experimenter: the poems of The Shepheardes Calender use no fewer than thirteen different metrical schemes. In his later poems, he went on to make further innovations: the best known are the special rhyme scheme of the Spenserian sonnet, the remarkably beautiful adaptation of the Italian canzone forms for the Epithalamion and Prothalamion, and the great Spenserian stanza of The Faerie Queene (eight iambic pentameters followed by a six-foot line, rhymed ababbcbcc). Spenser is sometimes called “the poet's poet,” because so many later English poets learned the art of versification from him. In the nineteenth century alone his influence may be seen in Shelley's Revolt of Islam,

Byron's Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, Keats's "Eve of St. Agnes," and Tennyson's "The Lotus-Eaters."

The year after the publication of The Shepheardes Calender, Spenser went to Ireland as secretary and aide to Lord Grey of Wilton, lord deputy of Ireland. Although the poet tried continually to obtain appointments in England (which he revisited on several occasions) and to secure the patronage of the queen, he lived in Ireland nearly to the end of his life, holding various minor government posts and hence participating actively in the English struggle against those who resisted colonial occupation. The grim realities of that struggle—massacres, the burning of miserable hovels and of crops with the deliberate intention of starving the inhabitants, the forced relocation of whole communities, the manipulation of treason charges to facilitate the seizure of lands, the endless repetition of acts of military "justice" calculated to intimidate and break the spirit—may be glimpsed in distorted and on occasion direct form throughout Spenser's writings, along with dreamlike depictions of the beauty of the Irish landscape. Those writings include an anonymously published political tract, A View of the Present State of Ireland, which was unusual in its time both for its genuine fascination with Irish culture and for the ruthlessness of the policies it prescribed.

Spenser's attitudes toward Ireland and his conduct there raise difficult questions concerning the relationship between literature and colonialism. Are the harsh policies of the View echoed, allegorically, in The Faerie Queene? What does it mean to admire a poet who might, by modern standards, be judged a war criminal (as his master, Lord Grey, was judged to be, even by notoriously brutal Elizabethan standards)? Does Spenser use his Irish vantage point to launch daring criticisms of Queen Elizabeth and the English form of government? In addition to sharpening racial chauvinism, the experience of Ireland seems to have given English settlers a new perspective on events back home. As one of Spenser's contemporaries remarked, words that would be considered treasonous in England were common table talk among the Irish settlers.

Spenser was rewarded for his efforts in Ireland with a castle and 3,028 acres of expropriated land at Kilcolman, in the province of Munster. There he was visited by another colonist and poet, the powerful and well-connected Sir Walter Raleigh, to whom Spenser showed the great chivalric epic on which he was at work. With Raleigh's influential backing, Spenser traveled to England and published, in 1590, the first three books of The Faerie Queene, which made a strong bid for the queen's favor and patronage. He was rewarded with a handsome pension of £50 a year for life, though the queen's principal councillor, Lord Burghley, is said to have grumbled that it was a lot for a song. Soon after, Spenser published a volume of poems called Complaints; a pastoral called Colin Clouts Come Home Againe (1595), commenting wryly on the court life he had observed during his 1590 visit; his sonnet cycle, Amoretti; and two wedding poems: "Prothalamion," celebrating the double marriage of aristocratic sisters, and "Epithalamion," celebrating the poet's own marriage to Elizabeth Boyle. The six-book Faerie Queene was published in 1596, with some revisions in the first part and a changed ending to Book 3 to provide a bridge to the added books; the two so-called Mutabilitie Cantos and two stanzas of a third canto—perhaps part of an intended seventh book—appeared posthumously, in the 1609 edition.

In 1598 there was an uprising in Munster, and rebels burned down the house in which Spenser lived. The poet fled with his wife; their newborn baby is said to have died in the flames. Spenser was sent to England with messages from the besieged English garrison. He died in Westminster on January 13, 1599, and was buried near his beloved Chaucer in what is now called the Poets' Corner of Westminster Abbey.

Spenser cannot be put into neatly labeled categories. His work is steeped in classical learning and arcane mysticism, but it is also earthy and practical. A staunch Protestant, influenced by Puritanism, he portrayed the Roman Catholic Church as a demonic villain in The

Faerie Queene, and yet his understanding of faith and of sin owes much to Catholic thinkers. He is a poet of sensuous images yet also something of an iconoclast, deeply suspicious of the way powerful images (material and verbal) can turn into idols. He is an idealist, drawn to courtesy, gentleness, and exquisite moral refinement, yet also a celebrant of English nationalism, empire, and martial power. He is the author of the most memorable literary idealization of Elizabeth I, yet he fills his poem with coded criticisms of the queen and her court. He is in some ways a backward-looking poet who paid homage to Chaucer, used archaic language, and compared his own age unfavorably with the feudal past. Yet as British epic poet and poet-prophet, he points forward to the poetry of the Romantics and especially to Milton, who himself paid homage to the "sage and serious" Spenser as "a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas."

Because it was a deliberate choice on Spenser's part that his language should seem antique, his poetry is always printed in the original spelling and punctuation; but a few of the most confusing punctuation marks have been altered in the present text, and we have sometimes added diacritical marks to indicate pronunciation. Spenser also spells words variably, in such a way as to suggest rhymes to the eye or to suggest etymologies (often incorrect ones). This inconsistency in his spellings is typical of his time; in the sixteenth century, people varied the spelling even of their own names.

The Shepheardes Calender Pastoral poetry—with its idea of shepherds among their flocks piping on their flutes and singing beautiful songs of love, sadness, and complaint—was an influential classical form whose most famous practitioners were the Alexandrian poet Theocritus (third century B.C.E.) and the Roman poet Virgil (first century B.C.E.). The singers of the pastoral, or eclogue, were depicted as simple rustics who inhabited a world in which human beings and nature lived in harmony, but the form was always essentially urban and elite: in his series of twelve eclogues, Spenser, a Londoner, was self-consciously assuming a highly conventional literary role. That role enabled him at once to lay claim to the prestige of classical poetry and to insist on his native Englishness, insistently signaled by the deliberately archaic, pseudo-Chaucerian language. The rustic mask also enabled Spenser, in certain of the eclogues, to make sharply satirical comments on religious and political issues of his day, such as Elizabeth's suppression of Puritan clergy in the Church of England, and to reflect on his own marginal social position.

The eclogues of The Shepheardes Calender are titled for the months of the year. Each is prefaced by an illustrative woodcut representing the characters and theme of the poem and picturing in the clouds the dominant sign of the zodiac for that month, and each is accompanied by a commentary ascribed to "E. K.," who also wrote an introductory epistle to the work as a whole. E. K., who has not been identified but must have been someone close to Spenser (or, in the opinion of some, Spenser himself), trumpets the arrival of a "new poet" whose skills are conspicuously displayed in the sequence of poems. "October" deals with the place of poetry and the responsibility of the poet in the world, an important theme throughout the Calender and in much of Spenser's work.

To His Booke

As child whose parent is unkent:°
To him that is the president°
Of noblesse and of chevalree,
And if that Envie barke at thee,
5 As sure it will, for succoure° flee
Under the shadow of his wing,<sup>2</sup>
And askèd, who thee forth did bring,
A shepheard's swaine° saye did thee sing,
All as his straying flocke he fedde:
10 And when his honor has thee redde,°
Crave pardon for my hardyhedde.°
But if that any aske thy name,
Say thou wert base° begot with blame:
For thy° thereof thou takest shame.
15 And when thou art past jeoparddee,
Come tell me, what was sayd of mee:
And I will send more after thee.

ARGUMENT

In Cuddie<sup>5</sup> is set out the perfecte paterne of a Poete, which finding no maintenaunce of his state and studies, complayneth of the comtempte of Poetrie, and the causes thereof: Specially having bene in all ages, and even amongst the most barbarous alwayes of singular account<sup>6</sup> and honor, and being indede so worthy and commendable an arte: or rather no arte, but a divine gift and heavenly instinct not to bee gotten by laboure and learning, but adorned with both: and poured into the witte by a certaine enthousiasmos and celestiall inspiration, as the Author hereof els where at large discourseth, in his booke called the English Poete,<sup>7</sup> which booke being lately come to my hands, I mynde<sup>8</sup> also by Gods grace upon further advisement to publish.

PIERS CUDDIE

Cuddie, for shame hold up thy heavye head,
And let us cast with what delight to chace,
And weary thys long lingring Phoebus race.<sup>9</sup>
Whilome thou wont<sup>1</sup> the shepheards laddes to leade,
In rymes, in ridles, and in bydding base:<sup>2</sup>
5 Now they in thee, and thou in sleepe art dead.

CUDDIE

Piers, I have pypèd erst<sup>o</sup> so long with payne,<sup>o</sup>
That all mine Oten reedes<sup>3</sup> bene rent<sup>o</sup> and wore:
And my poore Muse hath spent her sparèd<sup>o</sup> store,
Yet little good hath got, and much lesse gayne.
10 Such pleasaunce makes the Grashopper so poore,
And ligge so layd,<sup>4</sup> when Winter doth her straine.<sup>o</sup>

The dapper<sup>o</sup> ditties, that I wont<sup>5</sup> devise,
To feede youthes fancie, and the flocking fry,<sup>6</sup>
Delighten much: what I the bett for thy?<sup>7</sup>
15 They han<sup>o</sup> the pleasure, I a sclender prise.<sup>o</sup>
I beate the bush, the byrds to them doe flye:
What good thereof to Cuddie can arise?

PIERS

Cuddie, the prayse is better, then<sup>o</sup> the price,
The glory eke<sup>o</sup> much greater then the gayne:
20 O what an honor is it, to restraine
The lust<sup>o</sup> of lawlesse youth with good advice:<sup>8</sup>
Or pricke<sup>o</sup> them forth with pleasaunce of thy vaine<sup>o</sup>

Soone as thou gynst<sup>o</sup> to sette thy notes in frame,

O how the rurall routes<sup>o</sup> to thee doe cleave:
25 Seemeth thou dost their soule of sence bereave,<sup>9</sup>
All as the shepheard, that did fetch his dame
From Plutoes balefull bowre withouten leave:
30 His musicks might the hellish hound did tame.<sup>1</sup>

CUDDIE

So praysen babes the Peacocks spotted traine,
And wondren at bright Argus blazing eye:<sup>2</sup>
But who rewards him ere<sup>o</sup> the more for thy?<sup>o</sup>
Or feedes him once the fuller by a graine?
35 Sike<sup>o</sup> prayse is smoke, that sheddeth<sup>o</sup> in the skye, Sike words bene wynd, and wasten soone in vayne.

PIERS

Abandon then the base and viler clowne,<sup>o</sup>
Lyft up thy selfe out of the lowly dust:
And sing of bloody Mars,<sup>3</sup> of wars, of giusts.<sup>o</sup>
40 Turne thee to those, that weld<sup>o</sup> the awful<sup>o</sup> crowne,
To doubted<sup>o</sup> Knights, whose woundlesse<sup>4</sup> armour rusts,
And helmes unbruzed waxen<sup>o</sup> dayly browne.

There may thy Muse display her fluttryng wing,
And stretch her selfe at large from East to West:<sup>5</sup>
45 Whither thou list<sup>o</sup> in fayre Elisa rest,
Or if thee please in bigger notes to sing,
Advaunce<sup>o</sup> the worthy whome shee loveth best,
That first the white beare to the stake did bring.<sup>6</sup>

And when the stubborne stroke of stronger stounds,<sup>o</sup>
50 Has somewhat slackt<sup>7</sup> the tenor of thy string:
Of love and lustihead tho<sup>o</sup> mayst thou sing,

And carrol lowde, and leade the Myllers rownde,<sup>8</sup>
All<sup>o</sup> were Elisa one of thilke same ring.<sup>9</sup>
So mought our Cuddies name to Heaven sownde.

CUDDIE

55      Indeede the Romish Tityrus,<sup>1</sup> I heare,
Through his Mecaenas left his Oaten reede,
Whereon he earst<sup>o</sup> had taught his flocks to feede,
And laboured lands to yield the timely eare,
And eft<sup>o</sup> did sing of warres and deadly drede,<sup>o</sup>
60      So as the Heavens did quake his verse to here.<sup>2</sup>

But ah Mecaenas is yclad in claye,
And great Augustus long ygoe is dead:
And all the worthies ligger<sup>o</sup> wrapt in leade,
That matter made for Poets on to play:
65      For ever, who in derring doe<sup>3</sup> were drede,<sup>o</sup>
The loftie verse of hem<sup>o</sup> was lovèd aye.<sup>4</sup>

But after vertue gan for age to stoupe,
And mighty manhode brought a bedde of<sup>o</sup> ease:<sup>5</sup>
The vaunting Poets found nought worth a pease,<sup>o</sup>
70      To put in preace<sup>o</sup> among the learned troupe.
Tho<sup>o</sup> gan the streames of flowing wittes to cease,
And sonnebright honour pend in shamefull coupe.<sup>6</sup>

And if that any buddes of Poesie,
Yet of the old stocke gan to shoote agayne:
75      Or<sup>o</sup> it mens follies mote<sup>o</sup> be forst to fayne,<sup>o</sup>
And rolle with rest in rymes of rybaudrye:<sup>o</sup>
Or as it sprong, it wither must agayne:
Tom Piper makes us better melodie.<sup>7</sup>

PIERS

O pierlesse Poesye, where is then thy place?
If nor in Princes pallace thou doe sitt:
80 (And yet is Princes pallace the most fitt)
Ne brest of baser birth<sup>8</sup> doth thee embrace.
Then make thee winges of thine aspyring wit,<sup>o</sup>
And, whence thou camst, flye backe to heaven apace.

CUDDIE

Ah Percy it is all to<sup>o</sup> weake and wanne,
85 So high to sore,<sup>o</sup> and make so large a flight:
Her peecèd pyneons bene not so in plight,
For Colin fittes such famous flight to scanne:<sup>9</sup>
He, were he not with love so ill bedight,<sup>o</sup>
Would mount as high, and sing as soote<sup>o</sup> as 90 Swanne.<sup>1</sup>

PIERS

Ah fon,<sup>o</sup> for love does teach him climbe so hie,
And lyftes him up out of the loathsome myre:
Such immortall mirrhor,<sup>2</sup> as he doth admire,
Would rayse ones mynd above the starry skie.
95 And cause a caytive corage<sup>3</sup> to aspire,
For lofty love doth loath a lowly eye.

CUDDIE

All otherwise the state of Poet stands,
For lordly love is such a Tyranne fell:<sup>o</sup>
That where he rules, all power he doth expell.
The vaunted verse a vacant head demaundes,
100 Ne wont with crabbèd care the Muses dwell:
Unwisely weaves, that takes two webbes in hand.<sup>4</sup>

Who ever casts<sup>o</sup> to compasse<sup>o</sup> weightye prise,
And thinks to throwe out thondring words of threate:
Let powre in lavish cups and thriftie bitts of meate,
105 For Bacchus fruite is frend to Phoebus wise.<sup>5</sup>
And when with Wine the braine begins to sweate,
The numbers<sup>o</sup> flowe as fast as spring doth ryse.

Thou kenst<sup>o</sup> not Percie howe the ryme should rage.
O if my temples were distaind<sup>o</sup> with wine,
110 And girt in girlonds of wild Yvie<sup>6</sup> twine,
How I could reare the Muse on stately stage,
And teache her tread aloft in buskin<sup>7</sup> fine,
With queint Bellona<sup>8</sup> in her equipage.<sup>o</sup>

But ah my corage cooles ere it be warme,
115 For thy,<sup>o</sup> content us in thys humble shade:
Where no such troublous tydes<sup>o</sup> han us assayde,<sup>o</sup>
Here we our slender pipes may safely charme.<sup>9</sup>

And when my Gates shall han their bellies layd:<sup>1</sup>
120 Cuddie shall have a Kidde to store his farme.

Endnotes

- Note 3:
When The Shepheardes Calender was published, in 1579, each of the twelve eclogues was followed by a commentary (called a "Glosse") by the mysterious E. K., which contained explications of difficult or archaic words, together with learned discussions of—and disagreements with—Spenser's ideas, imagery, and poetics. Designed to appear authoritative, the commentaries in fact often serve to complicate the process of interpretation. To give the reader some sense of them, we have included several of the individual notes from the "October" Glosse.

- Note 4:

Tenth Eclogue (Latin). An eclogue ("aeglogue") is a short pastoral poem in the form of a dialogue or soliloquy. Spenser's spelling is based on a false etymology (aix, "goat" + logos, "speech"), signifying, according to E. K., "Goteheards tales." For this eclogue, E. K. identifies as sources Theocritus's Idyl 16, which reproves the tyrant Hiero of Syracuse for his neglect of poets, and also Baptista Spagnuoli (1448–1516), called Mantuan (the fifth eclogue). The illustration portrays Cuddie (left) holding a pipe and crowned with a laurel wreath (emblems of a poet). He talks with his fellow shepherd, Piers, in a pastoral landscape, with the court in the background. The astrological sign for October, Scorpio, is at the top of the picture.

- Note 5: E. K. queries "whether by Cuddie be specified the authour selfe, or some other," noting that in "August" he was introduced as singing a song "of Colins making. So that some doubt, that the persons be different." It may be that Cuddie and Piers, along with Colin, present different aspects of Spenser the poet.Return to reference 5

The Faerie Queene In a letter to Sir Walter Raleigh, appended to the first, 1590 edition of The Faerie Queene, Spenser describes his exuberant, multifaceted poem as an allegory—an extended metaphor or “dark conceit”—and invites us to interpret the characters and adventures in its several books in terms of the particular virtues and vices they enact or come to embody. Thus the Redcrosse Knight in Book 1 is the knight of Holiness (and also Saint George, the patron saint of England); Sir Guyon in Book 2 is the knight of Temperance; the female knight Britomart in Book 3 is the knight of Chastity (“chastity” here meaning chaste love leading to marriage). The heroes of Books 4, 5, and 6 represent Friendship, Justice, and Courtesy. The poem’s general end, Spenser writes, is “to fashion a gentleman or noble person in vertuous and gentle discipline,” and the individual moral qualities, taken together, constitute the ideal human being.

However, Spenser’s allegory is not as straightforward as the letter to Raleigh might suggest, and the fashioning of identity proves to be anything but simple. Far from being the static embodiments of abstract moral precepts, the knights have a surprisingly complex, altogether human relation to their allegorical identities, identities into which they grow only through painful trial and error in the course of their adventures. These adventures repeatedly take the form of mortal combat with sworn enemies—hence the Christian Redcrosse Knight smites the “Saracen” (that is, Muslim) Sansfoy (literally, “Without faith”)—but the enemies are revealed more often than not to be weirdly dissociated aspects of the knights themselves: when he encounters Sansfoy, Redcrosse has just been faithless to his lady, Una, and his most dangerous enemy ultimately proves to be his own despair. Accordingly, the meaning of the various characters, episodes, and places is richly complex, revealed to us (and to the characters themselves) only by degrees.

The complexity is heightened by the inclusion, in addition to the moral allegory, of a historical allegory to which Spenser calls attention in the letter to Raleigh; there he observes that both the Faerie Queene and another character, Belpheobe, are representations of Queen Elizabeth. (In fact, they are only two among many oblique representations of Elizabeth.) Throughout the poem there is a dense network of allusions to events, issues, and particular persons in England and the rest of the British Isles—for example, the queen's rival Mary, Queen of Scots, the Spanish Armada, the English Reformation, the controversies over religious images, and the bitter colonial struggles against Irish rebellion. Some of Spenser's characters are identified by conventional symbols and attributes that would have been obvious to readers of his time. For example, they would know immediately that a woman who wears a miter and scarlet clothes and who dwells near the river Tiber represents (in one sense at least) the Roman Catholic Church, which had often been identified by Protestant preachers with the Whore of Babylon in the book of Revelation. Marginal notes jotted in early copies of The Faerie Queene suggest, however, that there was no consensus among Spenser's contemporaries about the precise historical referents of other of the poem's myriad figures. (Sir Walter Raleigh's wife, Bess, for example, seems to have identified many of the virtuous female characters as allegorical representations of herself.) Spenser's poem may be enjoyed as a fascinating story with multiple meanings, a story that works on several levels at once and continually eludes the full and definitive allegorical explanation it constantly promises to deliver.

The poem is also an epic. In moving from The Shepheardes Calender to The Faerie Queene, Spenser deliberately fashioned himself after the great Roman poet Virgil, who began his poetic career with pastoral poetry and moved on to his epic poem, the Aeneid. Spenser was acutely conscious that poets elsewhere in Europe, such as Ariosto and Tasso in Italy and Camões in Portugal, had already produced works modeled on Virgil's, in celebration of their respective nations. In drawing on the British legends of Saint George and King Arthur, weaving together classical and medieval sources, and adapting whole episodes from Ariosto and Tasso, Spenser was providing his country with the epic it had lacked.

Like Virgil, Spenser is deeply concerned with the dangerous struggles and painful renunciations required to attain the highest goals. The heroic deeds of his brave knights are the achievements of individual aristocratic men and women, not the triumphs of armies or communities united in serving a common purpose—not even the triumph of the virtually invisible royal court of Gloriana, the Faerie Queene. Yet, taken together, the disjointed adventures of these solitary warriors constitute in Spenser's fervent vision the glory of Britain, the collective memory of its heroic past, and the promise of a still more glorious future. And if the Faerie Queene herself is consigned to the margins of the poem that bears her name, she nonetheless is the symbolic embodiment of a shared national destiny, a destiny that reaches beyond mere political success to participate in the ultimate, millennial triumph of good over evil.

If The Faerie Queene is thus an epic celebration of Queen Elizabeth, the Protestant faith, and the English nation, it is also a chivalric romance, full of jousting knights and damsels in distress, dragons, witches, enchanted trees, wicked magicians, giants, dark caves, shining castles, and non-Christian "paynims" or heathens (with French names). A clear, pleasant stream may be dangerous, weakening those who drink its water. A pious hermit may prove to be a cunningly disguised villain. Houses, castles, and gardens are often places of education and challenge or of especially dense allegorical significance, as if they possessed special, half-hidden keys to the meaning of the books in which they appear. As a romance, Spenser's poem is designed to produce wonder, to enthrall its readers with sprawling plots, marvelous adventures, heroic characters, ravishing descriptions, and esoteric mysteries.

In addition to enthralling its readers, the poem habitually entraps, misleads, and deludes them. Like Spenser's protagonists, readers are constantly in danger of mistaking hypocritical evil for good, or cunningly disguised foulness for true beauty. The Faerie Queene demands vigilance from its readers, and many passages must be reread in light of what follows after. In some sections, such as the dialogue between Redcrosse and Despaire (Book 1, canto 9), the repeated use of pronouns instead of proper names can lead to confusion as to who is speaking; the effect is intentional, for the promptings of evil are not always easy to disentangle from the voice of conscience.

The whole of The Faerie Queene is written in a remarkable nine-line stanza of closely interlocking rhymes (ababbcbcc), the first eight lines each with five stresses (iambic pentameter) and the final line with six stresses (iambic hexameter or alexandrine). The stanza gives the work a certain formal regularity, but the various books are composed on quite different structural principles. Book 1 is almost entirely self-contained; it has been called a miniature epic in itself, centering on the adventures of one principal hero, Redcrosse, who at length achieves the quest he undertakes at Una's behest: killing the dragon who has imprisoned her parents and thereby winning her as his bride. The spiritual allegory is similarly self-contained; it presents the Christian struggling heroically against many evils and temptations—doctrinal error, hypocrisy, the Seven Deadly Sins, and despair—to some of which he succumbs before finally emerging triumphant. It shows him separated from the one true faith and, aided by interventions of divine grace, at length reunited with it.

Spenser had outlined a plan for an immense poem twelve or even twenty-four books in length, but he died before he could bring this project anywhere near completion. To some degree a lack of closure characterizes all of The Faerie Queene, including the more self-contained of the six finished books, and it is fitting that there survives the fragment of another book, the cantos of Mutabilitie (see below), in which Spenser broods on the tension in nature between systematic order and ceaseless change. The poem as a whole is built around principles that pull tautly against one another: a commitment to a life of constant struggle and a profound longing for rest; a celebration of human heroism and a perception of ineradicable human sinfulness; a vision of evil as a terrifyingly potent force and a vision of evil as mere emptiness and filth; a faith in the supreme value of visionary art and a recurrent suspicion that art is dangerously allied to graven images and deception. That Spenser's knights never quite reach the havens they seek reflects the irresolvable tensions to which we owe much of the power and beauty of this great, unfinished work.

FROM THE FAERIE QUEENE

A Letter of the Authors<sup>1</sup>

EXPOUNDING HIS WHOLE INTENTION IN THE COURSE OF THIS WORKE: WHICH FOR THAT IT
GIVETH GREAT LIGHT TO THE READER, FOR THE BETTER UNDERSTANDING IS HEREUNTO ANNEXED

To the Right noble, and Valorous, Sir Walter Raleigh knight, Lo. Wardein of the Stanneryes,<sup>2</sup> and her Majesties liefetenaunt of the County of Cornewayll

Sir knowing how doubtfully all Allegories may be construed, and this booke of mine, which I have entituled the Faery Queene, being a continued Allegory, or darke conceit,<sup>3</sup> I have thought good as well for avoyding of gealous opinions and misconstructions, as also for your better light in reading thereof, (being so by you commanded,) to discover unto you the general intention and meaning, which in the whole course thereof I have fashioned, without expressing of any particular purposes or by-accidents<sup>4</sup> therein occasioned. The generall end therefore of all the booke is to fashion a gentleman or noble person in vertuous and gentle<sup>5</sup> discipline: Which for that I conceived shoulde be most plausible and pleasing, being coloured with an historicall fiction, the which the most part of men delight to read, rather for variety of matter, then for profite of the ensample:<sup>6</sup> I chose the historye of King Arthure, as most fitte for the excellency of his person, being made famous by many mens former workes, and also furthest from the daunger of envy, and suspition of present time.<sup>7</sup> In which I have followed all the antique Poets historicall,<sup>8</sup> first Homere, who in the Persons of Agamemnon and Ulysses hath ensampled a good governour and a vertuous man, the one in his Ilias, the other in his Odysseis: then Virgil, whose like intention was to doe in the person of Aeneas: after him Ariosto comprised them both in his Orlando: and lately Tasso dissevered them againe, and formed both parts in two persons, namely that part which they in Philosophy call Ethice, or vertues of a private man, coloured in his Rinaldo: The other named Politice in his Godfredo.<sup>9</sup> By ensample of which excellent Poets, I labour to pourtraict in Arthure, before he was king, the image of a brave knight, perfected in the twelve private morall vertues, as Aristotle hath devised,<sup>1</sup> the which is the purpose of these first twelve bookes: which if I finde to be well accepted, I may be perhaps encouraged, to frame the other part of polliticke vertues in his person, after that hee came to be king. To some I know this Methode will seeme displeasaunt, which had rather have good discipline<sup>2</sup> delivered plainly in way of precepts, or sermoned at large, as they use, then thus clowdily enwrapped in Allegoricall devises. But such, me seeme, should be satisfide with the use of these dayes, seeing all things accounted by their showes,<sup>3</sup> and nothing esteemed of, that is not delightfull and pleasing to commune sence.<sup>4</sup> For this cause is Xenophon preferred before Plato, for that the one in the exquisite depth of his judgment, formed a Commune welth such as it should be, but the other in the person of Cyrus and the Persians fashioned a government such as might best be:<sup>5</sup> So much more profitable and gracious is doctrine by ensample, then by rule. So have I laboured to doe in the person of Arthure: whome I conceive after his long education by Timon, to whom he was by Merlin delivered to be brought up, so soone as he was borne of the Lady Igrayne, to have seene in a dream or vision the Faery Queen, with whose excellent beauty ravished, he awaking resolved to seeke her out, and so being by Merlin armed, and by Timon throughly<sup>6</sup> instructed, he went to seeke her forth in Faerye land. In that Faery Queene I meane glory in my generall intention, but in my particular I conceive the most excellent and glorious person of our soveraine the Queene, and her kingdome in Faery land. And yet in some places els, I doe otherwise shadow<sup>7</sup> her. For considering she beareth two persons, the one of a most royall Queene or Empresse, the other of a most vertuous and beautifull Lady, this latter part in some places I doe express in Belpheobe, fashioning her name according to your owne excellent concept of Cynthia,<sup>8</sup> (Phoebe and Cynthia being both names of Diana.<sup>9</sup>) So in the person of Prince Arthure I sette forth magnificence in particular, which vertue for that (according to Aristotle and the rest) it is the perfection of all the rest,<sup>1</sup> and containeth in it them all, therefore in the whole course I mention the deedes of Arthure applyable to that vertue, which I write of in that booke. But of the xii. other vertues, I make xii. other knights the patrones, for the more variety of the history. Of which these three bookes contain three, The first of the knight of the Redcrosse, in whome I expresse Holynes: The seconde of Sir Guyon, in whome I sette forth Temperaunce: The third of Britomartis a Lady knight, in whome I picture Chastity. But because the beginning of the whole worke seemeth abrupte and as depending upon other antecedents,<sup>2</sup> it needs that ye know the occasion of these three knights severall adventures. For the Methode of a Poet historical is not such, as of an Historiographer.<sup>3</sup> For an Historiographer discourseth of affayres orderly as they were donne, accounting as well the times as the actions, but a Poet thrusteth into the midst,<sup>4</sup> even where it most concerneth him, and there recouring to the thinges forepaste,<sup>5</sup> and divining of thinges to come, maketh a pleasing Analysis of all. The beginning therefore of my history, if it were to be told by an Historiographer, should be the twelfth booke, which is the last, where I devise that the Faery Queene kept her Annuall feaste xii. dayes, uppon which xii. severall dayes, the occasions of the xii. severall adventures hapned, which being undertaken by xii. severall knights, are in these xii books severally handled and discoursed. The first was this. In the beginning of the feaste, there presented him selfe a tall clownishe<sup>6</sup> younge man, who falling before the Queen of Faeries desired a boone (as the manner then was) which during that feast she might not refuse: which was that hee might have the atchievement of any adventure, which during that feaste should happen: that being graunted, he rested him on the floore, unfitte through his rusticity for a better place. Soone after entred a faire Ladye in mourning weedes, riding on a white Asse, with a dwarfe behind her leading a warlike steed, that bore the Armes of a knight, and his speare in the dwarfes hand. Shee falling before the Queene of Faeries, complained that her father and mother an ancient King and Queene, had bene by an huge dragon many years shut up in a brasen Castle, who thence suffred them not to yssew:<sup>7</sup> and therefore besought the Faery Queene to assygne her some one of her knights to take on him that expleyt. Presently<sup>8</sup> that clownish person upstarting, desired that adventure: whereat the Queene much wondering, and the Lady much gainesaying, yet he earnestly importuned his desire. In the end the Lady told him that unlesse that armour which she brought, would serve him (that is the armour of a Christian man specified by Saint Paul v. Ephes.<sup>9</sup>) that he could not succeed in that enterprise, which being forthwith put upon him with dewe furnitures<sup>1</sup> thereunto, he seemed the goodliest man in al that company, and was well liked of the Lady. And eftesoones<sup>2</sup> taking on him knighthood, and mounting on that straunge Courser, he went forth with her on that adventure: where beginneth the first booke, vz.

A gentle knight was pricking on the playne. &c.

The second day ther came in a Palmer<sup>3</sup> bearing an Infant with bloody hands, whose Parents he complained to have bene slayn by an Enchaunteresse called Acrasia: and therefore craved of the Faery Queene, to appoint him some knight, to performe that adventure, which being assigned to Sir Guyon, he presently went forth with that same Palmer: which is the beginning of the second booke and the whole subject thereof. The third day there came in, a Groome who complained before the Faery Queene, that a vile Enchaunter called Busirane had in hand a most faire Lady called Amoretta, whom he kept in most grievous torment, because she would not yield him the pleasure of her body. Whereupon Sir Scudamour the lover of that Lady presently tooke on him that adventure. But being unable to performe it by reason of the hard Enchauntments, after long sorrow, in the end met with Britomartis, who succoured him, and reskewed his love.

But by occasion hereof, many other adventures are intermedled, but rather as Accidents, then intendments.<sup>4</sup> As the love of Britomart, the overthrow of Marinell, the misery of Florimell, the vertuousnes of Belphebe, the lasciviousnes of Hellenora, and many the like.

Thus much Sir, I have briefly overronne<sup>5</sup> to direct your understanding to the wel-head of the History, that from thence gathering the whole intention of the conceit,<sup>6</sup> ye may as in a handfull gripe al the discourse, which otherwise may happily<sup>7</sup> seeme tedious and confused. So humbly craving the continuance of your honorable favour towards me, and th' eternall establishment of your happines, I humbly take leave.

23. January, 1589<sup>8</sup>

Yours most humbly affectionate.

ED. SPENSER.

The First Booke of The Faerie Queene

Contayning The Legende of the Knight of the Red Crosse, or Of Holinesse

1

Lo I the man, whose Muse whilome did maske,
As time her taught, in lowly Shepheards weeds,<sup>1</sup>
Am now enforst a far unfitter taske,
For trumpets sterne to chaunge mine Oaten reeds,<sup>2</sup>
And sing of Knights and Ladies gentle<sup>o</sup> deeds;
Whose prayes having slept in silence long,<sup>3</sup>
Me, all too meane,<sup>o</sup> the sacred Muse areeds<sup>o</sup>
To blazon<sup>o</sup> broad emongst her learned throng:
Fierce warres and faithfull loves shall moralize<sup>4</sup> my song.

2

Helpe then, O holy Virgin chiefe of nine,<sup>5</sup>
Thy weaker<sup>o</sup> Novice to performe thy will,
Lay forth out of thine everlasting scryne<sup>o</sup>
The antique rolles, which there lye hidden still,
Of Faerie knights and fairest Tanaquill,<sup>o</sup>
Whom that most noble Briton Prince<sup>6</sup> so long Sought through the world, and suffered so much ill,
That I must rue<sup>o</sup> his undeserved wrong:
O helpe thou my weake wit, and sharpen my dull tong.

3

And thou most dreaded impe<sup>o</sup> of highest Jove,
Faire Venus sonne,<sup>o</sup> that with thy cruell dart

At that good knight so cunningly didst rove,<sup>o</sup>
That glorious fire it kindled in his hart,
Lay now thy deadly Heben<sup>o</sup> bow apart,
And with thy mother milde come to mine ayde:
Come both, and with you bring triumphant Mart,<sup>7</sup>
In loves and gentle jollities arrayd,
After his murderous spoiles and bloudy rage allayd.

4

And with them eke,<sup>o</sup> O Goddess heavenly bright,
Mirrour of grace and Majestie divine,
Great Lady of the greatest Isle, whose light
Like Phoebus lampe throughout the world doth shine,
Shed thy faire beames into my feeble eyne,<sup>o</sup>
And raise my thoughts too humble and too vile,<sup>o</sup>
To thinke of that true glorious type<sup>8</sup> of thine,
The argument<sup>o</sup> of mine afflicted stile:<sup>o</sup>
The which to heare, vouchsafe, O dearest dred<sup>o</sup> a-while.

Canto 1

*The Patron of true Holinesse,
Foule Errour doth defeate:
Hypocrisie him to entrappe,
Doth to his home entreate.*

1

A Gentle Knight was pricking<sup>o</sup> on the plaine, Ycladd<sup>9</sup> in mightie armes and silver shielde,
Wherein old dints of deepe wounds did remaine,
The cruell markes of many a bloudy fielde;
Yet armes till that time did he never wield:
His angry steede did chide his foming bitt,
As much disdayning to the curbe to yield:
Full jolly<sup>o</sup> knight he seemd, and faire did sitt,
As one for knightly giusts<sup>o</sup> and fierce encounters fitt.

2

But on his brest a bloudie Crosse he bore,
The deare remembrance of his dying Lord,
For whose sweete sake that glorious badge he wore,
And dead as living ever him adored:<sup>1</sup>
Upon his shield the like was also scored,<sup>o</sup>
For soveraine<sup>2</sup> hope, which in his helpe he had:
Right faithfull true<sup>3</sup> he was in deede and word,
But of his cheere<sup>4</sup> did seeme too solemne sad;<sup>o</sup>
Yet nothing did he dread, but ever was ydrad.<sup>o</sup>

3

Upon a great adventure he was bond,
That greatest Gloriana to him gave,
That greatest Glorious Queene of Faerie Lond,
To winne him worship,<sup>o</sup> and her grace to have,

Which of all earthly things he most did crave;
And ever as he rode, his hart did earne<sup>o</sup>
To prove his puissance<sup>o</sup> in battell brave
Upon his foe, and his new force to learne;
Upon his foe, a Dragon horrible and stearne.

4

A lovely Ladie rode him faire beside,
Upon a lowly Asse more white then<sup>o</sup> snow,
Yet she much whiter, but the same did hide
Under a vele, that wimpled<sup>o</sup> was full low,
And over all a blacke stole<sup>o</sup> she did throw,
As one that inly<sup>o</sup> mournd: so was she sad,
And heavie sat upon her palfrey slow:
Seemèd in heart some hidden care she had,
And by her in a line<sup>o</sup> a milke white lambe she lad.

5

So pure an innocent, as that same lambe,
She was in life and every vertuous lore,
And by descent from Royall lynage came
Of ancient Kings and Queenes, that had of yore
Their scepters stretcht from East to Western shore,
And all the world in their subjection held;
Till that infernall feend with foule uprore
Forwasted<sup>o</sup> all their land, and them expeld:
Whom to avenge, she had this Knight from far compeld.<sup>o</sup>

6

Behind her farre away a Dwarfe did lag,
That lasie seemd in being ever last,
Or wearièd with bearing of her bag
Of needments at his backe. Thus as they past,
The day with cloudes was suddeine overcast,
And angry Jove an hideous storme of raine

Did poure into his Lemans<sup>5</sup> lap so fast,
That every wight<sup>o</sup> to shrowd<sup>o</sup> it did constrain,
And this faire couple eke<sup>o</sup> to shroud themselves were fain.<sup>o</sup>

7

Enforst to seeke some covert<sup>o</sup> nigh at hand,
A shadie grove not far away they spide,
That promist ayde the tempest to withstand:
Whose loftie trees yclad with sommers pride,
Did spred so broad, that heavens light did hide,
Not perceable<sup>o</sup> with power of any starre:
And all within were pathes and alleies wide,
With footing worne, and leading inward farre:
Faire harbour that them seemes; so in they entred arre.

8

And foorth they passe, with pleasure forward led,
Joying to heare the birdes sweete harmony,
Which therein shrouded from the tempest dred,<sup>o</sup>
Seemd in their song to scorne the cruell sky.
Much can<sup>o</sup> they prayse the trees, so straight and hy,
The sayling<sup>6</sup> Pine, the Cedar proud and tall,
The vine-prop Elme, the Poplar never dry,
The builder Oake, sole king of forrests all,
The Aspine good for staves, the Cypresse funerall.<sup>o</sup>

9

The Laurell, meed<sup>o</sup> of mightie Conquerours
And Poets sage, the Firre that weepeth still,<sup>7</sup>
The Willow worne of forlorne Paramours,
The Eugh<sup>o</sup> obedient to the benders will,
The Birch for shaftes, the Sallow<sup>o</sup> for the mill,
The Mirrhe sweete bleeding in the bitter wound,
The warlike Beech, the Ash for nothing ill,

The fruitfull Olive, and the Platane<sup>o</sup> round,
The carver Holme,<sup>8</sup> the Maple seeldom inward sound.

10

Led with delight, they thus beguile the way,
Untill the blustering storme is overblowne;
When weening<sup>o</sup> to returne, whence they did stray,
They cannot finde that path, which first was showne,
But wander too and fro in wayes unknowne,
Furthest from end then, when they neerest weene,
That makes them doubt, their wits be not their owne:
So many pathes, so many turnings seene,
That which of them to take, in diverse doubt they been.

11

At last resolving forward still to fare,
Till that some end they finde or<sup>o</sup> in or out,
That path they take, that beaten seemed most bare,
And like to lead the labyrinth about<sup>o</sup>
Which when by tract<sup>o</sup> they hunted had throughout,
At length it brought them to a hollow cave,
Amid the thickest woods. The Champion stout
Eftsoones<sup>o</sup> dismounted from his courser brave,
And to the Dwarfe a while his needlesse spere<sup>9</sup> he gave.

12

"Be well aware,"<sup>o</sup> quoth then that Ladie milde,
"Least suddaine mischief<sup>o</sup> ye too rash provoke:
The danger hid, the place unknowne and wilde,
Breedes dreadfull doubts: Oft fire is without smoke,
And perill without show: therefore your stroke
Sir knight with-hold, till further triall made."
"Ah Ladie," said he, "shame were to revoke<sup>o</sup>
The forward footing for<sup>o</sup> an hidden shade:
Vertue gives her selfe light, through darkenesse for to wade."

13

"Yea but," quoth she, "the perill of this place
I better wot then<sup>o</sup> you, though now too late
To wish you backe returne with foule disgrace,
Yet wisdomes warnes, whilst foot is in the gate,
To stay the stepe, ere forcèd to retrate.
This is the wandring wood, this Errours den,
A monster vile, whom God and man does hate:
Therefore I read<sup>o</sup> beware." "Fly fly," quoth then
The fearefull Dwarfe: "this is no place for living men."

14

But full of fire and greedy hardiment,<sup>o</sup>
The youthfull knight could not for ought<sup>o</sup> be staide,
But forth unto the darksome hole he went,
And lookèd in: his glistring<sup>o</sup> armor made
A litle glooming light, much like a shade,
By which he saw the ugly monster plaine,
Halfe like a serpent horribly displaide,
But th' other halfe did womans shape retaine,
Most lothsom, filthie, foule, and full of vile disdaine.<sup>1</sup>

15

And as she lay upon the durtye ground,
Her huge long taile her den all overspred,
Yet was in knots and many boughtes<sup>o</sup> upwound,
Pointed with mortall sting. Of her there bred
A thousand yong ones, which she dayly fed,
Sucking upon her poisonous dugs, eachone
Of sundry shapes, yet all ill favorèd:
Soone as that uncouth<sup>o</sup> light upon them shone,
Into her mouth they crept, and suddain all were gone.

16

Their dam upstart, out of her den efraide,<sup>o</sup>
And rushèd forth, hurling her hideous taile
About her cursèd head, whose folds displaid<sup>o</sup>
Were stretcht now forth at length without entraile.<sup>o</sup>
She lookt about, and seeing one in mayle
Armèd to point,<sup>o</sup> sought backe to turne againe;
For light she hated as the deadly bale,<sup>o</sup>
Ay wont<sup>o</sup> in desert darknesse to remain,
Where plaine none might her see, nor she see any plaine.

17

Which when the valiant Elfe<sup>2</sup> perceived, he lept
As Lyon fierce upon the flying pray,
And with his trenchand<sup>o</sup> blade her boldly kept
From turning backe, and forcèd her to stay:
Therewith enraged she loudly gan to bray,
And turning fierce, her speckled taile advaunst;
Threatning her angry sting, him to dismay:<sup>o</sup>
Who nought aghast, his mightie hand enhaunst:<sup>o</sup>
The stroke down from her head unto her shoulder glaunst.

18

Much daunted with that dint,<sup>o</sup> her sence was dazd,
Yet kindling rage, her selfe she gathered round,
And all attonce her beastly body raizd
With doubled forces high above the ground:
Tho<sup>o</sup> wrapping up her wrethèd sterne<sup>o</sup> arownd,
Lept fierce upon his shield, and her huge traine<sup>o</sup>
All suddenly about his body wound,
That hand or foot to stirre he strove in vaine:
God helpe the man so wrapt in Errours endlesse traine.

19

His Lady sad to see his sore constraint,
Cride out, "Now now Sir knight, shew what ye bee,

Add faith unto your force, and be not faint:
Strangle her, else she sure will strangle thee.”
That when he heard, in great perplexitie,<sup>3</sup>
His gall did grate<sup>4</sup> for grieve<sup>o</sup> and high disdain,
And knitting all his force got one hand free,
Wherewith he grypt her gorge<sup>o</sup> with so great paine,
That soone to loose her wicked bands did her constraine.

20

Therewith she spewd out of her filthy maw
A floud of poyson horrible and blacke,
Full of great lumpes of flesh and gobbets raw,
Which stunk so vildly, that it forst him slacke
His grasping hold, and from her turne him backe:
Her vomit full of bookes and papers was,<sup>5</sup>
With loathly frogs and toades, which eyes did lacke,
And creeping sought way in the weedy gras:
Her filthy parbreake<sup>o</sup> all the place defiled has.<sup>6</sup>

21

As when old father Nilus<sup>o</sup> gins to swell
With timely<sup>o</sup> pride above the Aegyptian vale,
His fattie<sup>o</sup> waves do fertile slime outwell,<sup>o</sup>
And overflow each plaine and lowly dale:
But when his later spring gins to avale,<sup>o</sup>
Huge heapes of mudd he leaves, wherein there breed
Ten thousand kindes of creatures, partly male
And partly female of his fruitfull seed;
Such ugly monstrous shapes elsewhere may no man reed.<sup>o</sup>

22

The same so sore annoyed<sup>o</sup> has the knight,
That welnigh choked with the deadly stinke,
His forces faile, ne<sup>o</sup> can no longer fight.

Whose corage when the feend perceived to shrink,
She poured forth out of her hellish sinke<sup>z</sup>
Her fruitfull cursèd spawne of serpents small,
Deformèd monsters, fowle, and blacke as inke,
Which swarming all about his legs did crall,
And him encombred sore, but could not hurt at all.

23

As gentle Shepheard in sweete even-tide,
When ruddy Phoebus<sup>o</sup> gins to welke<sup>o</sup> in west,
High on an hill, his flocke to vewen wide,
Markes<sup>o</sup> which do byte their hasty supper best;
A cloud of combrous<sup>o</sup> gnattes do him molest,
All striving to infixe their feeble stings,
That from their noyance he no where can rest,
But with his clownish<sup>o</sup> hands their tender wings
He brusheth oft, and oft doth mar their murmurings.

24

Thus ill bestedd,<sup>o</sup> and fearful more of shame,
Then of the certaine perill he stood in,
Halfe furious unto his foe he came,
Resolved in minde all suddenly to win,
Or soone to lose, before he once would lin;<sup>o</sup>
And strooke at her with more then manly force,
That from her body full of filthie sin
He raft<sup>o</sup> her hatefull head without remorse;
A streame of cole black bloud forth gushèd from her corse.<sup>o</sup>

25

Her scattred brood, soone as their Parent deare
They saw so rudely<sup>o</sup> falling to the ground,
Groning full deadly, all with troublous feare,
Gathred themselves about her body round,
Weening<sup>o</sup> their wonted entrance to have found

At her wide mouth: but being there withstood
They flockèd all about her bleeding wound,
And suckèd up their dying mothers blood,
Making her death their life, and eke<sup>o</sup> her hurt their good.

26

That detestable sight him much amazde,<sup>o</sup>
To see th'unkindly Impes<sup>o</sup> of heaven accurst, Devoure their dam; on whom while so he gazd,
Having all satisfide their bloudy thirst,
Their bellies swolne he saw with fulnesse burst,
And bowels gushing forth: well worthy end
Of such as drunke her life, the which them nurst;
Now needeth him no lenger<sup>o</sup> labour spend,
His foes have slaine themselves, with whom he should contend.

27

His Ladie seeing all, that chaunst, from farre
Approcht in hast to greet<sup>o</sup> his victorie,
And said, "Faire knight, borne under happy starre,
Who see your vanquisht foes before you lye;
Well worthy be you of that Armorie,<sup>o</sup>
Wherein ye have great glory wonne this day,
And proved your strength on a strong enimie,
Your first adventure: many such I pray,
And henceforth ever wish, that like succeed it may."

28

Then mounted he upon his Steede againe,
And with the Lady backward sought to wend;<sup>o</sup>
That path he kept, which beaten was most plaine,
Ne ever would to any by-way bend,
But still did follow one unto the end,
The which at last out of the wood them brought.
So forward on his way (with God to frend)<sup>o</sup>

He passèd forth, and new adventure sought;
Long way he travelèd, before he heard of ought.°

29

At length they chaunst to meet upon the way
An agèd Sire, in long blacke weedes yclad,<sup>8</sup>
His feete all bare, his beard all hoarie° gray,
And by his belt his booke he hanging had;
Sober he seemde, and very sagely sad,°
And to the ground his eyes were lowly bent,
Simple in shew,° and voyde of malice bad,
And all the way he prayèd, as he went,
And often knockt his brest, as one that did repent.

30

He faire the knight saluted, louting° low,
Who faire him quited,° as that courteous was:
And after askèd him, if he did know
Of straunge adventures, which abroad did pas.
"Ah my deare Sonne," quoth he, "how should, alas,
Silly° old man, that lives in hidden cell,
Bidding his beades° all day for his trespass,
Tydings of warre and worldly trouble tell?
With holy father sits not with such things to mell.°

31

"But if of daunger which hereby doth dwell,
And homebred evill ye desire to heare,
Of a straunge man I can you tidings tell,
That wasteth° all this countrey farre and neare."
"Of such," said he, "I chiefly do inquere,
And shall you well reward to shew the place,
In which that wicked wight his dayes doth weare.°
For to all knighthood it is foule disgrace,
That such a cursèd creature lives so long a space."

32

"Far hence," quoth he, "in wastfull<sup>o</sup> wilderness
His dwelling is, by which no living wight<sup>o</sup>
May ever passe, but thorough<sup>o</sup> great distresse."
"Now," sayd the Lady, "draweth toward night,
And well I wote, that of your later<sup>o</sup> fight
Ye all forwearied be: for what so strong,
But wanting<sup>o</sup> rest will also want of might?
The Sunne that measures heaven all day long,
At night doth baite<sup>o</sup> his steedes the Ocean waves emong.

33

"Then with the Sunne take Sir, your timely rest,
And with new day new worke at once begin:
Untroubled night they say gives counsell best."
"Right well Sir knight ye have advisèd bin," Quoth then that agèd man; "the way to win
Is wisely to advise:<sup>o</sup> now day is spent;
Therefore with me ye may take up your In<sup>o</sup>
For this same night." The knight was well content.
So with that godly father to his home they went.

34

A little lowly Hermitage it was,
Downe in a dale, hard by<sup>o</sup> a forests side,
Far from resort<sup>o</sup> of people, that did pas
In travell to and froe: a little wyde<sup>o</sup>
There was an holy Chappell edifyde,<sup>o</sup>
Wherein the Hermite dewly wont<sup>o</sup> to say
His holy things<sup>o</sup> each morne and eventyde:
Thereby a Christall streame did gently play,
Which from a sacred fountaine wellèd forth alway.

35

Arrived there, the little house they fill,
Ne looke for entertainment,<sup>o</sup> where none was:
Rest is their feast, and all things at their will;
The noblest mind the best contentment has.
With faire discourse the evening so they pas:
For that old man of pleasing wordes had store,
And well could file<sup>o</sup> his tongue as smooth as glas;
He told of Saintes and Popes, and evermore
He strowd an Ave-Mary<sup>1</sup> after and before.

36

The drouping Night thus creepeth on them fast,
And the sad humour<sup>o</sup> loading their eye liddes,
As messenger of Morpheus<sup>2</sup> on them cast
Sweet slombring deaw, the which to sleepe them biddes.
Unto their lodgings then his guestes he riddes:<sup>o</sup>
Where when all drownd in deadly sleepe<sup>o</sup> he findes,
He to his study goes, and there amiddes
His Magick bookes and artes of sundry kindes,
He seekes out mighty charmes, to trouble sleepy mindes.

37

Then choosing out few wordes most horrible
(Let none them read), thereof did verses frame,<sup>o</sup>
With which and other spellles like terrible,
He bade awake blacke Plutoes griesly Dame,<sup>3</sup>
And cursèd heaven, and spake reprochfull shame
Of highest God, the Lord of life and light;
A bold bad man, that dared to call by name
Great Gorgon,<sup>4</sup> Prince of darknesse and dead night,
At which Cocytus quakes, and Styx is put to flight.

38

And forth he cald out of deepe darknesse dred

Legions of Sprights,o the which like little flies<sup>5</sup>
Fluttering about his ever damnèd hed,
A-waite whereto their service he applyes,
To aide his friends, or frayo his enimies:
Of those he chose out two, the falsest twoo,
And fittest for to forge true-seeming lyes;
The one of them he gave a message too,
The other by him selfe staide other worke to doo.

39

He making speedy way through spersèdo ayre,
And through the world of waters wide and deepe,
To Morpheus house doth hastily repaire.
Amid the bowels of the earth full steepe,
And low, where dawning day doth never peepe,
His dwelling is; there Tethyso his wet bed
Doth ever wash, and Cynthia<sup>6</sup> stillo doth steepe
In silver deaw his ever-drouping hed,
Whiles sado Night over him her mantle black doth spred.

40

Whose double gates he findeth lockèd fast,
The one faire framed of burnisht Yvory,
The other all with silver overcast;
And wakefull dogges before them farre do lye,
Watching to banish Care their enemy,
Who oft is wonto to trouble gentle Sleepe.
By them the Sprite doth passe in quietly,
And unto Morpheus comes, whom drownèd deepe
In drowsie fit he findes: of nothing he takes keepe.o

41

And more, to lulle him in his slumber soft,
A trickling streame from high rocke tumbling downe
And ever-drizling raine upon the loft,o

Mixt with a murmuring winde, much like the sowne<sup>o</sup>
Of swarming Bees, did cast him in a swowne:<sup>o</sup>
No other noyse, nor peoples troublous cryes,
As still<sup>o</sup> are wont t'annoy the wallèd towne,
Might there be heard: but carelesse<sup>o</sup> Quiet lyes,
Wrapt in eternall silence farre from enemyes.<sup>7</sup>

42

The messenger approching to him spake,
But his wast<sup>o</sup> wordes returnd to him in vaine:
So sound he slept, that nought mought<sup>o</sup> him awake.
Then rudely he him thrust, and pusht with paine,<sup>o</sup>
Whereat he gan to stretch: but he againe
Shooke him so hard, that forcèd him to speake.
As one then in a dreame, whose dryer braine<sup>8</sup>
Is tost with troubled sights and fancies<sup>o</sup> weake,
He mumbled soft, but would not all his silence breake.

43

The Sprite then gan more boldly him to wake,
And threatned unto him the dreaded name
Of Hecate:<sup>o</sup> whereat he gan to quake,
And lifting up his lumpish<sup>o</sup> head, with blame
Halfe angry askèd him, for what<sup>o</sup> he came.
"Hither," quoth he, "me Archimago<sup>9</sup> sent,
He that the stubborne Sprites can wisely tame,
He bids thee to him send for his intent
A fit false dreame, that can delude the sleepers sent."<sup>o</sup>

44

The God obayde, and calling forth straight way
A diverse<sup>o</sup> dreame out of his prison darke,
Delivered it to him, and downe did lay
His heavie head, devoide of carefull carke,<sup>o</sup>

Whose sences all were straight benumbed and starke.<sup>1</sup>
He backe returning by the Yvorie dore,<sup>2</sup>
Remounted up as light as chearefull Larke,
And on his litle winges the dreame he bore
In hast unto his Lord, where he him left afore.

45

Who all this while with charmes and hidden artes,
Had made a Lady of that other Spright,
And framed of liquid ayre her tender partes
So lively,<sup>o</sup> and so like in all mens sight,
That weaker<sup>o</sup> sence it could have ravisht<sup>o</sup> quight:
The maker selfe for all his wondrous witt,
Was nigh beguiled<sup>o</sup> with so goodly sight:
Her all in white he clad, and over it
Cast a blacke stole, most like to seeme for Una<sup>3</sup> fit.<sup>o</sup>

46

Now when that ydle dreame was to him brought Unto that Elfin knight he bad him fly,
Where he slept soundly void of evill thought
And with false shewes abuse his fantasy,<sup>o</sup>
In sort as<sup>o</sup> he him schoolèd privily:
And that new creature borne without her dew,<sup>o</sup>
Full of the makers guile, with usage sly
He taught to imitate that Lady trew,
Whose semblance she did carrie under feigned hew.<sup>o</sup>

47

Thus well instructed, to their worke they hast
And comming where the knight in slomber lay
The one upon his hardy head him plast,<sup>o</sup>
And made him dreame of loves and lustfull play,
That nigh his manly hart did melt away,

Bathèd in wanton blis and wicked joy:
Then seemèd him his Lady by him lay,
And to him playnd,<sup>o</sup> how that false wingèd boy<sup>o</sup>
Her chast hart had subdewd, to learne Dame pleasures toy.<sup>o</sup>

48

And she her selfe of beautie soveraigne Queene,
Faire Venus seemde unto his bed to bring
Her, whom he waking evermore did weene<sup>o</sup>
To be the chastest flowre, that ay<sup>o</sup> did spring
On earthly braunch, the daughter of a king,
Now a loose Leman<sup>o</sup> to vile service bound:
And eke<sup>o</sup> the Graces seemèd all to sing,
Hymen iô Hymen, dauncing all around,
Whilst freshest Flora her with Yvie girlond crownd.<sup>4</sup>

49

In this great passion of unwonted<sup>o</sup> lust,
Or wonted feare of doing ought amis,
He started up, as seeming to mistrust<sup>o</sup>
Some secret ill, or hidden foe of his:
Lo there before his face his Lady is,
Under blake stole hyding her bayted hooke,
And as halfe blushing offred him to kis,
With gentle blandishment and lovely<sup>o</sup> looke,
Most like that virgin true, which for her knight him took.

50

All cleane dismayd to see so uncouth<sup>o</sup> sight,
And halfe enragèd at her shamelesse guise,
He thought have slaine her in his fierce despight:<sup>o</sup>
But hasty heat tempring with sufferance<sup>o</sup> wise,
He stayde his hand, and gan himselfe advise
To prove his sense, and tempt<sup>o</sup> her faignèd truth.
Wringing her hands in wemens pitteous wise,

Tho can<sup>o</sup> she weepe, to stirre up gentle ruth,<sup>o</sup>
Both for her noble bloud, and for her tender youth.

51

And said, "Ah Sir, my liege Lord and my love,
Shall I accuse the hidden cruell fate,
And mightie causes wrought in heaven above,
Or the blind God, that doth me thus amate,<sup>o</sup>
For<sup>o</sup> hopèd love to winne me certaine hate?
Yet thus perforce<sup>o</sup> he bids me do, or die.
Die is my dew:<sup>5</sup> yet rew<sup>o</sup> my wretched state
You, whom my hard avenging destinie
Hath made judge of my life or death indifferently.<sup>o</sup>

52

"Your owne deare sake forst me at first to leave
My Fathers kingdome," There she stopt with teares;
Her swollen hart her speach seemd to bereave,<sup>o</sup>
And then againe begun, "My weaker yeares
Captived to fortune and frayle worldly feares,
Fly to your faith for succour and sure ayde:
Let me not dye in languor<sup>o</sup> and long teares."
"Why Dame," quoth he, "what hath ye thus dismayd?
What frayes<sup>o</sup> ye, that were wont to comfort me affrayd?"

53

"Love of your selfe," she said, "and deare<sup>o</sup> constraint
Lets me not sleepe, but wast the wearie night
In secret anguish and unpittied plaint,
Whiles you in carelesse sleepe are drownèd quight."
Her doubtfull words made that redoubted<sup>6</sup> knight
Suspect her truth: yet since no'untruth he knew,
Her fawning love with foule disdainfull spight
He would not shend,<sup>o</sup> but said, "Deare dame I rew,
That for my sake unknowne such grieve unto you grew.

54

"Assure your selfe, it fell not all to ground;
For all so deare as life is to my hart,
I deeme your love, and hold me to you bound;
Ne let vaine feares procure your needlesse smart,<sup>o</sup>
Where cause is none, but to your rest depart."
Not all content, yet seemd she to appease<sup>o</sup>
Her mournefull plaintes, beguilèd of her art,<sup>o</sup>
And fed with words, that could not chuse<sup>o</sup> but please,
So slyding softly forth, she turnd<sup>o</sup> as to her ease.

55

Long after lay he musing at her mood,
Much grieved to thinke that gentle Dame so light,<sup>o</sup>
For whose defence he was to shed his blood.
At last dull wearinesse of former fight
Having yrockt a sleepe his irkesome<sup>7</sup> spright,
That troublous dreame gan freshly tosse his braine,
With bowres and beds, and Ladies deare delight:
But when he saw his labour all was vaine,
With that misformèd spright<sup>8</sup> he backe returnd againe.

Endnotes

- Note 9: Imitating Chaucerian English, Spenser sometimes uses the prefix y as the sign of a past participle. Return to reference 9
- Note 1: A compressed reference to Revelation 1:18: "I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore." Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Having greatest power (often applied to medical remedies). Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Compare Revelation 19:11: "And I saw heaven opened, and behold a white horse; and he that sat upon him was called Faithful and True." Return to reference 3

- Note 4: Facial expression; mood.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: His lover's (that is, the earth's).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Either because pine was used for ships or because of the tree's soaring height.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: That is, exudes resin continuously. Spenser in these stanzas imitates Chaucer's catalog of trees in the Parliament of Fowls; the convention goes back to Ovid.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Holly or holm oak, both suitable for carving.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Needless because the spear is used only on horseback.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Loathsomeness. The description echoes both classical and biblical monsters (see Revelation 9:7–10).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: That is, knight of Faerie Land.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: In both the usual sense and the sense of "entangled condition."Return to reference 3
- Note 4: That is, his gallbladder (considered the seat of anger) was violently disturbed.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Alluding (at one level) to books and pamphlets of Catholic propaganda, notably attacks on Queen Elizabeth.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Revelation 16:13: "And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet."Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Cesspool (that is, her womb or organ of excretion).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Dressed in long black garments.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: That is, it is not fitting for a holy hermit to meddle ("mell") with such things.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Hail Mary (Latin); that is, a Catholic prayer.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Here (as often) Morpheus, the classical god of dreams, is conflated with his father, Somnus, god of sleep.Return to reference 2

- Note 3: Proserpine, as patron of witchcraft and wife of Pluto, god of the underworld.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Demogorgon, in some myths the progenitor of all the gods, so powerful that the mention of his name causes hell's rivers (Styx and Cocytus) to tremble.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The simile associates him with Beelzebub (Lord of Flies), the name given to "the prince of the devils."Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Diana, as goddess of the moon.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Spenser is imitating descriptions of the caves of Morpheus in Chaucer (Book of the Duchess, lines 153–77) and of Somnus in Ovid (Metamorphoses 11.592–632).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: According to the old physiology, elderly people and other light sleepers had too little moisture in the brain.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The name can be construed as meaning both "archmagician" and "architect of images."Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Immediately ("straight") benumbed and paralyzed.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: According to Homer (Odyssey 19.562–67) and Virgil (Aeneid 6.893–96), false dreams come through Sleep's ivory gate, true dreams through his gate of horn.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Her name means "one, unity." Elizabethan readers would know the Latin phrase Una Vera Fides (One True Faith) and also the proverb "Truth is one."Return to reference 3
- Note 4:
The Three Graces of classical mythology were personifications of grace and beauty; here they sing a call to the pleasures of the marriage bed (Hymen was god of marriage). In the March eclogue of The Shepheardes Calender, E. K. glossed Flora as "the Goddess of flowres, but indede (as saith Tacitus) a famous harlot."
Return to reference 4
- Note 5: That is, I deserve to die.Return to reference 5

- Note 6: Dreaded, but also “doubting again.” “Doubtfull”: fearful; also questionable, arousing doubt.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Tired, but also troublesome.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, with the spirit impersonating Una.Return to reference 8

Canto 2

*The guilefull great Enchaunter parts
The Redcrosse Knight from Truth:
Into whose stead faire falshood steps,
And workes him wofull ruth.*<sup>o</sup>

1

By this the Northerne wagoner<sup>9</sup> had set
His seven fold teame behind the stedfast starre,<sup>1</sup>
That was in Ocean waves yet never wet,
But firme is fixt, and sendeth light from farre
To all, that in the wide deepe wandring arre:
And chearefull Chaunticlere<sup>2</sup> with his note shrill
Had warnèd once, that Phoebus fiery carre<sup>3</sup>
In hast was climbing up the Easterne hill,
Full envious that night so long his roome<sup>o</sup> did fill.

2

When those accursèd messengers of hell,
That feigning dreame, and that faire-forgèd Spright
Came to their wicked maister, and gan tell
Their bootelesse<sup>o</sup> paines, and ill succeeding night:
Who all in rage to see his skilfull might Deluded<sup>o</sup> so, gan threaten hellish paine
And sad Proserpines wrath, them to affright.
But when he saw his threatning was but vaine,
He cast about, and searcht his balefull<sup>o</sup> bookes againe.

3

Eftsoones<sup>o</sup> he tooke that miscreated faire,
And that false other Spright, on whom he spread
A seeming body of the subtile<sup>o</sup> aire,
Like a young Squire, in loves and lusty-hed

His wanton dayes that ever loosely led,
Without regard of armes and dreaded fight:
Those two he tooke, and in a secret bed,
Covered with darknesse and misdeeming<sup>o</sup> night,
Them both together laid, to joy in vaine delight.

4

Forthwith he runnes with feignèd faithfull hast
Unto his guest, who after troublous sights
And dreames, gan now to take more sound repast,<sup>o</sup>
Whom suddenly he wakes with fearefull frights,
As one aghast with feends or damnèd sprights,
And to him cals, "Rise rise unhappy Swaine,<sup>o</sup>
That here wex<sup>o</sup> old in sleepe, whiles wicked wights
Have knit themselves in Venus shamefull chaine;
Come see, where your false Lady doth her honour staine."

5

All in amaze he suddenly up start
With sword in hand, and with the old man went;
Who soone him brought into a secret part,
Where that false couple were full closely ment<sup>o</sup>
In wanton lust and lewd embracèment:
Which when he saw, he burnt with gealous fire,
The eye of reason was with rage yblent,<sup>o</sup>
And would have slaine them in his furious ire,
But hardly<sup>o</sup> was restrained of<sup>o</sup> that agèd sire.

6

Returning to his bed in torment great,
And bitter anguish of his guiltie sight,<sup>4</sup>
He could not rest, but did his stout heart eat,<sup>5</sup>
And wast his inward gall with deepe despight,<sup>o</sup>
Yrkesome<sup>o</sup> of life, and too long lingring night.

At last faire Hesperus<sup>6</sup> in highest skie
Had spent his lampe, and brought forth dawning light,
Then up he rose, and clad him hastily;
The Dwarfe him brought his steed: so both away do fly.

7

Now when the rosy-fingred Morning faire,
Weary of aged Tithones<sup>7</sup> saffron bed,
Had spread her purple robe through deawy aire,
And the high hils Titan<sup>8</sup> discovered,<sup>9</sup>
The royall virgin shooke off drowsy-hed,
And rising forth out of her baser<sup>10</sup> bowre,
Lookt for her knight, who far away was fled,
And for her Dwarfe, that wont<sup>11</sup> to wait each houre:
Then gan she waile and weepe, to see that woefull stowre.<sup>12</sup>

8

And after him she rode with so much speede
As her slow beast could make; but all in vaine:
For him so far had borne his light-foot steede,
Prickèd with wrath and fiery fierce disdaine,<sup>13</sup>
That him to follow was but fruitlesse paine;
Yet she her weary limbes would never rest,
But every hill and dale, each wood and plaine
Did search, sore grievèd in her gentle brest,
He so ungently left her, whom she lovèd best.

9

But subtile<sup>14</sup> Archimago, when his guests
He saw divided into double parts,
And Una wandring in woods and forrests,
Th' end of his drift,<sup>15</sup> he praised his divelish arts
That had such might over true meaning harts;
Yet rests not so, but other meanes doth make,
How he may worke unto her further smarts:<sup>16</sup>

For her he hated as the hissing snake,
And in her many troubles did most pleasure take.

10

He then devisde himselfe how to disguise;
For by his mightie science<sup>o</sup> he could take
As many formes and shapes in seeming wise,<sup>o</sup>
As ever Proteus<sup>8</sup> to himselfe could make:
Sometime a fowle, sometime a fish in lake,
Now like a foxe, now like a dragon fell,<sup>o</sup>
That of himselfe he oft for feare would quake,
And oft would flie away. O who can tell
The hidden power of herbes, and might of Magicke spell?

11

But now seemde best, the person to put on
Of that good knight, his late beguiled guest:
In mighty armes he was yclad anon,
And silver shield: upon his coward brest
A bloody crosse, and on his craven crest
A bounch of haire discoloured diversly:<sup>o</sup>
Full jolly<sup>o</sup> knight he seemde, and well addrest,<sup>o</sup>
And when he sate upon his courser free,<sup>o</sup>
Saint George himself ye would have deemed him to be.

12

But he the knight, whose semblaunt<sup>o</sup> he did beare,
The true Saint George was wandred far away,
Still flying from<sup>o</sup> his thoughts and gealous feare;
Will was his guide, and grieve led him astray.
At last him chaunst to meete upon the way
A faithlesse Sarazin<sup>9</sup> all armed to point,<sup>o</sup>
In whose great shield was writ with letters gay
Sans foy:<sup>1</sup> full large of limbe and every joint

He was, and carèd not for God or man a point.°

13

He had a faire companion of his way,
A goodly Lady clad in scarlot red,
Purfled° with gold and pearle of rich assay,<sup>2</sup>
And like a Persian mitre on her hed
She wore, with crownes and owches° garnishèd,
The which her lavish lovers to her gave;<sup>3</sup>
Her wanton° palfrey<sup>4</sup> all was overspred
With tinsell trappings, woven like a wave,
Whose bridle rung with golden bells and bosses brave.°

14

With faire disport° and courting dalliaunce
She intertaine her lover all the way:
But when she saw the knight his speare advaunce,
She soone left off her mirth and wanton play,
And bad her knight addresse him to the fray:
His foe was nigh at hand. He prickt with pride
And hope to winne his Ladies heart that day,
Forth spurred fast: adowne his coursers side
The red blood trickling staid the way, as he did ride.

15

The knight of the Redcrosse when him he spide,
Spurring so hote with rage dispiteous,°
Gan fairely couch° his speare, and towards ride:
Soone meete they both, both fell° and furious,
That daunted° with their forces hideous,
Their steeds do stagger, and amazèd° stand,
And eke° themselves too rudely rigorous,° Astonied° with the stroke of their owne hand,
Do backe rebut,° and each to other yeeldeth land.

16

As when two rams stird with ambitious pride,
Fight for the rule of the rich fleecèd flocke,
Their hornèd fronts so fierce on either side
Do meete, that with the terrour of the shocke
Astonied both, stand sencelesse as a blocke,
Forgetfull of the hanging<sup>o</sup> victory:
So stood these twaine, unmovèd as a rocke,
Both staring fierce, and holding idely
The broken reliques of their former cruelty.

17

The Sarazin sore daunted with the buffe
Snatcheth his sword, and fiercely to him flies;
Who well it wards,<sup>o</sup> and quyteth<sup>o</sup> cuff with cuff:
Each others equall puissaunce envies,<sup>o</sup>
And through their iron sides with cruell spies<sup>o</sup>
Does seeke to perce: repining courage yields
No foote to foe. The flashing fier flies
As from a forge out of their burning shields,
And streames of purple bloud new dies the verdant fields.

18

"Curse on that Crosse," quoth then the Sarazin,
"That keepes thy body from the bitter fit;<sup>o</sup>
Dead long ygoe I wote<sup>o</sup> thou haddest bin,
Had not that charme from thee forwarnèd<sup>o</sup> it:
But yet I warne thee now assurèd<sup>o</sup> sitt,
And hide thy head." Therewith upon his crest<sup>o</sup>
With rigour<sup>o</sup> so outrageöus he smitt,
That a large share it hewd out of the rest,
And glauncing downe his shield, from blame him fairely blest.<sup>5</sup>

19

Who thereat wondrous wroth, the sleeping spark
Of native vertue<sup>o</sup> gan eftsoones<sup>o</sup> revive,
And at his haughtie helmet making mark,<sup>o</sup>
So hugely<sup>o</sup> stroke, that it the steele did rive,
And cleft his head. He tumbling downe alive,
With bloudy mouth his mother earth did kis,
Greeting his grave: his grudging<sup>o</sup> ghost did strive
With the fraile flesh; at last it flitted is,
Whither the soules do fly of men, that live amis.

20

The Lady when she saw her champion fall,
Like the old ruines of a broken towre,
Staid not to waile his woefull funerall,<sup>o</sup>
But from him fled away with all her powre;
Who after her as hastily gan scowre,<sup>o</sup>
Bidding the Dwarfe with him to bring away
The Sarazins shield, signe of the conqueroure.
Her soone he overtooke, and bad to stay,
For present cause was none of dread her to dismay.<sup>6</sup>

21

She turning backe with ruefull<sup>o</sup> countenance,
Cride, "Mercy mercy Sir vouchsafe to show
On silly<sup>o</sup> Dame, subject to hard mischaunce,
And to your mighty will." Her humblesse low
In so ritch weedes<sup>o</sup> and seeming glorious show,
Did much emmove his stout heroicke heart,
And said, "Deare dame, your suddein overthrow
Much rueth<sup>o</sup> me; but now put feare apart,
And tell, both who ye be, and who that tooke your part."

22

Melting in teares, then gan she thus lament;
"The wretched woman, whom unhappy howre

Hath now made thrall<sup>o</sup> to your commandement,
Before that angry heavens list to lowre,<sup>o</sup>
And fortune false betraide me to your powre,
Was (O what now availeth that I was!)
Borne the sole daughter of an Emperour,
He that the wide West under his rule has,
And high hath set his throne, where Tiberis doth pas.<sup>7</sup>

23

"He in the first flowre of my freshest age,
Betrothèd me unto the onely haire<sup>o</sup>
Of a most mighty king, most rich and sage;<sup>8</sup>
Was never Prince so faithfull and so faire,
Was never Prince so meeke and debonaire;<sup>o</sup>
But ere my hopèd day of spousall shone,
My dearest Lord fell from high honours staire,
Into the hands of his accursèd fone,<sup>o</sup>
And cruelly was slaine, that shall I ever mone.

24

"His blessèd body spoild of lively breath,
Was afterward, I know not how, convaide<sup>o</sup>
And fro<sup>o</sup> me hid: of whose most innocent death
When tidings came to me unhappy maid,
O how great sorrow my sad soule assaid.<sup>o</sup>
Then forth I went his woefull corse to find,
And many yeares throughout the world I straid,
A virgin widow, whose deepe wounded mind
With love, long time did languish as the stricken hind.<sup>o</sup>

25

"At last it chauncèd this proud Sarazin
To meete me wandring, who perforce<sup>o</sup> me led
With him away, but yet could never win
The fort, that Ladies hold in soveraigne dread.<sup>o</sup>

There lies he now with foule dishonour dead,
Who whiles he livde, was callèd proud Sans foy,
The eldest of three brethren, all three bred
Of one bad sire, whose youngest is Sans joy,
And twixt them both was borne the bloody bold Sans loy.<sup>9</sup>

26

"In this sad plight, friendlesse, unfortunate,
Now miserable I Fidessa<sup>o</sup> dwell,
Craving of you in pitty of my state,
To do none<sup>o</sup> ill, if please ye not do well."
He in great passion all this while did dwell,<sup>o</sup>
More busying his quicke eyes, her face to view,
Then his dull eares, to heare what she did tell;
And said, "Faire Lady hart of flint would rew
The undeservèd woes and sorrowes, which ye shew.

27

"Henceforth in safe assuraunce may ye rest,
Having both found a new friend you to aid,
And lost an old foe, that did you molest:
Better new friend than an old foe is<sup>o</sup> said."
With chaunge of cheare<sup>o</sup> the seeming simple maid
Let fall her eyen, as shamefast<sup>o</sup> to the earth,
And yeelding soft, in that she nought gain-said,<sup>o</sup>
So forth they rode, he feining<sup>o</sup> seemely merth,
And she coy lookes: so dainty they say maketh derth.<sup>1</sup>

28

Long time they thus together traveilèd,
Till weary of their way, they came at last,
Where grew two goodly trees, that faire did spred
Their armes abroad, with gray mosse overcast,
And their greene leaves trembling with every blast,<sup>o</sup>
Made a calme shadow far in compasse round:

The fearefull Shepheard often there aghast
Under them never sat, ne wont<sup>o</sup> there sound
His mery oaten pipe, but shund th'unlucky ground.

29

But this good knight soone as he them can<sup>o</sup> spie,
For the coole shade him thither hastily got:
For golden Phoebus now ymounted hie,
From fiery wheeles of his faire chariot
Hurlèd his beame so scorching cruell hot,
That living creature mote<sup>o</sup> it not abide;
And his new Lady it endured not.
There they alight, in hope themselves to hide
From the fierce heat, and rest their weary limbs a tide.<sup>o</sup>

30

Faire seemely pleasaunce<sup>o</sup> each to other makes,
With goodly purposes<sup>o</sup> there as they sit:
And in his falsèd<sup>o</sup> fancy he her takes
To be the fairest wight<sup>o</sup> that livèd yit;
Which to expresse, he bends<sup>o</sup> his gentle wit,<sup>o</sup>
And thinking of those braunches greene to frame
A girland for her dainty forehead fit,
He pluckt a bough; out of whose rift there came
Small drops of gory bloud, that trickled downe the same.

31

Therewith a piteous yelling voyce was heard,
Crying, "O spare with guilty hands to teare
My tender sides in this rough rynd<sup>o</sup> embard,<sup>o</sup>
But fly, ah fly far hence away, for feare
Least<sup>o</sup> to you hap, that happened to me heare,
And to this wretched Lady, my deare love,
O too deare love, love bought with death too deare."
Astond<sup>o</sup> he stood, and up his haire did hove,<sup>o</sup>

And with that suddein horror could no member move.

32

At last whenas the dreadfull passiön
Was overpast, and manhood well awake,
Yet musing at the straunge occasiön,
And doubting much his sence, he thus bespake;
"What voyce of damnèd Ghost from Limbo<sup>2</sup> lake,
Or guilefull spright wandring in empty aire,
Both which fraile men do oftentimes mistake,<sup>o</sup>
Sends to my doubtfull eares these speaches rare,<sup>o</sup>
And ruefull plaints, me bidding guiltlesse bloud to spare?"

33

Then groning deepe, "Nor<sup>o</sup> damnèd Ghost," quoth he,
"Nor guilefull sprite to thee these wordes doth speake,
But once a man Fradubio,<sup>3</sup> now a tree,
Wretched man, wretched tree; whose nature weake,
A cruell witch her cursèd will to wreake,
Hath thus transformed, and plast in open plaines,
Where Boreas<sup>o</sup> doth blow full bitter bleake,
And scorching Sunne does dry my secret vaines:
For though a tree I seeme, yet cold and heat me paines."

34

"Say on Fradubio then, or<sup>o</sup> man, or tree," Quoth then the knight, "by whose mischievous arts
Art thou misshapèd thus, as now I see?
He oft finds med'cine, who his grieffe imparts;<sup>o</sup>
But double griefs afflict concealing harts,
As raging flames who striveth to suppresses."
"The author then," said he, "of all my smarts,
Is one Duessa<sup>4</sup> a false sorceresse,
That many errant<sup>o</sup> knights hath brought to wretchednesse.

35

"In prime of youthly yeares, when corage hot
The fire of love and joy of chevalree
First kindled in my brest, it was my lot
To love this gentle Lady, whom ye see,
Now not a Lady, but a seeming tree;
With whom as once I rode accompanyde,
Me chauncèd of a knight encountred bee,
That had a like faire Lady by his syde,
Like a faire Lady, but did fowle Duessa hyde.

36

"Whose forgèd beauty he did take in hand,<sup>o</sup>
All other Dames to have exceeded farre,
I in defence of mine did likewise stand,
Mine, that did then shine as the Morning starre:
So both to battell fierce arraungèd arre,
In which his harder fortune was to fall
Under my speare: such is the dye<sup>o</sup> of warre:
His Lady left as a prise martiäll,<sup>o</sup>
Did yield her comely person, to be at my call.

37

"So doubly loved of Ladies unlike<sup>o</sup> faire, Th'one seeming such, the other such indeede,
One day in doubt I cast<sup>o</sup> for to compare,
Whether<sup>o</sup> in beauties glorie did excede;
A Rosy girlond was the victors meede:<sup>o</sup>
Both seemde to win, and both seemde won to bee,
So hard the discord was to be agreede.
Fraelissa<sup>5</sup> was as faire, as faire mote bee,
And ever false Duessa seemde as faire as shee.

38

"The wicked witch now seeing all this while
The doubtfull ballaunce equally to sway,
What not by right, she cast to win by guile,
And by her hellish science<sup>o</sup> raisd streight way
A foggy mist, that overcast the day,
And a dull blast, that breathing on her face,
Dimmed her former beauties shining ray,
And with foule ugly forme did her disgrace:
Then was she<sup>o</sup> faire alone, when none was faire in place.<sup>6</sup>

39

"Then cride she out, 'Fye, fye, deformèd wight,
Whose borrowed beautie now appeareth plaine
To have before bewitchèd all mens sight;
O leave her soone, or let her soone be slaine.'
Her lothly visage viewing with disdain,
Eftsoones<sup>o</sup> I thought her such, as she me told,
And would have kild her; but with faignèd paine,
The false witch did my wrathfull hand withhold;
So left her, where she now is turnd to treën mould.<sup>o</sup>

40

"Thens forth I tooke Duessa for my Dame,
And in the witch unweeting<sup>o</sup> joyd long time,
Ne ever wist,<sup>o</sup> but that she was the same,
Till on a day (that day is every Prime,<sup>7</sup>
When Witches wont<sup>o</sup> do penance for their crime)
I chaunst to see her in her proper hew,<sup>o</sup>
Bathing her selfe in origane and thyme:<sup>8</sup>
A filthy foule old woman I did vew,
That ever to have toucht her, I did deadly rew.<sup>o</sup>

41

"Her neather partes misshapen, monstrous,

Were hidd in water, that I could not see,
But they did seeme more foule and hideous,
Then<sup>o</sup> womans shape man would beleeeve to bee.
Thens forth from her most beastly companie
I gan refraine, in minde to slip away,
Soone as appeared safe opportunitie:
For danger great, if not assured decay<sup>o</sup>
I saw before mine eyes, if I were knowne to stray.

42

"The divelish hag by chaunges of my cheare<sup>o</sup>
Perceived my thought, and drownd in sleepe night,
With wicked herbes and ointments did besmeare
My bodie all, through charmes and magicke might,
That all my senses were bereavèd quight:<sup>o</sup>
Then brought she me into this desert waste,
And by my wretched lovers side me pight,<sup>o</sup>
Where now enclosd in wooden wals full faste,<sup>9</sup>
Banisht from living wights, our wearie dayes we waste."

43

"But how long time," said then the Elfin knight,
"Are you in this misformèd house to dwell?"
"We may not chaunge," quoth he, "this evil plight,
Till we be bathèd in a living well;<sup>1</sup>
That is the terme prescribèd by the spell."
"O how," said he, "mote<sup>o</sup> I that well out find,
That may restore you to your wonted well?"<sup>o</sup>
"Time and suffisèd fates to former kynd Shall us restore,<sup>2</sup> none else from hence may us unbynd."

44

The false Duessa, now Fidessa hight,<sup>o</sup>
Heard how in vaine Fradubio did lament,

And knew well all was true. But the good knight
Full of sad feare and ghastly dreriment,<sup>o</sup>
When all this speech the living tree had spent,
The bleeding bough did thrust into the ground,
That from the bloud he might be innocent,
And with fresh clay did close the wooden wound:
Then turning to his Lady, dead with feare her found.

45

Her seeming dead he found with feignèd feare,
As all unweeting of that well she knew,<sup>3</sup>
And paynd himselfe with busie care to reare
Her out of carelesse<sup>o</sup> swowne. Her eylids blew
And dimmèd sight with pale and deadly hew<sup>o</sup>
At last she up gan lift: with trembling cheare
Her up he tooke, too simple and too trew,
And oft her kist. At length all passèd feare,<sup>4</sup>
He set her on her steede, and forward forth did beare.

Canto 3

*Forsaken Truth long seekes her love,
And makes the Lyon mylde,
Marres<sup>o</sup> blind Devotions mart,<sup>o</sup> and fals
In hand of leachour<sup>o</sup> vylde.*

1

Nought is there under heav'ns wide hollownesse,<sup>o</sup>
That moves more deare compassion of mind,
Then beautie brought t'unworthy<sup>o</sup> wretchednesse
Through envies snares or fortunes freakes<sup>o</sup> unkind:
I, whether lately through her brightnesse blind,
Or through alleageance and fast fealtie,
Which I do owe unto all woman kind,
Feele my heart perst<sup>o</sup> with so great agonie,
When such I see, that all for pittie I could die.

2

And now it is empassionèd<sup>o</sup> so deepe,
For fairest Unas sake, of whom I sing,
That my fraile eyes these lines with teares do steepe,
To thinke how she through guilefull handeling,<sup>o</sup>
Though true as touch,<sup>o</sup> though daughter of a king,
Though faire as ever living wight was faire,
Though nor in word nor deede ill meriting,
Is from her knight divorcèd<sup>o</sup> in despaire
And her due loves derived<sup>o</sup> to that vile witches share.

3

Yet she most faithfull Ladie all this while Forsaken, wofull, solitarie mayd
Farre from all peoples prease,<sup>o</sup> as in exile,
In wildernessse and wastfull<sup>o</sup> deserts strayd,

To seeke her knight; who subtilly betrayd
Through that late vision, which th'Enchaunter wrought,
Had her abandond. She of nought affrayd,
Through woods and wastnesse<sup>o</sup> wide him daily sought;
Yet wishèd tydings none<sup>o</sup> of him unto her brought.

4

One day nigh wearie of the yrkesome way,
From her unhastie<sup>o</sup> beast she did alight,
And on the grasse her daintie limbes did lay
In secret shadow,<sup>o</sup> farre from all mens sight:
From her faire head her fillet she undight,<sup>5</sup>
And laid her stole aside. Her angels face
As the great eye of heaven shynèd bright,
And made a sunshine in the shadie place;
Did never mortall eye behold such heavenly grace.

5

It fortunèd<sup>o</sup> out of the thickest wood
A ramping<sup>o</sup> Lyon rushèd suddainly,
Hunting full greedie after salvage blood;<sup>o</sup>
Soone as the royall virgin he did spy,
With gaping mouth at her ran greedily,
To have attonce<sup>o</sup> devoured her tender corse;<sup>o</sup>
But to the pray when as he drew more ny,
His bloudie rage asswagèd with remorse,
And with the sight amazd, forgat his furious forse.

6

In stead thereof he kist her wearie feet,
And lickt her lilly hands with fawning tong,
As<sup>o</sup> he her wrongèd innocence did weet.<sup>o</sup>
O how can beautie maister the most strong,
And simple truth subdue avenging wrong?
Whose yeelded pride and proud submissiön,

Still dreading death, when she had markèd long,
Her hart gan melt in great compassiön,
And drizling teares did shed for pure affectiön.

7

"The Lyon Lord of everie beast in field," Quoth she, "his princely puissance<sup>o</sup> doth abate,
And mightie proud to humble weake does yield,
Forgetfull of the hungry rage, which late
Him prickt, in pittie of my sad estate:<sup>o</sup>
But he my Lyon, and my noble Lord,
How does he find in cruell hart to hate
Her that him loved, and ever most adord,
As the God of my life? why hath he me abhord?"

8

Redounding<sup>o</sup> teares did choke th'end of her plaint,
Which softly ecchoed from the neighbour wood;
And sad to see her sorrowfull constraint<sup>o</sup>
The kingly beast upon her gazing stood;
With pittie calmd, downe fell his angry mood.
At last in close hart shutting up her paine,
Arose the virgin borne of heavenly brood,<sup>o</sup>
And to her snowy Palfrey got againe,
To seeke her strayèd Champion, if she might attaine.<sup>o</sup>

9

The Lyon would not leave her desolate,
But with her went along, as a strong gard
Of her chast person, and a faithfull mate
Of her sad troubles and misfortunes hard:
Still<sup>o</sup> when she slept, he kept both watch and ward,<sup>o</sup>
And when she wakt, he waited diligent,
With humble service to her will prepard:
From her faire eyes he tooke commaundement,

And ever by her lookes conceivèd her intent.

10

Long she thus travelèd through deserts wyde,
By which she thought her wandring knight shold pas,
Yet never shew<sup>o</sup> of living wight espyde;
Till that at length she found the troden gras,
In which the tract<sup>o</sup> of peoples footing was,
Under the steepe foot of a mountaine hore;<sup>o</sup>
The same she followes, till at last she has
A damzell spyde slow footing her before,<sup>6</sup>
That on her shoulders sad<sup>o</sup> a pot of water bore.

11

To whom approaching she to her gan call,
To weet,<sup>o</sup> if dwelling place were nigh at hand;
But the rude<sup>o</sup> wench her answered nought at all,
She could not heare, nor speake, nor understand;<sup>7</sup>
Till seeing by her side the Lyon stand,
With suddaine feare her pitcher downe she threw,
And fled away: for never in that land
Face of faire Ladie she before did vew,
And that dread Lyons looke her cast in deadly<sup>o</sup> hew.

12

Full fast she fled, ne ever lookt behynd,
As if her life upon the wager lay,<sup>o</sup>
And home she came, whereas her mother blynd
Sate in eternall night: nought could she say,
But suddaine catching hold, did her dismay
With quaking hands, and other signes of feare:
Who full of ghastly fright and cold affray,<sup>o</sup>
Gan shut the dore. By this arrivèd there
Dame Una, wearie Dame, and entrance did requere.<sup>o</sup>

13

Which when none yeelded, her unruly Page
With his rude<sup>o</sup> clawes the wicket<sup>o</sup> open rent,
And let her in; where of his cruell rage
Nigh dead with feare, and faint astonishment,<sup>8</sup>
She found them both in darkesome corner pent;<sup>o</sup>
Where that old woman day and night did pray
Upon her beades<sup>o</sup> devoutly penitent;
Nine hundred Pater nosters every day,
And thrise nine hundred Aves she was wont to say.<sup>9</sup>

14

And to augment her painefull pennance more,
Thrise every weeke in ashes she did sit,
And next her wrinkled skin rough sackcloth wore,<sup>1</sup>
And thrise three times did fast from any bit:<sup>o</sup>
But now for feare her beads she did forget.
Whose needlesse dread for to remove away,
Faire Una framèd words and count'nance fit:
Which hardly<sup>o</sup> doen, at length she gan them pray,
That in their cotage small, that night she rest her may.<sup>2</sup>

15

The day is spent, and commeth drowsie night,
When every creature shrowded is in sleepe;
Sad Una downe her laies in wearie plight,
And at her feet the Lyon watch doth keepe:
In stead of rest, she does lament, and weepe
For the late<sup>o</sup> losse of her deare lovèd knight,
And sighes, and grones, and evermore does steepe
Her tender brest in bitter teares all night,
All night she thinks too long, and often lookes for light.

16

Now when Aldeboran was mounted hie
Above the shynie Cassiopeias chaire,<sup>3</sup>
And all in deadly sleepe did drownèd lie,
One knockèd at the dore, and in would fare;<sup>o</sup>
He knockèd fast,<sup>o</sup> and often curst, and sware,
That readie entrance was not at his call:
For on his backe a heavy load he bare
Of nightly stelths and pillage severall,<sup>4</sup>
Which he had got abroad by purchase<sup>o</sup> criminall.

17

He was to weete<sup>o</sup> a stout and sturdie thiefe,
Wont to robbe Churches of their ornaments,
And poore mens boxes<sup>5</sup> of their due reliefe,
Which given was to them for good intents;
The holy Saints of their rich vestiments
He did disrobe, when all men carelesse slept,
And spoild the Priests of their habiliments,<sup>o</sup>
Whiles none the holy things in safety kept;
Then he by cunning sleights in at the window crept.

18

And all that he by right or wrong could find,
Unto this house he brought, and did bestow
Upon the daughter of this woman blind,
Abessa daughter of Corceca<sup>6</sup> slow,
With whom he whoredome usd, that few did know,
And fed her fat with feast of offerings,
And plentie, which in all the land did grow;
Ne sparèd he to give her gold and rings:
And now he to her brought part of his stolen things.

19

Thus long the dore with rage and threats he bet,<sup>o</sup>

Yet of those fearefull women none durst rize,
The Lyon frayèd them, him in to let:<sup>7</sup>
He would no longer stay him to advize,<sup>o</sup>
But open breakes the dore in furious wize,<sup>o</sup>
And entring is; when that disdainfull<sup>o</sup> beast
Encountring fierce, him suddaine doth surprize,
And seizing<sup>o</sup> cruell clawes on trembling brest,
Under his Lordly foot him proudly hath suppress.

20

Him booteth not resist,<sup>8</sup> nor succour<sup>o</sup> call,
His bleeding hart is in the vengers hand,
Who streight<sup>o</sup> him rent in thousand peeces small,
And quite dismembred hath: the thirstie land
Drunke up his life; his corse left on the strand.<sup>o</sup>
His fearefull friends weare out the wofull night,
Ne dare to weepe, nor seeme to understand
The heavie hap,<sup>o</sup> which on them is alight,<sup>o</sup>
Affraid, least to themselves the like mishappen might.<sup>9</sup>

21

Now when broad day the world discovered<sup>o</sup> has,
Up Una rose, up rose the Lyon eke,<sup>o</sup>
And on their former journey forward pas,
In wayes unknowne, her wandring knight to seeke,
With paines farre passing that long wandring Greeke,
That for his love refusèd deitie;<sup>1</sup>
Such were the labours of this Lady meeke,
Still seeking him, that from her still did flie,
Then furthest from her hope, when most she weenèd nie.<sup>o</sup>

22

Soone as she parted thence, the fearefull twaine,
That blind old woman and her daughter deare

Came forth, and finding Kirkrapine<sup>o</sup> there slaine,
For anguish great they gan to rend their heare,
And beat their brests, and naked flesh to teare.
And when they both had wept and wayld their fill,
Then forth they ranne like two amazed deare,
Halfe mad through malice, and revenging will,<sup>o</sup>
To follow her, that was the causer of their ill.

23

Whom overtaking, they gan loudly bray,
With hollow howling, and lamenting cry,
Shamefully at her rayling all the way,
And her accusing of dishonesty,<sup>o</sup>
That was the flowre of faith and chastity;
And still amidst her rayling, she<sup>2</sup> did pray,
That plagues, and mischiefs, and long misery
Might fall on her, and follow all the way,
And that in endlesse error<sup>o</sup> she might ever stray.

24

But when she saw her prayers nought prevaile,
She backe returnèd with some labour lost;
And in the way as she did weepe and waile
A knight her met in mighty armes embost,<sup>o</sup>
Yet knight was not for all his bragging bost,<sup>o</sup>
But subtill Archimag, that Una sought
By traynes<sup>o</sup> into new troubles to have tost:
Of that old woman tydings he besought,
If that of such a Ladie she could tellen ought.<sup>3</sup>

25

Therewith she gan her passion to renew,
And cry, and curse, and raile, and rend her heare,<sup>o</sup>
Saying, that harlot she too lately knew,
That causd her shed so many a bitter teare,

And so forth told the story of her feare:
Much seemèd he to mone her haplesse chaunce,
And after for that Ladie did inquire;
Which being taught, he forward gan advaunce
His fair enchanted steed, and eke his charmèd launce.

26

Ere long he came, where Una traveild slow,
And that wilde Champion wayting<sup>o</sup> her besyde:
Whom seeing such, for dread he durst not show
Himselfe too nigh at hand, but turnèd wyde
Unto an hill; from whence when she him spyde,
By his like seeming shield, her knight by name
She weend it was, and towards him gan ryde:
Approching nigh, she wist<sup>o</sup> it was the same,
And with faire fearefull humblesse<sup>o</sup> towards him shee came.

27

And weeping said, "Ah my long lackèd Lord,
Where have ye bene thus long out of my sight?
Much feared I to have bene quite abhord,
Or ought<sup>o</sup> have done, that ye displeasen might,
That should as death unto my deare hart light:<sup>4</sup>
For since mine eye your joyous sight did mis,
My chearefull day is turnd to chearelesse night,
And eke my night of death the shadow is;
But welcome now my light, and shining lampe of blis."

28

He thereto meeting<sup>5</sup> said, "My dearest Dame, Farre be it from your thought, and fro my will,
To thinke that knighthood I so much should shame,
As you to leave, that have me lovèd still,
And chose in Faery court of meere<sup>o</sup> goodwill,
Where noblest knights were to be found on earth:

The earth shall sooner leave her kindly<sup>o</sup> skill
To bring forth fruit, and make eternall derth,<sup>o</sup>
Then I leave you, my lief<sup>e</sup>,<sup>o</sup> yborne of heavenly berth.

29

"And sooth to say, why I left you so long,
Was for to seeke adventure in strange place,
Where Archimago said a felon strong
To many knights did daily worke disgrace;
But knight he now shall never more deface:<sup>o</sup>
Good cause of mine excuse; that mote<sup>o</sup> ye please
Well to accept, and evermore embrace
My faithfull service, that by land and seas
Have vowd you to defend, now then your plaint appease."<sup>o</sup>

30

His lovely<sup>o</sup> words her seemd due recompence
Of all her passèd paines: one loving howre
For many yeares of sorrow can dispence:<sup>o</sup>
A dram of sweet is worth a pound of sowre:
She has forgot, how many a wofull stowre<sup>o</sup>
For him she late endured; she speakes no more
Of past: true is, that true love hath no powre
To looken backe; his eyes be fixt before.
Before her stands her knight, for whom she toyld so sore.

31

Much like, as when the beaten marinere,
That long hath wandred in the Ocean wide,
Oft soust<sup>o</sup> in swelling Tethys<sup>6</sup> saltish teare,
And long time having tand his tawney hide
With blustering breath of heaven, that none can bide,
And scorching flames of fierce Orions hound,<sup>7</sup>
Soone as the port from farre he has espide,
His chearefull whistle merrily doth sound,

And Nereus crownes with cups;<sup>8</sup> his mates him pledg<sup>o</sup> around.

32

Such joy made Una, when her knight she found;
And eke<sup>o</sup> th'enchauter joyous seemd no lesse,
Then the glad marchant, that does vew from ground
His ship farre come from watrie wildernessse,
He hurles out vowes, and Neptune oft doth blesse:
So forth they past, and all the way they spent
Discoursing of her dreadfull late distresse,
In which he askt her, what the Lyon ment:
Who told her all that fell in journey as she went.<sup>9</sup>

33

They had not ridden farre, when they might see
One pricking<sup>o</sup> towards them with hastie heat,
Full strongly armd, and on a courser free,<sup>o</sup>
That through his fiercenesse fomèd all with sweat,
And the sharpe yron<sup>o</sup> did for anger eat,
When his hot ryder spurd his chauffèd<sup>o</sup> side;
His looke was sterne, and seemèd still to threat
Cruell revenge, which he in hart did hyde,
And on his shield Sans loy in bloudie lines was dyde.

34

When nigh he drew unto this gentle payre
And saw the Red-crosse, which the knight did beare,
He burnt in fire, and gan eftsoones<sup>o</sup> prepare Himselfe to battell with his couchèd<sup>o</sup> speare.
Loth was that other, and did faint<sup>o</sup> through feare,
To taste th'untryed dint<sup>o</sup> of deadly steele;
But yet his Lady did so well him cheare,
That hope of new good hap<sup>o</sup> he gan to feele;
So bent<sup>o</sup> his speare, and spurnd<sup>1</sup> his horse with yron heele.

35

But that proud Paynim<sup>o</sup> forward came so fierce,
And full of wrath, that with his sharp-head speare
Through vainely crossèd shield<sup>2</sup> he quite did pierce,
And had his staggering steede not shrunke for feare,
Through shield and bodie eke he should him beare:<sup>o</sup>
Yet so great was the puissance<sup>o</sup> of his push,
That from his saddle quite he did him beare:
He tombling rudely<sup>o</sup> downe to ground did rush,
And from his gorèd wound a well of bloud did gush.

36

Dismounting lightly from his loftie steed,
He to him leapt, in mind to reave<sup>o</sup> his life,
And proudly said, "Lo there the worthie meed<sup>o</sup>
Of him, that slew Sansfoy with bloudie knife;
Henceforth his ghost freed from repining strife,
In peace may passen over Lethe<sup>3</sup> lake,
When mourning altars purgd<sup>o</sup> with enemies life,
The blacke infernall Furies<sup>4</sup> doen aslake:<sup>o</sup>
Life from Sansfoy thou tookst, Sansloy shall from thee take."

37

Therewith in haste his helmet gan unlace,
Till Una cride, "O hold that heavie hand,
Deare Sir, what ever that thou be in place:<sup>o</sup>
Enough is, that thy foe doth vanquisht stand
Now at thy mercy: Mercie not withstand:
For he is one the truest knight alive,<sup>5</sup>
Though conquered now he lie on lowly land,<sup>o</sup>
And whilst him fortune favourd, faire did thrive
In bloudie field: therefore of life him not deprive."

38

Her piteous words might<sup>o</sup> not abate his rage,
But rudely rending up his helmet, would
Have slaine him straight: but when he sees his age,
And hoarie head of Archimago old,
His hastie hand he doth amazèd hold,
And halfe ashamed, wondred at the sight:
For the old man well knew he, though untold,<sup>6</sup>
In charmes and magicke to have wondrous might,
Ne ever wont<sup>o</sup> in field, ne in round lists<sup>7</sup> to fight.

39

And said, "Why Archimago, lucklesse syre,
What doe I see? what hard mishap is this,
That hath thee hither brought to taste mine yre?
Or thine the fault, or mine the error is,
In stead of foe to wound my friend amis?"
He answered nought, but in a traunce still lay,
And on those guilefull dazèd eyes of his
The cloud of death did sit. Which doen away,<sup>o</sup>
He left him lying so, ne would no lenger stay.

40

But to the virgin comes, who all this while Amasèd stands, her selfe so mockt<sup>o</sup> to see
By him, who has the guerdon<sup>o</sup> of his guile,
For so misfeigning her true knight to bee:
Yet is she now in more perplexitie,<sup>o</sup>
Left in the hand of that same Paynim bold,
From whom her booteth not<sup>o</sup> at all to flie;
Who by her cleanly<sup>o</sup> garment catching hold,
Her from her Palfrey pluckt, her visage to behold.

41

But her fierce servant full of kingly awe<sup>o</sup>
And high disdaine,<sup>o</sup> whenas his souveraine Dame

So rudely handled by her foe he sawe,
With gaping jawes full greedy at him came,
And ramping<sup>o</sup> on his shield, did weene<sup>o</sup> the same
Have reft away with his sharpe rending clawes:
But he was stout, and lust did now inflame
His corage more, that from his griping pawes
He hath his shield redeemed,<sup>o</sup> and foorth his swerd he drawes.

42

O then too weake and feeble was the forse
Of salvage beast, his puissance to withstand:
For he was strong, and of so mightie corse,<sup>o</sup>
As ever wielded speare in warlike hand,
And feates of armes did wisely<sup>o</sup> understand.
Eftsoones he percèd through his chaufèd<sup>o</sup> chest
With thrilling<sup>o</sup> point of deadly yron brand,<sup>o</sup>
And launcht<sup>o</sup> his Lordly hart: with death opprest
He roared aloud, whiles life forsooke his stubborne brest.

43

Who now is left to keepe the forlorne maid
From raging spoile<sup>o</sup> of lawlesse victors will?
Her faithfull gard removed, her hope dismaid,
Her selfe a yeelded pray to save or spill.<sup>o</sup>
He now Lord of the field, his pride to fill,
With foule reproches, and disdainfull spight
Her vildly<sup>o</sup> entertaines, and will or nill,
Beares her away upon his courser light:<sup>8</sup>
Her prayers nought prevaile; his rage is more of might.

44

And all the way, with great lamenting paine,
And piteous plaints she filleth his dull<sup>o</sup> eares,
That stony hart could riven have in twaine,
And all the way she wets with flowing teares:

But he enraged with rancor, nothing heares.
Her servile beast<sup>o</sup> yet would not leave her so,
But followes her farre off, ne ought<sup>o</sup> he feares,
To be partaker of her wandring woe,
More mild in beastly kind,<sup>o</sup> then that her beastly foe.

Canto 4

*To sinfull house of Pride, Duessa guides the faithfull knight,
Where brothers death to wreak<sup>o</sup> Sansjoy doth challenge him to fight.*

1

Young knight, what ever that dost armes professe,
And through long labours hunttest after fame,
Beware of fraud, beware of ficklenesse,
In choice, and change of thy deare lovèd Dame,
Least thou of her beleeve too lightly blame,<sup>9</sup>
And rash misweening<sup>o</sup> doe thy hart remove:
For unto knight there is no greater shame,
Then lightnesse and inconstancie in love;
That doth this Redcrosse knights ensample<sup>o</sup> plainly prove.

2

Who after that he had faire Una lorne,<sup>o</sup>
Through light misdeeming<sup>o</sup> of her loialtie,
And false Duessa in her sted had borne,<sup>o</sup>
Called Fidess', and so supposd to bee;
Long with her traveild, till at last they see
A goodly building, bravely garnishèd,<sup>o</sup>
The house of mightie Prince it seemd to bee:
And towards it a broad high way<sup>1</sup> that led,
All bare through peoples feet, which thither travellèd.

3

Great troupes of people traveild thitherward
Both day and night, of each degree and place,<sup>o</sup>
But few returnèd, having scapèd hard,<sup>o</sup>
With balefull<sup>o</sup> beggerie, or foule disgrace,

Which ever after in most wretched case,
Like loathsome lazars,o by the hedges lay.
Thither Duessa bad him bend his pace:o
For she is wearie of the toilesome way,
And also nigh consumèd is the lingring day.

4

A stately Pallace built of squarèd bricke,
Which cunningly was without mortar laid,
Whose wals were high, but nothing strong, nor thick,
And golden foileo all over them displaid,
That purest skye with brightnesse they dismaid:o
High lifted up were many loftie towres,
And goodly galleries farre over laid,o
Full of faire windowes, and delightfull bowres;
And on the top a Diall told the timely howres.2

5

It was a goodly heapeo for to behould,
And spake the praises of the workmans wit;o
But full great pittie, that so faire a mouldo
Did on so weake foundation ever sit:
For on a sandie hill,3 that still did flit,o
And fall away, it mounted was full hie,
That every breath of heaven shakèd it:
And all the hinder parts, that few could spie,
Were ruinous and old, but painted cunningly.

6

Arrivèd there they passèd in forth right;
For stillo to all the gates stood open wide,
Yet charge of them was to a Porter highto
Cald Malvenù,4 who entrance none denide:
Thence to the hall, which was on every side

With rich array and costly arras dight:<sup>5</sup>
Infinite sorts of people did abide
There waiting long, to win the wished sight
Of her, that was the Lady of that Pallace bright.

7

By them they passe, all gazing on them round,
And to the Presence<sup>6</sup> mount; whose glorious vew
Their frayle amazed senses did confound:
In living Princes court none ever knew
Such endlesse riches, and so sumptuous shew;<sup>o</sup>
Ne<sup>o</sup> Persia selfe, the nourse<sup>o</sup> of pompous pride
Like ever saw. And there a noble crew
Of Lordes and Ladies stood on every side,
Which with their presence faire, the place much beautifide.

8

High above all a cloth of State<sup>o</sup> was spread,
And a rich throne, as bright as sunny day,
On which there sate most brave embellished<sup>o</sup>
With royall robes and gorgeous array,
A mayden Queene, that shone as Titans<sup>o</sup> ray,
In glistring gold, and peerelesse pretious stone:
Yet her bright blazing beautie did assay<sup>o</sup>
To dim the brightness of her glorious throne,
As envying her selfe, that too exceeding shone.

9

Exceeding shone, like Phoebus fairest childe,
That did presume<sup>o</sup> his fathers firie wayne,<sup>o</sup>
And flaming mouthes of steedes unwonted<sup>o</sup> wilde
Through highest heaven with weaker<sup>o</sup> hand to rayne;
Proud of such glory and advancement vaine,
While flashing beames do daze his feeble eyen,<sup>o</sup>
He leaves the welkin<sup>o</sup> way most beaten plaine,

And rapt<sup>o</sup> with whirling wheelles, inflames the skyen,
With fire not made to burne, but fairely for to shyne.<sup>7</sup>

10

So proud she shynèd in her Princely state,
Looking to heaven; for earth she did disdayne,
And sitting high; for lowly<sup>o</sup> she did hate:
Lo underneath her scornfull feete, was layne
A dreadfull Dragon with an hideous trayne,<sup>o</sup>
And in her hand she held a mirrhour bright,<sup>8</sup>
Wherein her face she often vewèd fayne,<sup>o</sup>
And in her selfe-loved semblance tooke delight;
For she was wondrous faire, as any living wight.

11

Of griesly<sup>o</sup> Pluto she the daughter was,
And sad Proserpina the Queene of hell;
Yet did she thinke her pearelesse worth to pas<sup>o</sup>
That parentage, with pride so did she swell,
And thundring Jove, that high in heaven doth dwell,
And wield<sup>o</sup> the world, she claymèd for her syre,
Or if that any else did Jove excell:
For to the highest she did still aspyre,
Or if ought<sup>o</sup> higher were then that, did it desyre.

12

And proud Lucifera men did her call,
That made her selfe a Queene, and crownd to be,
Yet rightfull kingdome she had none at all,
Ne heritage of native soveraintie,
But did usurpe with wrong and tyrannie
Upon the scepter, which she now did hold:
Ne ruld her Realmes with lawes, but pollicie,<sup>o</sup>
And strong advizement of six wisards old,
That with their counsels bad her kingdome did uphold.

13

Soone as the Elfin knight in presence came,
And false Duessa seeming Lady faire,
A gentle Husher,° Vanitie by name
Made rowme, and passage for them did prepaire:
So goodly° brought them to the lowest staire
Of her high throne, where they on humble knee
Making obeysance,° did the cause declare,
Why they were come, her royall state to see,
To prove° the wide report of her great Majestee.

14

With loftie eyes, halfe loth to looke so low,
She thanked them in her disdainefull wise,°
Ne other grace vouchsafed them to show
Of Princesse worthy, scarce them bad° arise.
Her Lordes and Ladies all this while devise°
Themselves to setten forth to straungers sight:
Some frounce° their curlèd haire in courtly guise,
Some prancke° their ruffes, and others trimly dight°
Their gay attire: each others greater pride does spight.°

15

Goodly they all that knight do entertaine,
Right glad with him to have increast their crew:
But to Duess' each one himselfe did paine
All kindnesse and faire courtesie to shew;
For in that court whylome° her well they knew:
Yet the stout Faerie mongst the middest° crowd
Thought all their glorie vaine in knightly vew,
And that great Princesse too exceeding prowd,
That to strange° knight no better countenance° allowd.

16

Suddein upriseth from her stately place
The royall Dame, and for her coche doth call:
All hurtlen<sup>o</sup> forth and she with Princely pace,
As faire Aurora in her purple pall,<sup>1</sup>
Out of the East the dawning day doth call:
So forth she comes: her brightnesse brode<sup>o</sup> doth blaze;
The heapes of people thronging in the hall,
Do ride<sup>o</sup> each other, upon her to gaze:
Her glorious glitterand<sup>o</sup> light doth all mens eyes amaze.

17

So forth she comes, and to her coche does clyme,
Adornèd all with gold, and girlonds gay,
That seemd as fresh as Flora<sup>o</sup> in her prime,
And strove to match, in royall rich array,
Great Junos golden chaire,<sup>o</sup> the which they say
The Gods stand gazing on, when she does ride
To Joves high house through heavens bras-pavèd way
Drawne of faire Pecoocks, that excell in pride,
And full of Argus eyes their tales dispredden wide.<sup>2</sup>

18

But this was drawne of six unequall beasts,
On which her six sage Counsellours did ryde,
Taught to obay their bestiall beheasts,<sup>o</sup>
With like conditions to their kinds applyde:<sup>3</sup>
Of which the first, that all the rest did guyde,
Was sluggish Idlenesse the nourse of sin;
Upon a slouthfull Asse he chose to ryde,
Arayd in habit blacke, and amis thin,<sup>4</sup>
Like to an holy Monck, the service to begin.

19

And in his hand his Portesse<sup>o</sup> still he bare,

That much was worne, but therein little red,
For of devotion he had little care,
Still drownd in sleepe, and most of his dayes ded;
Scarse could he once uphold his heavie hed,
To looken, whether it were night or day:
May seeme the wayne<sup>o</sup> was very evill led,
When such an one had guiding of the way,
That knew not, whether right he went, or else astray.

20

From worldly cares himselfe he did esloyne,<sup>o</sup>
And greatly shunnèd manly exercise,
From every worke he challengèd essoyne,<sup>o</sup>
For contemplation sake: yet otherwise,
His life he led in lawlesse riotise;<sup>o</sup>
By which he grew to grievous malady;
For in his lustlesse<sup>o</sup> limbs through evill guise<sup>o</sup>
A shaking fever raignd continually:
Such one was Idlenesse, first of this company.

21

And by his side rode loathsome Gluttony,
Deformèd creature, on a filthie swyne,
His belly was up-blowne with luxury,<sup>o</sup>
And eke<sup>o</sup> with fatnesse swollen were his eyne,<sup>o</sup>
And like a Crane his necke was long and fyne,<sup>5</sup>
With which he swallowd up excessive feast,
For want whereof poore people oft did pyne;<sup>o</sup>
And all the way, most like a brutish beast,
He spuèd up his gorge,<sup>6</sup> that<sup>o</sup> all did him deteast.

22

In greene vine leaves he was right fitly clad;
For other clothes he could not weare for heat,

And on his head an yvie girland had,<sup>7</sup>
From under which fast trickled downe the sweat:
Still as he rode, he somewhat<sup>o</sup> still did eat,
And in his hand did beare a bouzing<sup>o</sup> can,
Of which he supt so oft, that on his seat
His dronken corse<sup>o</sup> he scarce upholden can,
In shape and life more like a monster, then<sup>o</sup> a man.

23

Unfit he was for any worldly thing,
And eke unhable once<sup>o</sup> to stirre or go,<sup>o</sup>
Not meet<sup>o</sup> to be of counsell to a king,
Whose mind in meat and drinke was drownèd so,
That from his friend he seldome knew his fo:
Full of diseases was his carcas blew,
And a dry dropsie through his flesh did flow,
Which by misdiet daily greater grew:
Such one was Gluttony, the second of that crew.

24

And next<sup>o</sup> to him rode lustfull Lechery,
Upon a bearded Goat,<sup>8</sup> whose rugged<sup>o</sup> haire,
And whally<sup>o</sup> eyes (the signe of gelosy,<sup>o</sup>)
Was like the person selfe, whom he did beare:
Who rough, and blacke, and filthy did appeare,
Unseemely man to please faire Ladies eye;
Yet he of Ladies oft was lovèd deare,
When fairer faces were bid standen by:<sup>o</sup>
O who does know the bent of womens fantasy?<sup>o</sup>

25

In a greene gowne he clothèd was full faire,
Which underneath did hide his filthinesse,
And in his hand a burning hart he bare,
Full of vaine follies, and new fangleness:<sup>o</sup>

For he was false, and fraught with ficklenesse,
And learnèd had to love with secret lookes,
And well could daunce, and sing with ruefulnesse,<sup>o</sup>
And fortunes tell, and read in loving bookes,<sup>9</sup>
And thousand other wayes, to bait his fleshly hookes.

26

Inconstant man, that lovèd all he saw,
And lusted after all, that he did love,
Ne would his looser<sup>o</sup> life be tide to law,
But joyd weake wemens hearts to tempt and prove<sup>o</sup>
If from their loyall loves he might them move;
Which lewdnesse fild him with reprochfull paine
Of that fowle evill, which all men reprove,<sup>o</sup>
That rots the marrow, and consumes the braine:
Such one was Lecherie, the third of all this traine.

27

And greedy Avarice by him did ride,
Upon a Camell loaden all with gold;<sup>1</sup>
Two iron coffers hong on either side,
With precious mettall full, as they might hold,
And in his lap an heape of coine he told;<sup>o</sup>
For of his wicked pelfe<sup>o</sup> his God he made,
And unto hell him selfe for money sold;
Accursèd usurie was all his trade,
And right and wrong ylike in equall ballaunce waide.<sup>2</sup>

28

His life was nigh unto deaths doore yplast,<sup>3</sup>
And thread-bare cote, and cobled<sup>o</sup> shoes he ware,
Ne scarce good morsell all his life did tast,
But both from backe and belly still did spare,
To fill his bags, and richesse to compare;<sup>o</sup>

Yet chylde ne<sup>o</sup> kinsman living had he none
To leave them to; but thorough<sup>o</sup> daily care
To get, and nightly feare to lose his owne,
He led a wretched life unto him selfe unknowne.

29

Most wretched wight, whom nothing might suffise,
Whose greedy lust<sup>o</sup> did lacke in greatest store,<sup>o</sup>
Whose need had end, but no end covetise,
Whose wealth was want, whose plenty made him pore,
Who had enough, yet wishèd ever more;
A vile disease, and eke in foote and hand
A grievous gout tormented him full sore,
That well he could not touch, nor go,<sup>o</sup> nor stand:
Such one was Avarice, the fourth of this faire band.

30

And next to him malicious Envie rode,
Upon a ravenous wolfe, and still<sup>o</sup> did chaw
Betweene his cankred<sup>o</sup> teeth a venemous tode,
That all the poison ran about his chaw;<sup>o</sup>
But inwardly he chawèd his owne maw<sup>o</sup>
At neighbours wealth, that made him ever sad;
For death it was, when any good he saw,
And wept, that cause of weeping none he had,
But when he heard of harme, he wexèd<sup>o</sup> wondrous glad.

31

All in a kirtle of discoloured say<sup>4</sup>
He clothèd was, ypainted full of eyes;
And in his bosome secretly there lay
An hatefull Snake,<sup>5</sup> the which his taile uptyes
In many folds, and mortall sting implies.<sup>o</sup>
Still as he rode, he gnasht his teeth, to see
Those heapes of gold with griple Covetyse,<sup>o</sup>

And grudgèd at the great felicitie
Of proud Lucifera, and his owne companie.

32

He hated all good workes and vertuous deeds,
And him no lesse, that any like did use,<sup>o</sup>
And who with gracious bread the hungry feeds,
His almes for want of faith he doth accuse;<sup>6</sup>
So every good to bad he doth abuse:<sup>o</sup>
And eke the verse of famous Poets witt
He does backebite, and spightfull poison spues
From leprous mouth on all, that ever writt:
Such one vile Envie was, that fite in row did sitt.

33

And him beside rides fierce revenging Wrath,
Upon a Lion, loth for to be led;
And in his hand a burning brond<sup>o</sup> he hath,
The which he brandisheth about his hed;
His eyes did hurle forth sparkles fiery red,
And starèd sterne on all, that him beheld,
As ashes pale of hew and seeming ded;
And on his dagger still<sup>o</sup> his hand he held,
Trembling through hasty rage, when choler<sup>o</sup> in him sweld.

34

His ruffin<sup>o</sup> raiment all was staine with blood,
Which he had spilt, and all to rags yrent,<sup>o</sup>
Through unadvisèd rashnesse woxen wood,<sup>o</sup>
For of his hands he had no government,<sup>o</sup>
Ne cared for<sup>o</sup> bloud in his avengement:<sup>o</sup>
But when the furious fit was overpast,
His cruell facts<sup>o</sup> he often would repent;
Yet wilfull man he never would forecast,
How many mischieves should ensue his heedlesse hast.<sup>7</sup>

35

Full many mischiefes follow cruell Wrath;
Abhorred bloudshed, and tumultuous strife,
Unmanly murder, and unthrifty scath,<sup>8</sup>
Bitter despight,<sup>o</sup> with rancours rusty knife,
And fretting grieve the enemy of life;
All these, and many evils moe<sup>o</sup> haunt ire,<sup>o</sup>
The swelling Splene,<sup>9</sup> and Frenzy raging rife,
The shaking Palsey, and Saint Fraunces fire:<sup>1</sup>
Such one was Wrath, the last of this ungoldly tire.<sup>o</sup>

36

And after all, upon the wagon beame
Rode Sathan,<sup>o</sup> with a smarting whip in hand,
With which he forward lasht the laesie teme,
So oft as Slowth<sup>o</sup> still in the mire did stand.
Huge routs<sup>o</sup> of people did about them band,
Showting for joy, and still before their way
A foggy mist had covered all the land;
And underneath their feet, all scattered lay
Dead sculs and bones of men, whose life had gone astray.

37

So forth they marchen in this goodly sort,<sup>o</sup>
To take the solace<sup>o</sup> of the open aire,
And in fresh flowring fields themselves to sport;
Emongst the rest rode that false Lady faire,
The fowle Duessa, next unto the chaire
Of proud Lucifera, as one of the traine:
But that good knight would not so nigh repaire,<sup>o</sup>
Him selfe estraunging from their joyaunce<sup>o</sup> vaine,
Whose fellowship seemd far unfit for warlike swaine.<sup>o</sup>

38

So having solacèd themselves a space
With pleasaunce of the breathing<sup>o</sup> fields yfed,
They backe returnèd to the Princely Place;
Whereas an errant knight in armes yclod,<sup>o</sup>
And heathnish shield, wherein with letters red
Was writ Sans joy, they new arrivèd find:
Enflamed with fury and fiers hardy-hed,<sup>o</sup>
He seemd in hart to harbour thoughts unkind,
And nourish bloody vengeance in his bitter mind.

39

Who when the shamèd shield<sup>2</sup> of slaine Sans foy
He spied with that same Faery champions page,<sup>o</sup>
Bewraying<sup>o</sup> him, that did of late destroy
His eldest brother, burning all with rage
He to him leapt, and that same envious gage<sup>o</sup>
Of victors glory from him snatcht away:
But th'Elfin knight, which ought that warlike wage,<sup>3</sup>
Disdaind to loose the meed<sup>o</sup> he wonne in fray,<sup>o</sup>
And him rencountring<sup>o</sup> fierce, reskewd the noble pray.

40

Therewith they gan to hurtlen<sup>o</sup> greedily,
Redoubted battaile ready to darrayne,<sup>o</sup>
And clash their shields, and shake their swords on hy,
That with their sturre<sup>o</sup> they troubled all the traine;
Till that great Queene upon eternall paine
Of high displeasure, that ensewen<sup>o</sup> might,
Commaunded them their fury to refraine,
And if that either to that shield had right,
In equall lists<sup>4</sup> they should the morrow next it fight.

41

“Ah dearest Dame,” quoth then the Paynim<sup>o</sup> bold,

"Pardon the errour of enraged wight,<sup>o</sup>
Whom great grieve made forget the raine to hold
Of reasons rule, to see this recreant<sup>o</sup> knight,
No knight, but treachour<sup>o</sup> full of false despight<sup>o</sup>
And shamefull treason, who through guile<sup>o</sup> hath slayn
The prowest<sup>o</sup> knight, that ever field did fight,
Even stout Sans foy (O who can then refrayn?)
Whose shield he beares renverst, the more to heape disdayn.

42

"And to augment the glorie of his guile,
His<sup>o</sup> dearest love the faire Fidessa loe
Is there possessèd of<sup>5</sup> the traytour vile,
Who reapes the harvest sown by his foe,
Sown in bloody field, and bought with woe:
That<sup>o</sup> brothers hand shall dearely well requight
So be, O Queene, you equall favour showe."<sup>6</sup>
Him litle answerd th'angry Elfin knight:
He never meant with words, but swords to plead his right.

43

But threw his gauntlet as a sacred pledge,
His cause in combat the next day to try:
So been they parted both, with harts on edge,
To be avenged each on his enemy.
That night they pas in joy and jollity,
Feasting and courting both in bowre and hall;<sup>7</sup>
For Steward was excessive Gluttonie,
That of his plenty pourèd forth to all;
Which doen,<sup>o</sup> the Chamberlain<sup>8</sup> Slowth did to rest them call.

44

Now whenas darkesome night had all displayd
Her coleblacke curtein over brightest skye,

The warlike youthes on dayntie<sup>o</sup> couches layd,
Did chace away sweet sleepe from sluggish eye,
To muse on meanes of hopèd victory.
But whenas Morpheus<sup>9</sup> had with leaden mace
Arrested all that courtly company,
Up-rose Duessa from her resting place,
And to the Paynims lodging comes with silent pace.

45

Whom broad awake she finds, in troublous fit,<sup>o</sup>
Forecasting, how his foe he might annoy,<sup>o</sup>
And him amoves<sup>o</sup> with speaches seeming fit:
"Ah deare Sans joy, next dearest to Sans foy,
Cause of my new griefe, cause of my new joy,
Joyous, to see his ymage in mine eye,
And greeved, to thinke how foe did him destroy,
That was the flowre of grace and chevalrye;
Lo his Fidessa to thy secret faith I flye."

46

With gentle wordes he can<sup>o</sup> her fairely<sup>o</sup> greet,
And bad say on the secret of her hart.
Then sighing soft, "I learne that litle sweet
Oft tempred is," quoth she, "with muchell<sup>o</sup> smart:
For since my brest was launcht with lovely dart<sup>1</sup>
Of deare Sansfoy, I never joyèd howre,<sup>o</sup>
But in eternall woes my weaker<sup>o</sup> hart
Have wasted, loving him with all my powre,
And for his sake have felt full many an heavie stowre.<sup>o</sup>

47

"At last when perils all I weenèd past,
And hoped to reape the crop of all my care,
Into new woes unweeting<sup>o</sup> I was cast,
By this false faytor,<sup>o</sup> who unworthy ware<sup>o</sup>

His worthy shield, whom he with guilefull snare
Entrappèd slew, and brought to shamefull grave.
Me silly<sup>o</sup> maid away with him he bare,
And ever since hath kept in darksome cave,
For that I would not yeeld, that<sup>o</sup> to Sans foy I gave.

48

"But since faire Sunne hath sperst<sup>o</sup> that lowring clowd,
And to my loathèd life now shewes some light,
Under your beames I will me safely shrowd,<sup>o</sup>
From dreaded storme of his disdainfull spight:
To you th'inheritance belongs by right
Of brothers prayse, to you eke longs<sup>o</sup> his love.
Let not his love, let not his restlesse spright<sup>o</sup>
Be unrevenged, that calles to you above
From wandring Stygian<sup>2</sup> shores, where it doth endlesse move."

49

Thereto said he, "Faire Dame be nought dismaid
For sorrowes past; their grieve is with them gone:
Ne yet of present perill be affraid;
For needlesse feare did never vantage<sup>o</sup> none,
And helplesse hap it booteth not to mone.<sup>3</sup>
Dead is Sans-foy, his vitall<sup>o</sup> paines are past,
Though greevèd ghost for vengeance deepe do grone:
He lives, that shall him pay his dewties<sup>o</sup> last,
And guiltie Elfin bloud shall sacrifice in hast."

50

"O but I feare the fickle freakes,"<sup>o</sup> quoth shee,
"Of fortune false, and oddes of armes<sup>4</sup> in field."
"Why dame," quoth he, "what oddes can ever bee, Where both do fight alike, to win or yield?"
"Yea but," quoth she, "he beares a charmèd shield,

And eke enchanted armes, that none can perce,
Ne none can wound the man, that does them wield."
"Charmd or enchanted," answerd he then ferce,
"I no whit reck,<sup>5</sup> ne you the like need to reherce."

51

"But faire Fidessa, sithens<sup>o</sup> fortunes guile,
Or enimies powre hath now captivèd you,
Returne from whence ye came, and rest a while
Till morrow next, that I the Elfe subdew,
And with Sans-foyes dead dowry you endew."<sup>6</sup>
"Ay me, that is a double death," she said,
"With proud foes sight my sorrow to renew:
Where ever yet I be, my secrete aid
Shall follow you." So passing forth she him obaid.

- Note 3: Matthew 7:26–27: "A foolish man . . . built his house upon the sand: And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it."Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Unwelcome. In courtly love allegories, the porter is often called Bienvenu or Bel-accueil (Welcome).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Decorated with costly wall hangings.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Presence chamber, where a sovereign receives guests.Return to reference 6

- Note 7: Phaëthon tried to drive the chariot of his father, Phoebus, the sun god, but set the skies on fire and fell.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Pride and figures associated with her in Renaissance literature and art often hold a mirror, emblematic of self-love.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Each despises the others' greater pride.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Goddess of dawn, in her crimson robe ("purple pall").Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Peacocks, with their tails outspread ("dispredden wide"), are a symbol of pride. The hundred-eyed monster Argus was set by Juno to watch Io, one of Jupiter's loves. When Mercury killed Argus, his eyes were put in the peacock's tail feathers.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: That is, each bestial rider gave commands to his beast appropriate to its particular nature: the beasts and riders are suited to each other. This procession of the Seven Deadly Sins—of which Pride is queen—had a long tradition in medieval art and literature (see also Marlowe, Dr. Faustus, scene 5, lines 272–328).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Idleness wears the gown ("habit") and hood or amice ("amis") of a monk. Traditionally, Idleness led the procession of the deadly sins.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Thin. The crane is a common symbol of gluttony because its long, thin neck allows extended pleasure in swallowing.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Vomited up what he had swallowed.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: He resembles the drunken satyr Silenus, foster father of Bacchus, god of wine. Ivy is sacred to Bacchus.Return to reference 7

Canto 5

*The faithfull knight in equall field
subdewes his faithlesse foe, Whom false Duessa saves, and for his cure to hell does goe.*

1

The noble hart, that harbours vertuous thought,
And is with child of<sup>o</sup> glorious great intent,
Can never rest, untill it forth have brought Th'eternall brood of glorie excellent:<sup>7</sup>
Such restlesse passion did all night torment
The flaming corage<sup>o</sup> of that Faery knight,
Devizing, how that doughtie<sup>o</sup> turnament
With greatest honour he atchieven might;
Still did he wake, and still did watch for dawning light.

2

At last the golden Orientall gate
Of greatest heaven gan to open faire,
And Phoebus<sup>8</sup> fresh, as bridegrome to his mate,
Came dauncing forth, shaking his deawie haire:
And hurld his glistring beames through gloomy aire.
Which when the wakeful Elfe perceived, streight way
He started up, and did him selfe prepaire,
In sun-bright armes, and battailous<sup>o</sup> array:
For with that Pagan proud he combat will that day.

3

And forth he comes into the commune hall,
Where earely waite him many a gazing eye,
To weet<sup>o</sup> what end to straunger knights may fall.<sup>o</sup>
There many Minstrales maken melody,

To drive away the dull melancholy,
And many Bardes, that to the trembling chord
Can tune their timely<sup>o</sup> voyces cunningly,
And many Chroniclers, that can record
Old loves, and warres for ladies doen<sup>o</sup> by many a Lord.<sup>9</sup>

4

Soone after comes the cruell Sarazin,<sup>o</sup>
In woven maile all armèd warily,
And sternly lookes at him, who not a pin
Does care for looke of living creatures eye.
They bring them wines of Greece and Araby,
And daintie spices fetcht from furthest Ynd,<sup>o</sup>
To kindle heat of courage privily:<sup>o</sup>
And in the wine a solemne oth they bynd
T'observe the sacred lawes of armes, that are assynd.

5

At last forth comes that far renownèd Queene,
With royall pomp and Princely majestie;
She is ybrought unto a palèd<sup>o</sup> greene,
And placèd under stately canapee,<sup>o</sup>
The warlike feates of both those knights to see.
On th'other side in all mens open view
Duessa placèd is, and on a tree
Sans-foy his shield is hangd with bloudy hew:
Both those the lawrell girlonds<sup>1</sup> to the victor dew.

6

A shrilling trompet sownded from on hye,
And unto battaill bad<sup>o</sup> them selves addresse:
Their shining shieldes about their wrestes<sup>o</sup> they tye,
And burning blades about their heads do blesse,<sup>o</sup>
The instruments of wrath and heavinesse:<sup>o</sup>
With greedy force each other doth assayle,

And strike so fiercely, that they do impresse
Deepe dinted furrowes in the battred mayle;
The yron walles to ward their blowes are weake and fraile.<sup>2</sup>

7

The Sarazin was stout,<sup>o</sup> and wondrous strong,
And heaped blowes like yron hammers great:
For after bloud and vengeance he did long.
The knight was fiers,<sup>o</sup> and full of youthly heat:
And doubled strokes, like dreaded thunders threat:
For all for prayse and honour he did fight.
Both stricken strike, and beaten both do beat,
That from their shields forth flyeth firie light,
And helmets hewen deepe, shew marks of eithers might.

8

So th'one for wrong, the other strives for right:
As when a Gryfon<sup>3</sup> seized<sup>o</sup> of his pray,
A Dragon fiers encountreth in his flight,
Through widest ayre making his ydle<sup>o</sup> way,
That would his rightfull ravine<sup>o</sup> rend away:
With hideous horror both together smight,
And souce<sup>o</sup> so sore, that they the heavens affray:<sup>o</sup>
The wise Southsayer<sup>o</sup> seeing so sad sight,
Th'amazed vulgar tels of warres and mortall fight.

9

So th'one for wrong, the other strives for right,
And each to deadly shame would drive his foe:
The cruell steele so greedily doth bight
In tender flesh, that streames of bloud down flow,
With which the armes, that earst<sup>o</sup> so bright did show,
Into a pure vermillion now are dyde:
Great ruth<sup>o</sup> in all the gazers harts did grow,
Seeing the gorèd woundes to gape so wyde,

That victory they dare not wish to either side.

10

At last the Paynim chaunst to cast his eye,
His suddein<sup>o</sup> eye, flaming with wrathfull fyre,
Upon his brothers shield, which hong thereby:
Therewith redoubled was his raging yre,<sup>o</sup>
And said, "Ah wretched sonne of wofull syre,
Doest thou sit wayling by black Stygian lake<sup>o</sup>
Whilest here thy shield is hangd for victors hyre,<sup>o</sup>
And sluggish german<sup>4</sup> doest thy forces slake,<sup>o</sup>
To after-send his foe, that him may overtake?

11

"Goe caytive<sup>o</sup> Elfe, him quickly overtake,
And soone redeeme from his long wandring woe;
Goe guiltie ghost, to him my message make,
That I his shield have quit<sup>o</sup> from dying foe."
Therewith upon his crest he stroke him so,
That twise he reelèd, readie twise to fall;
End of the doubtfull battell deemèd tho<sup>o</sup>
The lookers on,<sup>5</sup> and lowd to him gan call
The false Duessa, "Thine the shield, and I, and all."

12

Soone as the Faerie heard his Ladie speake,
Out of his swowning dreame he gan awake,
And quickning<sup>o</sup> faith, that earst was woxen<sup>o</sup> weake,
The creeping deadly cold away did shake:
Tho moved with wrath, and shame, and Ladies sake,<sup>o</sup>
Of all attonce he cast<sup>o</sup> avengd to bee,
And with so'exceeding furie at him strake,
That forcèd him to stoupe upon his knee;
Had he not stoupèd so, he should have cloven bee.

13

And to him said, "Goe now proud Miscreant,<sup>o</sup>
Thy selfe thy message doe<sup>o</sup> to german deare,
Alone he wandring thee too long doth want:
Goe say, his foe thy shield with his doth beare."
Therewith his heavie hand he high gan reare,
Him to have slaine; when loe a darkesome clowd
Upon him fell: he no where doth appeare,
But vanisht is. The Elfe him cals alowd,
But answer none receives: the darknes him does shrowd.<sup>6</sup>

14

In haste Duessa from her place arose,
And to him running said, "O prowest<sup>o</sup> knight,
That ever Ladie to her love did chose,
Let now abate the terror of your might,
And quench the flame of furious despight,<sup>o</sup>
And bloudie vengeance; lo th'infernall powres
Covering your foe with cloud of deadly night,
Have borne him hence to Plutoes balefull bowres.<sup>o</sup>
The conquest yours, I yours, the shield, and glory yours."

15

Not all so satisfide, with greedie eye
He sought all round about, his thirstie blade
To bath in bloud of faithlesse enemy;
Who all that while lay hid in secret shade:
He standes amazèd, how he thence should fade.
At last the trumpets Triumph sound on hie,
And running Heralds humble homage made,
Greeting him goodly<sup>o</sup> with new victorie,
And to him brought the shield, the cause of enmitie.

16

Wherewith he goeth to that soveraine Queene,
And falling her before on lowly knee,
To her makes present of his service seene;<sup>o</sup>
Which she accepts, with thanks, and goodly gree,<sup>o</sup>
Greatly advauncing<sup>o</sup> his gay chevalree.
So marcheth home, and by her takes the knight,
Whom all the people follow with great glee,
Shouting, and clapping all their hands on hight,<sup>o</sup>
That all the aire it fils, and flyes to heaven bright.

17

Home is he brought, and laid in sumptuous bed:
Where many skilfull leaches<sup>o</sup> him abide,<sup>o</sup>
To salve<sup>o</sup> his hurts, that yet still freshly bled.
In wine and oyle they wash his woundès wide,
And softly can embalme<sup>o</sup> on every side.
And all the while, most heavenly melody
About the bed sweet musicke did divide,<sup>o</sup>
Him to beguile of<sup>o</sup> grieve and agony:
And all the while Duessa wept full bitterly.

18

As when a wearie traveller that strays
By muddy shore of broad seven-mouthèd Nile,
Unweeting<sup>o</sup> of the perillous wandring wayes,
Doth meet a cruell craftie Crocodile,
Which in false grieve hyding his harmefull guile,
Doth weepe full sore, and sheddeth tender teares:<sup>7</sup>
The foolish man, that pitties all this while
His mournefull plight, is swallowed up unwares,<sup>o</sup>
Forgetfull of his owne, that mindes anothers cares.

19

So wept Duessa untill eventide,
That shyning lampes in Joves high house were light:<sup>8</sup>

Then forth she rose, ne lenger<sup>o</sup> would abide,
But comes unto the place, where th'Hethen knight
In slombring swownd nigh voyd of vitall spright,<sup>9</sup>
Lay covered with inchaunted cloud all day:
Whom when she found, as she him left in plight,<sup>1</sup>
To wayle his woefull case she would not stay,
But to the easterne coast of heaven makes speedy way.

20

Where griesly<sup>o</sup> Night, with visage deadly sad,
That Phoebus chearefull face durst never vew,
And in a foule blacke pitchie mantle clad,
She findes forth comming from her darkesome mew,<sup>o</sup>
Where she all day did hide her hated hew.<sup>o</sup>
Before the dore her yron charet<sup>o</sup> stood,
Alreadie harnessèd for journey new;
And cole blacke steedes yborne of hellish brood,
That on their rustie bits did champ, as<sup>o</sup> they were wood.<sup>o</sup>

21

Who when she saw Duessa sunny bright,
Adorned with gold and jewels shining cleare,<sup>o</sup>
She greatly grew amazèd at the sight,
And th'unacquainted<sup>o</sup> light began to feare:
For never did such brightnesse there appeare,
And would have backe retyred to her cave,
Untill the witches speech she gan to heare,
Saying, "Yet O thou dreaded Dame, I crave Abide,<sup>o</sup> till I have told the message, which I have."

22

She stayd, and foorth Duessa gan proceede,
"O thou most auncient Grandmother of all,<sup>2</sup>
More old then Jove, whom thou at first didst breede,

Or that great house of Gods caelestiall,
Which wast begot in Daemogorgons hall,
And sawst the secrets of the world unmade,<sup>o</sup>
Why suffredst thou thy Nephewes<sup>o</sup> deare to fall
With Elfin sword, most shamefully betrade?
Lo where the stout Sansjoy doth sleepe in deadly shade.

23

"And him before, I saw with bitter eyes
The bold Sansfoy shrink underneath his speare;
And now the pray of fowles in field he lyes,
Nor wayld of<sup>o</sup> friends, nor laid on groning beare,<sup>3</sup>
That whylome<sup>o</sup> was to me too dearely deare.
O what of Gods then boots it<sup>o</sup> to be borne,
If old Aveugles sonnes so evill heare?<sup>4</sup>
Or who shall not great Nightès children scorne,
When two of three her Nephews are so fowle forlorne?<sup>o</sup>

24

"Up then, up dreary Dame, of darknesse Queene,
Go gather up the reliques<sup>o</sup> of thy race,
Or else goe them avenge, and let be seene,
That dreaded Night in brightest day hath place,
And can the children of faire light deface."<sup>o</sup>
Her feeling speeches some compassion moved
In hart, and chaunge in that great mothers face:
Yet pittie in her hart was never proved<sup>o</sup>
Till then: for evermore she hated, never loved.

25

And said, "Deare daughter rightly may I rew
The fall of famous children borne of mee,
And good successes, which their foes ensew:<sup>o</sup>
But who can turne the streame of destinee,
Or breake the chayne of strong necessitee,

Which fast is tyde to Joves eternall seat?<sup>5</sup>
The sonnes of Day he favoureth, I see,
And by my ruines thinkes to make them great:
To make one great by others losse, is bad excheat.<sub>o</sub>

26

"Yet shall they not escape so freely all;
For some shall pay the price of others guilt:
And he the man that made Sansfoy to fall,
Shall with his owne bloud price<sub>o</sub> that he hath spilt.
But what art thou, that telst of Nephews kilt?"
"I that do seeme not I, Duessa am," Quoth she, "how ever now in garments gilt,
And gorgeous gold arayd I to thee came:
Duessa I, the daughter of Deceipt and Shame."

27

Then bowing downe her agèd backe, she kist
The wicked witch, saying; "In that faire face
The false resemblance of Deceipt, I wist<sub>o</sub>
Did closely<sub>o</sub> lurke; yet so true-seeming grace
It carried, that I scarce in darkesome place
Could it discerne, though I the mother bee
Of falshood, and root of Duessaes race.
O welcome child, whom I have longd to see,
And now have seene unwares.<sub>o</sub> Lo now I go with thee."

28

Then to her yron wagon she betakes,
And with her beares the fowle welfavourd witch:
Through mirkesome<sub>o</sub> aire her readie way she makes.
Her twyfold Teme,<sup>6</sup> of which two blacke as pitch,
And two were browne, yet each to each unlich,<sub>o</sub>
Did softly swim away, ne ever stampe,
Unlesse she chaunst their stubborne mouths to twitch;

Then foming tarre,<sup>o</sup> their bridles they would champe,
And trampling the fine element,<sup>o</sup> would fiercely rampe.<sup>o</sup>

29

So well they sped, that they be come at length
Unto the place, whereas the Paynim lay,
Devoid of outward sense, and native strength,
Coverd with charmed cloud from vew of day,
And sight of men, since his late<sup>o</sup> luckelesse fray.
His cruell wounds with cruddy<sup>o</sup> bloud congealed,
They binden up so wisely,<sup>o</sup> as they may,
And handle softly, till they can be healed:
So lay him in her charet, close in night concealed.

30

And all the while she stood upon the ground,
The wakefull dogs did never cease to bay,
As giving warning of th'unwonted<sup>o</sup> sound,
With which her yron wheelles did them affray,
And her darke griesly<sup>o</sup> looke them much dismay;
The messenger of death, the ghastly Owle
With drearie shriekes did also her bewray;<sup>o</sup>
And hungry Wolves continually did howle,
At her abhorred face, so filthy and so fowle.

31

Thence turning backe in silence soft they stole,
And brought the heavie corse<sup>o</sup> with easie pace
To yawning gulfe of deepe Avernus hole.<sup>7</sup>
By that same hole an entrance darke and bace<sup>o</sup>
With smoake and sulphure hiding all the place,
Descends to hell: there creature never past,
That backe returnèd without heavenly grace;
But dreadfull Furies, which their chaines have brast,<sup>o</sup>
And damnèd sprights sent forth to make ill<sup>o</sup> men aghast.

32

By that same way the direfull dames doe drive
Their mournefull charet, fild<sup>o</sup> with rusty blood,
And downe to Plutoes house are come bilive:<sup>o</sup>
Which passing through, on every side them stood
The trembling ghosts with sad amazèd mood,
Chattring their yron teeth, and staring wide
With stonie eyes; and all the hellish brood
Of feends infernall flockt on every side,
To gaze on earthly wight, that with the Night durst ride.

33

They pas the bitter waves of Acheron,
Where many soules sit wailing woefully,
And come to fiery flood of Phlegeton,<sup>8</sup>
Whereas the damnèd ghosts in torments fry,
And with sharpe shrilling shriekes doe bootlesse<sup>o</sup> cry,
Cursing high Jove, the which them thither sent.
The house of endlesse paine is built thereby,
In which ten thousand sorts of punishment
The cursèd creatures doe eternally torment.

34

Before the threshold dreadfull Cerberus<sup>9</sup>
His three deformèd heads did lay along,<sup>o</sup>
Curlèd with thousand adders venemous,
And lillèd<sup>o</sup> forth his bloudie flaming tong:
At them he gan to reare his bristles strong,
And felly gnarre,<sup>o</sup> untill dayes enemy
Did him appease; then downe his taile he hong
And suffered them to passen quietly:
For she in hell and heaven had power equally.

35

There was Ixion turnèd on a wheele,
For daring tempt the Queene of heaven to sin;
And Sisyphus an huge round stone did reele<sup>o</sup>
Against an hill, ne<sup>o</sup> might from labour lin;<sup>o</sup>
There thirstie Tantalus hong by the chin;
And Tityus fed a vulture on his maw;<sup>o</sup>
Typhoeus joynts were stretchèd on a gin,<sup>o</sup>
Theseus condemned to endlesse slouth<sup>o</sup> by law,
And fifty sisters water in leake vessels draw.<sup>1</sup>

36

They all beholding worldly<sup>o</sup> wights in place,<sup>o</sup>
Leave off their worke, unmindfull of their smart,<sup>o</sup>
To gaze on them; who forth by them doe pace,
Till they be come unto the furthest part:
Where was a Cave ywrought by wondrous art,
Deepe, darke, uneasie,<sup>o</sup> dolefull, comfortlesse,
In which sad Aesculapius<sup>o</sup> farre a part
Emprisond was in chaines remedillesse,<sup>o</sup>
For that Hippolytus rent corse<sup>o</sup> he did redresse.<sup>o</sup>

37

Hippolytus a jolly<sup>o</sup> huntsman was,
That wont<sup>o</sup> in charet chace the foming Bore;
He all his Peeres in beautie did surpas,
But Ladies love as losse of time forbore:
His wanton stepdame<sup>2</sup> lovèd him the more,
But when she saw her offred sweets refused
Her love she turnd to hate, and him before
His father fierce of treason false accused,
And with her gealous<sup>o</sup> termes his open eares abused.

38

Who all in rage his Sea-god syre<sup>o</sup> besought,
Some cursèd vengeance on his sonne to cast:

From surging gulf two monsters straight<sup>o</sup> were brought,
With dread whereof his chasing steedes aghast,
Both charet swift and huntsman overcast.
His goodly corps on ragged cliffs yrent,<sup>o</sup>
Was quite dismembred, and his members chast
Scattered on every mountaine, as he went,
That of Hippolytus was left no monument.<sup>3</sup>

39

His cruell stepdame seeing what was donne,
Her wicked dayes with wretched knife did end,
In death avowing th'innocence of her sonne.
Which hearing his rash Syre, began to rend
His haire, and hastie tongue, that did offend:
Tho<sup>o</sup> gathering up the relicks of his smart<sup>4</sup>
By Dianes meanes, who was Hippolyts frend,
Them brought to Aesculape, that by his art
Did heale them all againe, and joynèd every part.

40

Such wondrous science in mans wit to raine
When Jove avizd,<sup>o</sup> that could the dead revive,
And fates expired<sup>5</sup> could renew againe,
Of endlesse life he might him not deprive,
But unto hell did thrust him downe alive,
With flashing thunderbolt ywounded sore:
Where long remaining, he did alwaies strive
Himselfe with salves to health for to restore,
And slake the heavenly fire, that raged evermore.

41

There auncient Night arriving, did alight
From her nigh wearie waine,<sup>6</sup> and in her armes
To Aesculapius brought the wounded knight:

Whom having softly disarayd of armes,
Tho gan to him discover<sup>o</sup> all his harmes,
Beseeching him with prayer, and with praise,
If either salves, or oyles, or herbes, or charmes
A fordonne<sup>o</sup> wight from dore of death mote raise,
He would at her request prolong her nephews daies.

42

"Ah Dame," quoth he, "thou temptest me in vaine,
To dare the thing, which daily yet I rew,
And the old cause of my continued paine
With like attempt to like end to renew.
Is not enough, that thrust from heaven dew<sup>z</sup>
Here endlesse penance for one fault I pay,
But that redoubled crime with vengeance new Thou biddest me to eeke?<sup>o</sup> Can Night defray<sup>o</sup>
The wrath of thundring Jove, that rules both night and day?"

43

"Not so," quoth she; "but sith<sup>o</sup> that heavens king
From hope of heaven hath thee excluded quight,
Why fearest thou, that canst not hope for thing,<sup>o</sup>
And fearest not, that more thee hurten might,
Now in the powre of everlasting Night?
Goe to then, O thou farre renownèd sonne
Of great Apollo, shew thy famous might
In medicine, that else<sup>o</sup> hath to thee wonne
Great paines, and greater praise, both never to be donne."<sup>o</sup>

44

Her words prevaild: And then the learnèd leach<sup>o</sup>
His cunning hand gan to his wounds to lay,
And all things else, the which his art did teach:
Which having seene, from thence arose away
The mother of dread darknesse, and let stay

Aveugles sonne there in the leaches cure,<sup>o</sup>
And backe returning tooke her wonted<sup>o</sup> way,
To runne her timely race,<sup>o</sup> whilst Phoebus pure
In westerne waves his wearie wagon did recure.<sup>o</sup>

45

The false Duesse leaving noyous<sup>o</sup> Night,
Returnd to stately pallace of dame Pride;
Where when she came, she found the Faery knight
Departed thence, albe<sup>o</sup> his woundès wide
Not throughly heald, unreadie were to ride.
Good cause he had to hasten thence away;
For on a day his wary Dwarfe had spide,
Where in a dongeon deepe huge numbers lay
Of caytive<sup>o</sup> wretched thrals,<sup>o</sup> that waylèd night and day.

46

A ruefull sight, as could be seene with eie;
Of whom he learnèd had in secret wise
The hidden cause of their captivitie,
How mortgaging their lives to Covetise,
Through wastfull<sup>o</sup> Pride, and wanton Riotise,
They were by law of that proud Tyrannesse<sup>8</sup>
Provokt with Wrath, and Envies false surmise,
Condemnèd to that Dongeon mercillesse,
Where they should live in woe, and die in wretchednesse.

47

There was that great proud king of Babylon<sup>9</sup>
That would compell all nations to adore,
And him as onely God to call upon,
Till through celestiall doome<sup>o</sup> throwne out of dore,
Into an Oxe he was transformed of yore:
There also was king Croesus,<sup>1</sup> that enhaunst<sup>o</sup>

His heart too high through his great riches store;
And proud Antiochus,<sup>2</sup> the which advaunst
His cursèd hand gainst God, and on his altars daunst.<sup>o</sup>

48

And them long time before, great Nimrod was,
That first the world with sword and fire warrayd;<sup>o</sup>
And after him old Ninus<sup>3</sup> farre did pas<sup>o</sup>
In princely pompe, of<sup>o</sup> all the world obayd;
There also was that mightie Monarch layd
Low under all, yet above all in pride,
That name of native<sup>o</sup> syre did fowle upbrayd,
And would as Ammons sonne be magnifide,
Till scornd of God and man a shamefull death he dide.<sup>4</sup>

49

All these together in one heape were throwne,
Like carkases of beasts in butchers stall.
And in another corner wide<sup>o</sup> were strowne
The antique ruines of the Romaines fall:
Great Romulus the Grandsyre of them all,
Proud Tarquin, and too lordly Lentulus,
Stout Scipio, and stubbornne Hanniball,
Ambitious Sylla, and sterne Marius,
High Caesar, great Pompey, and fierce Antonius.<sup>5</sup>

50

Amongst these mighty men were wemen mixt,
Proud wemen, vaine, forgetfull of their yoke:<sup>o</sup>
The bold Semiramis,<sup>o</sup> whose sides transfixt
With sonnes owne blade, her fowle reproches spoke;
Faire Sthenoboea,<sup>6</sup> that her selfe did choke
With wilfull cord, for wanting<sup>o</sup> of her will;
High minded Cleopatra, that with stroke

Of Aspes sting her selfe did stoutly<sup>o</sup> kill:
And thousands moe the like, that did that dongeon fill.

51

Besides the endlesse routs<sup>o</sup> of wretched thralles,
Which thither were assembled day by day,
From all the world after their wofull falles,
Through wicked pride, and wasted wealthes decay.
But most of all, which in that Dongeon lay
Fell from high Princes courts, or Ladies bowres,
Where they in idle pompe, or wanton play,
Consumèd had their goods, and thriftlesse howres,
And lastly throwne themselves into these heavy stowres.<sup>o</sup>

52

Whose case wheneas the carefull<sup>o</sup> Dwarfe had tould,
And made ensample of their mournfull sight
Unto his maister, he no lenger would
There dwell in perill of like painefull plight,
But early rose, and ere that dawning light
Discovered had the world to heaven wyde,
He by a privie Posterne<sup>o</sup> tooke his flight,
That of no envious eyes he mote be spyde:
For doubtlesse death ensewd, if any him descryde.<sup>o</sup>

53

Scarse could he footing find in that fowle way,
For many corses, like a great Lay-stall<sup>o</sup>
Of mured men which therein strowèd lay,
Without remorse, or decent funerall:
Which all through that great Princesse pride did fall
And came to shamefull end. And them beside Forth ryding underneath the castell wall,
A donghill of dead carkases he spide,
The dreadfull spectacle of that sad house of Pride.<sup>z</sup>

Endnotes

- Note 7: That good must be manifested in action, not in mere intent, is an important Renaissance commonplace.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, the sun. See Psalm 19:4–5: “In them hath he set a Tabernacle for the sun, Which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber.”Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Minstrels play the music on their instruments; bards sing the words; chroniclers—historians, epic poets—write of love and war.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Laurel wreaths were awarded to the victor of a joust.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: That is, their armor is too frail to withstand such blows.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: A legendary monster, half-eagle, half-lion.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Kinsman; here, brother.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: That is, the onlookers then thought this would end the battle, heretofore in doubt.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The device of a god rescuing a hero in danger by hiding him in a cloud has parallels in Iliad 3.380, Aeneid 5.810–12, and Gerusalemme liberata 7.44–45.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Medieval bestiaries popularized the legend of the hypocritical crocodile’s tears.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, when (“that”) the stars came out.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Nearly (“nigh”) devoid of life.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: That is, in the same desperate state in which she had left him.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: By tradition, Night was eldest of the gods, existing before the world was formed and the Olympian gods were begotten in the hall of Demogorgon (Chaos).Return to reference 2

- Note 3: Bier attended by mourners (thus “groning”).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: That is, are so badly thought of. Aveugle (Blind) is the son of Night and father of Sansfoy, Sansjoy, and Sansloy.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The golden chain that binds the entire universe. The image goes back as far as Homer (Iliad 8.18–27).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Twofold team of horses.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: In classical mythology Avernus is hell, where Pluto (stanza 32) reigns.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Acheron and Phlegeton are rivers in hell.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The three-headed dog that guards hell. Stanzas 31–35 recall Aeneas’s descent into hell (Virgil, Aeneid 6.200, 239–40).Return to reference 9
- Note 1:

Ixion was being punished for attempting to seduce Juno; Sisyphus, for refusing to pray to the gods; Tantalus, for stealing the gods’ nectar; Tityus, for his attempted assault on Apollo’s mother, Leto; the monster Typhoeus, for creating destructive winds; Theseus, for stealing Persephone from Hades; and forty-nine of the fifty daughters of King Danaus, for having killed their husbands on their wedding night. Tantalus stood chin-deep in water that receded whenever he tried to drink—hence he is “thirstie.” Ovid, Virgil, and Homer are Spenser’s sources here.

Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Phaedra, the wife of his father, Theseus.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: That is, no trace of identity.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: That is, his son’s remains, which caused his grief.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The completed term of life as fixed by the Fates.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: That is, the horses of Night’s chariot (“waine”) are nearly exhausted.Return to reference 6

- Note 7: The proper (“dew”) place for a god.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Lucifera. The noble sinners named in stanzas 47–50 exemplify a theme common in Renaissance morality, the fall of princes.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Nebuchadnezzar (Daniel 3–4).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: King of Lydia, famous for his riches.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: King of Syria, who desecrated the Jewish temple of Jerusalem (1 Maccabees 1:20–24).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: In classical mythology, Ninus was founder of Nineveh, archetype of the wicked city (see the book of Jonah). Nimrod, identified as the first tyrant, caused the Tower of Babel to be built in defiance of God (Genesis 10:9–10, 11:1–9).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The reference is to Alexander the Great, whose “shameful death” came ten days after he fell ill at a drinking party. The son of Philip II of Macedon, Alexander was occasionally worshipped as the son of Jupiter Ammon.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Romulus was the founder of Rome; Tarquin, a Roman tyrant; Lentulus, a conspirator with Catiline to overthrow the Republic; Scipio, a Roman general, conqueror of Carthage; Hannibal, a Carthaginian general; Sulla, a Roman civil war general; Marius, Sulla’s rival. The figures in the final line are Julius Caesar, Pompey the Great, and Mark Antony.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Queen of King Proteus of Argos; she lusted after her brother-in-law Bellerophon.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Named in the argument of canto 4, but in the poem itself, only now, after we have been shown what the name means.Return to reference 7

Canto 6

*From lawlesse lust by wondrous grace
fayre Una is releast:
Whom salvage<sup>o</sup> nation does adore, and learnes her wise beheast.<sup>o</sup>*

1

As when a ship, that flyes faire under saile,
An hidden rocke escapèd hath unwares,<sup>o</sup>
That lay in waite her wrack for to bewaile,<sup>8</sup>
The Marriner yet halfe amazèd stares
At perill past, and yet in doubt ne dares
To joy at his foole-happie oversight:<sup>o</sup>
So doubly is distrest twixt joy and cares
The dreadlesse<sup>o</sup> courage of this Elfin knight,
Having escapt so sad ensamples in his sight.

2

Yet sad he was that his too hastie speed
The faire Duesse' had forst him leave behind;
And yet more sad, that Una his deare dreed<sup>o</sup>
Her truth had staine with treason so unkind;<sup>o</sup>
Yet crime in her could never creature find,
But for his love, and for her owne selfe sake,
She wandred had from one to other Ynd,<sup>9</sup>
Him for to seeke, ne ever would forsake,
Till her unwares the fierce Sansloy did overtake.

3

Who after Archimagoes fowle defeat,
Led her away into a forrest wilde,
And turning wrathfull fire to lustfull heat,
With beastly sin thought her to have defilde,

And made the vassall of his pleasures vilde.°
Yet first he cast by treatie,° and by traynes,°
Her to perswade, that stubborne fort to yilde:
For greater conquest of hard love he gaynes,
That workes it to his will, then° he that it constraines.°

4

With fawning wordes he courted her a while,
And looking lovely,° and oft sighing sore,
Her constant hart did tempt with diverse guile:
But wordes, and lookes, and sighes she did abhore,
As rocke of Diamond stedfast evermore.<sup>1</sup>
Yet for to feed his fyrie lustfull eye,
He snatcht the vele, that hong her face before;
Then gan her beautie shine, as brightest skye,
And burnt his beastly hart t'efforce° her chastitye.

5

So when he saw his flatt'ring arts to fayle,
And subtile engines bet from batteree,<sup>2</sup>
With greedy force he gan the fort assayle,
Whereof he weend° possessèd soone to bee,
And win rich spoile of ransackt chastetee.
Ah heavens, that do this hideous act behold,
And heavenly virgin thus outragèd see,
How can ye vengeance just so long withhold,
And hurle not flashing flames upon that Paynim bold?

6

The pitteous maiden careful° comfortlesse,
Does throw out thrilling° shriekes, and shrieking cries,
The last vaine helpe of womens great distresse,
And with loud plaints importuneth the skyes,
That molten starres do drop like weeping eyes;
And Phoebus flying so most shamefull sight,

His blushing face in foggy cloud implies,<sup>o</sup>
And hides for shame. What wit of mortall wight
Can now devise to quit a thrall<sup>o</sup> from such a plight?

7

Eternall providence exceeding<sup>o</sup> thought,
Where none appears can make her selfe a way:
A wondrous way it for this Lady wrought,
From Lyons clawes to pluck the gripèd<sup>o</sup> pray.
Her shrill outcryes and shriekes so loud did bray,
That all the woodes and forestes did resownd;
A troupe of Faunes and Satyres<sup>3</sup> far away
Within the wood were dauncing in a rownd,
Whiles old Sylvanus<sup>4</sup> slept in shady arber sownd.

8

Who when they heard that pitteous strained voice,
In hast forsooke their rurall meriment,
And ran towards the far rebownded<sup>o</sup> noyce,
To weet,<sup>o</sup> what wight so loudly did lament.
Unto the place they come incontinent:<sup>o</sup>
Whom when the raging Sarazin espide,
A rude, misshapen, monstrous rablement,
Whose like he never saw, he durst not bide,
But got his ready steed, and fast away gan ride.

9

The wyld woodgods arrivèd in the place,
There find the virgin dolefull desolate,
With ruffled rayments, and faire blubbred<sup>o</sup> face,
As her outrageous foe had left her late,<sup>o</sup>
And trembling yet through feare of former hate;
All stand amazèd at so uncouth<sup>o</sup> sight,
And gin to pittie her unhappie state,
All stand astonied<sup>o</sup> at her beautie bright,

In their rude<sup>o</sup> eyes unworthie<sup>o</sup> of so wofull plight.

10

She more amazed, in double dread doth dwell;
And every tender part for feare does shake:
As when a greedie Wolfe through hunger fell<sup>o</sup>
A seely<sup>o</sup> Lambe farre from the flocke does take,
Of whom he meanes his bloudie feast to make,
A Lyon spyes fast running towards him,
The innocent pray in hast he does forsake,
Which quit<sup>o</sup> from death yet quakes in every lim
With chaunge of feare, to see the Lyon looke so grim.<sup>o</sup>

11

Such fearefull fit assaid<sup>o</sup> her trembling hart,
Ne word to speake, ne joynt to move she had:
The salvage<sup>o</sup> nation feeles her secret smart,
And read her sorrow in her count'nance sad;
Their frowning forheads with rough hornes yclad,
And rusticke horror<sup>o</sup> all a side doe lay,
And gently grenning,<sup>o</sup> shew a semblance<sup>o</sup> glad
To comfort her, and feare to put away,
Their backward bent knees teach her humbly to obey.<sup>5</sup>

12

The doubtfull Damzell dare not yet commit
Her single person to their barbarous truth,<sup>6</sup>
But still twixt feare and hope amazd does sit,
Late learnd<sup>o</sup> what harme to hastie trust ensu'th:
They in compassion of her tender youth,
And wonder of her beautie soveraine,<sup>o</sup>
Are wonne with pittie and unwonted ruth,<sup>o</sup>
And all prostrate upon the lowly plaine,
Do kisse her feete, and fawne on her with count'nance faine.<sup>o</sup>

13

Their harts she ghesseeth by their humble guise,<sup>o</sup>
And yieldees her to extremitie of time;<sup>7</sup>
So from the ground she fearelesse doth arise,
And walketh forth without suspect<sup>o</sup> of crime:
They all as glad, as birdes of joyous Prime,<sup>o</sup>
Thence lead her forth, about her dauncing round,
Shouting, and singing all a shepheards ryme,
And with greene braunches strowing all the ground,
Do worship her, as Queene, with olive girlond cround.

14

And all the way their merry pipes they sound,
That all the woods with doubled Eccho ring,
And with their hornèd feet do weare the ground,
Leaping like wanton kids in pleasant Spring.
So towards old Sylvanus they her bring;
Who with the noyse awakèd, commeth out,
To weet<sup>o</sup> the cause, his weake steps governing,
And agèd limbs on Cypresse stadle<sup>o</sup> stout,
And with an yvie twyne his wast is girt about.

15

Far off he wonders, what them makes so glad,
Or Bacchus merry fruit they did invent,<sup>8</sup>
Or Cybeles franticke rites<sup>9</sup> have made them mad;
They drawing nigh, unto their God present
That flowre of faith and beautie excellent.
The God himselfe vewing that mirrhour rare,<sup>1</sup>
Stood long amazd, and burnt in his intent;<sup>2</sup>
His owne faire Dryope now he thinkes not faire,
And Pholoe fowle, when her to this he doth compaire.<sup>3</sup>

16

The woodborne people fall before her flat,
And worship her as Goddesses of the wood;
And old Sylvanus selfe bethinkèd not,<sup>o</sup> what
To thinke of wight so faire, but gazing stood,
In doubt to deeme her borne of earthly brood;
Sometimes Dame Venus selfe he seemes to see,
But Venus never had so sober mood;
Sometimes Diana he her takes to bee,
But misseth bow, and shaftes, and buskins<sup>o</sup> to her knee.

17

By view of her he ginneth to revive
His ancient love, and dearest Cyparisse,<sup>4</sup>
And calles to mind his pourtraiture alive,<sup>5</sup>
How faire he was, and yet not faire to<sup>o</sup> this,
And how he slew with glauncing dart amisse
A gentle Hynd, the which the lovely boy
Did love as life, above all worldly blisse;
For grieve whereof the lad n'ould<sup>o</sup> after joy,
But pynd away in anguish and selfe-wild annoy.<sup>o</sup>

18

The wooddy Nymphes, faire Hamadryades<sup>6</sup>
Her to behold do thither runne apace,
And all the troupe of light-foot Naiades,<sup>o</sup>
Flocke all about to see her lovely face:
But when they viewèd have her heavenly grace,
They envie her in their malicious mind,
And fly away for feare of fowle disgrace:
But all the Satyres scorne their woody kind,<sup>o</sup>
And henceforth nothing faire, but her on earth they find.

19

Glad of such lucke, the luckelesse lucky maid,

Did her content to please their feeble eyes,
And long time with that salvage people staid,
To gather breath in many miseries.
During which time her gentle wit she plyes,
To teach them truth, which worshipt her in vaine,
And made her th'Image of Idolatryes;<sup>7</sup>
But when their bootlesse<sup>o</sup> zeale she did restraints
From her own worship, they her Asse would worship fayn.<sup>o</sup>

20

It fortunèd a noble warlike knight
By just occasion to that forrest came,
To seeke his kindred, and the lignage right,<sup>o</sup>
From whence he took his well deservèd name:
He had in armes abroad wonne muchell<sup>o</sup> fame,
And fild far landes with glorie of his might,
Plaine, faithfull, true, and enemy of shame,
And ever loved to fight for Ladies right,
But in vaine glorious frayes<sup>o</sup> he litle did delight.

21

A Satyres sonne yborne in forrest wyld,
By straunge adventure as it did betyde,<sup>o</sup>
And there begotten of a Lady myld,
Faire Thyamis the daughter of Labryde,<sup>8</sup>
That was in sacred bands of wedlocke tyde
To Therion,<sup>9</sup> a loose unruly swayne;
Who had more joy to raunge the forrest wyde,
And chase the salvage beast with busie payne,<sup>o</sup>
Then serve his Ladies love, and wast<sup>o</sup> in pleasures vayne.

22

The forlorne mayd did with loves longing burne,
And could not lacke<sup>o</sup> her lovers company,

But to the wood she goes, to serve her turne,
And seeke her spouse, that from her still<sup>o</sup> does fly,
And followes other game and venery:<sup>1</sup>
A Satyre chaunst her wandring for to find,
And kindling coles of lust in brutish eye,
The loyall links of wedlocke did unbind,
And made her person thrall unto his beastly kind.

23

So long in secret cabin there he held
Her captive to his sensuall desire,
Till that with timely<sup>o</sup> fruit her belly sweld,
And bore a boy unto that salvage sire:
Then home he suffred her for to retire,<sup>o</sup>
For ransome leaving him the late borne childe;
Whom till to ryper yeares he gan aspire,<sup>o</sup>
He noursled<sup>o</sup> up in life and manners wilde,
Emongst wild beasts and woods, from lawes of men exile.

24

For all he taught the tender ymp,<sup>o</sup> was but
To banish cowardize and bastard<sup>o</sup> feare;
His trembling hand he would him force to put Upon the Lyon and the rugged Beare,
And from the she Beares teats her whelps to teare;
And eke<sup>o</sup> wyld roring Buls he would him make
To tame, and ryde their backes not made to beare;
And the Robuckes<sup>2</sup> in flight to overtake,
That every beast for feare of him did fly and quake.

25

Thereby so fearelesse, and so fell<sup>o</sup> he grew,
That his owne sire and maister of his guise<sup>o</sup>
Did often tremble at his horrid vew,<sup>o</sup>
And oft for dread of hurt would him advise,

The angry beasts not rashly to despise,
Nor too much to provoke; for he would learne<sup>o</sup>
The Lyon stoup to him in lowly wise,
(A lesson hard) and make the Libbard<sup>o</sup> sterne
Leave roaring, when in rage he for revenge did earne.<sup>o</sup>

26

And for to make his powre approvèd<sup>o</sup> more,
Wyld beasts in yron yokes he would compell;
The spotted Panther, and the tuskèd Bore,
The Pardale<sup>o</sup> swift, and the Tigre cruell;
The Antelope, and Wolfe both fierce and fell;<sup>o</sup>
And them constraine in equall teme<sup>3</sup> to draw.
Such joy he had, their stubborne harts to quell,
And sturdie courage tame with dreadfull aw,
That his beheast they fearèd, as a tyrans law.

27

His loving mother came upon a day
Unto the woods, to see her little sonne;
And chaunst unwares<sup>o</sup> to meet him in the way,
After his sportes, and cruell pastime donne,
When after him a Lyonesse did runne,
That roaring all with rage, did lowd requere<sup>o</sup>
Her children deare, whom he away had wonne:<sup>o</sup>
The Lyon whelpes she saw how he did beare,
And lull in rugged armes, withouten childish feare.

28

The fearefull Dame all quakèd at the sight,
And turning backe, gan fast to fly away,
Untill with love revokt<sup>o</sup> from vaine affright,
She hardly<sup>o</sup> yet perswaded was to stay,
And then to him these womanish words gan say;
"Ah Satyrane,<sup>4</sup> my dearling, and my joy,

For love of me leave off this dreadfull play;
To dally thus with death, is no fit toy,
Go find some other play-fellowes, mine own sweet boy."

29

In these and like delights of bloudy game
He traynèd was, till ryper yeares he raught,o
And there abode, whilst any beast of name
Walkt in that forest, whom he had not taught
To feare his force: and then his courage haughto
Desird of forreine foemen to be knowne;
And far abroad for straunge adventures sought:
In which his might was never overthrowne,
But through all Faery lond his famous worth was blown.o

30

Yet evermore it was his manner faire,
After long labours and adventures spent,
Unto those native woods for to repaire,o
To see his sire and ofspringo auncient.
And now he thither came for like intent;
Where he unwares the fairest Una found,
Straunge Lady, in so straunge habiliment,o
Teaching the Satyres, which her sat around,
Trew sacred lore, which from her sweet lips did redound.o

31

He wondred at her wisdom heavenly rare,
Whose like in womens wit he never knew;
And when her curteous deeds he did compare,
Gan her admire, and her sad sorrowes rew,o
Blaming of Fortune, which such troubles threw,
And joyd to make prooffe of her crueltie
On gentle Dame, so hurtlesse,o and so trew:
Thenceforth he kept her goodly company,

And learnd her discipline<sup>o</sup> of faith and veritie.

32

But she all vowd<sup>o</sup> unto the Redcrosse knight,
His wandring perill closely<sup>o</sup> did lament,
Ne in this new acquaintaunce could delight,
But her deare<sup>o</sup> heart with anguish did torment,
And all her wit in secret counsels spent,
How to escape. At last in privie wise<sup>o</sup>
To Satyrane she shewèd her intent;
Who glad to gain such favour, gan devise,
How with that pensive Maid he best might thence arise.<sup>o</sup>

33

So on a day when Satyres all were gone,
To do their service to Sylvanus old,
The gentle virgin left behind alone
He led away with courage stout and bold.
Too late it was, to Satyres to be told,
Or ever hope recover her againe:
In vaine he seekes that having cannot hold.
So fast he carried her with carefull paine,<sup>o</sup>
That they the woods are past, and come now to the plaine.

34

The better part now of the lingring day,
They traveild had, when as they farre espide
A wearie wight forwandring<sup>o</sup> by the way,
And towards him they gan in hast to ride,
To weet of newes, that did abroad betide,
Or tydings of her knight of the Redcrosse.
But he them spying, gan to turne aside,
For feare as seemd, or for some feignèd losse;<sup>o</sup>
More greedy they of newes, fast towards him do crosse.

35

A silly<sup>o</sup> man, in simple weedes forworne,<sup>o</sup>
And soild with dust of the long drièd way;
His sandales were with toilesome travell torne,
And face all tand with scorching sunny ray,
As<sup>o</sup> he had traveild many a sommers day,
Through boyling sands of Arabie and Ynde;<sup>o</sup>
And in his hand a Jacobs staffe,<sup>o</sup> to stay
His wearie limbes upon: and eke behind,
His scrip<sup>o</sup> did hang, in which his needments he did bind.

36

The knight approching nigh, of him inquerd
Tydings of warre, and of adventures new;
But warres, nor new adventures none he herd.
Then Una gan to aske, if ought<sup>o</sup> he knew,
Or heard abroad of that her champion trew,
That in his armour bare a croslet<sup>o</sup> red.
"Aye me, Deare dame," quoth he, "well may I rew
To tell the sad sight, which mine eies have red:<sup>o</sup>
These eyes did see that knight both living and eke ded."

37

That cruell word her tender hart so thrild,<sup>o</sup>
That suddein cold did runne through every vaine,
And stony horror all her sences fild
With dying fit,<sup>o</sup> that downe she fell for paine.
The knight her lightly<sup>o</sup> reared up againe,
And comforted with curteous kind reliefe:
Then wonne from death, she bad him tellen plaine
The further processe<sup>o</sup> of her hidden grieve;
The lesser pangs can beare, who hath endured the chiefe.

38

Then gan the Pilgrim thus, "I chaunst this day,
This fatall day, that shall I ever rew,<sup>o</sup>
To see two knights in travell on my way
(A sory<sup>o</sup> sight) arraunged<sup>o</sup> in battell new,
Both breathing vengeaunce, both of wrathfull hew:
My fearefull flesh did tremble at their strife,
To see their blades so greedily imbrew,<sup>5</sup>
That drunke with bloud, yet thirsted after life:
What more? the Redcrosse knight was slaine with Paynim knife."

39

"Ah dearest Lord," quoth she, "how might that bee,
And he the stoutest<sup>o</sup> knight, that ever wonne?"<sup>o</sup>
"Ah dearest dame," quoth he, "how might I see
The thing, that might not be, and yet was donne?"
"Where is," said Satyrane, "that Paynims sonne, That him of life, and us of joy hath reft?"
"Not far away," quoth he, "he hence doth wonne<sup>o</sup>
Foreby<sup>o</sup> a fountaine, where I late him left Washing his bloody wounds, that through<sup>o</sup> the steele were cleft."

40

Therewith the knight thence marchèd forth in hast,
Whiles Una with huge heavinesse<sup>o</sup> opprest,
Could not for sorrow follow him so fast;
And soone he came, as he the place had ghest,
Whereas that Pagan proud him selfe did rest,
In secret shadow by a fountaine side:
Even he it was, that earst<sup>o</sup> would have supprest<sup>o</sup>
Faire Una: whom when Satyrane espide,
With fowle reprochfull words he boldly him defide.

41

And said, "Arise thou cursèd Miscreaunt,<sup>o</sup>
That hast with knightlesse guile and trecherous train<sup>6</sup>

Faire knighthood fowly shamed, and doest vaunt<sup>o</sup>
That good knight of the Redcrosse to have slain:
Arise, and with like treason now maintain<sup>o</sup>
Thy guilty wrong, or else thee guilty yield."
The Sarazin this hearing, rose amain,<sup>o</sup>
And catching up in hast his three square<sup>o</sup> shield,
And shining helmet, soone him buckled to the field.

42

And drawing nigh him said, "Ah misborne Elfe,<sup>z</sup>
In evill houre thy foes thee hither sent,
Anothers wrongs to wreake upon thy selfe:
Yet ill thou blamest me, for having blent<sup>o</sup>
My name with guile and traiterous intent;
That Redcrosse knight, perdie,<sup>o</sup> I never slew,
But had he beene, where earst his armes were lent,
Th'enchaunter vaine his errour should not rew:
But thou his errour shalt, I hope now proven trew."<sup>8</sup>

43

Therewith they gan, both furious and fell,<sup>o</sup>
To thunder blowes, and fiersly to assaile
Each other bent<sup>o</sup> his enemy to quell,<sup>o</sup>
That with their force they perst<sup>o</sup> both plate and maile,
And made wide furrowes in their fleshs fraile,
That it would pittie<sup>o</sup> any living eie.
Large floods of bloud adowne their sides did raile:<sup>o</sup>
But floods of bloud could not them satisfie:
Both hungred after death: both chose to win, or die.

44

So long they fight, and fell revenge pursue,
That fainting<sup>o</sup> each, themselves to breathen let,
And oft refreshèd, battell oft renue:
As when two Bores with rancling malice met,

Their gory sides fresh bleeding fiercely fret,
Til breathlesse both them selves aside retire,
Where foming wrath, their cruell tuskes they whet,
And trample th'earth, the whiles they may respire;
Then backe to fight againe, new breathèd and entire.

45

So fiersly, when these knights had breathèd once,
They gan to fight returne, increasing more
Their puissant force, and cruell rage attonce,
With heapèd strokes more hugely, then before,
That with their drerie wounds and bloody gore
They both deformèd, scarcely could be known.
By this sad Una fraught with anguish sore,
Led with their noise, which through the aire was thrown,
Arrived, where they in erth their fruitles bloud had sown.

46

Whom all so soone as that proud Sarazin
Espide, he gan revive the memory
Of his lewd lusts, and late attempted sin,
And left the doubtfull battell hastily,
To catch her, newly offred to his eie:
But Satyrane with strokes him turning, staid,
And sternely bad him other businesse plie,
Then hunt the steps of pure unspotted Maid:
Wherewith he all enraged, these bitter speeches said.

47

"O foolish faeries sonne, what furie mad
Hath thee incenst, to hast thy dolefull fate?
Were it not better, I that Lady had,
Then that thou hadst repented it too late?
Most sencelesse man he, that himselfe doth hate,
To love another. Lo then for thine ayd

Here take thy lovers token on thy pate."
So they to fight; the whiles the royall Mayd
Fled farre away, of that proud Paynim sore afrayd.

48

But that false Pilgrim, which that leasing<sup>o</sup> told,
Being in deed old Archimage, did stay
In secret shadow, all this to behold,
And much rejoycèd in their bloudy fray:
But when he saw the Damsell passe away
He left his stond,<sup>o</sup> and her pursewd apace,
In hope to bring her to her last decay.<sup>o</sup>
But for to tell her lamentable cace,
And eke<sup>o</sup> this battels end, will need another place.<sup>9</sup>

Canto 7

*The Redcrosse knight is captive made
By Gyaunt proud opprest,
Prince Arthur meets with Una greatly with those newes distrest.*

1

What man so wise, what earthly wit so ware,
As to descry the crafty cunning traine,
By which deceit doth maske in visour faire,
And cast her colours dyed deepe in graine,
To seeme like Truth, whose shape she well can faine,
And fitting gestures to her purpose frame,
The guiltlesse man with guile to entertaine?
Great maistresse of her art was that false Dame,
The false Duessa, clogd with Fidessaes name.

2

Who when returning from the dreary Night,
She found not in that perilous house of Pryde,
Where she had left, the noble Redcrosse knight,
Her hoped pray, she would no longer bide,
But forth she went, to seeke him far and wide.
Ere long she found, whereas he wearie sate,
To rest him selfe, foreby a fountaine side,
Disarmed all of yron-coted Plate,
And by his side his steed the grassy forage ate.

3

He feedes upon the cooling shade, and bayes
His sweatie forehead in the breathing wind,
Which through the trembling leaves full gently plays
Wherein the cherefull birds of sundry kind

Do chaunt sweet musick, to delight his mind:
The Witch approaching gan him fairely<sup>o</sup> greet,
And with reproch of carelesnesse<sup>o</sup> unkind
Upbrayd, for leaving her in place unmeet,<sup>o</sup>
With fowle words tempring<sup>o</sup> faire, soure gall with hony sweet.

4

Unkindnesse past, they gan of solace treat,<sup>o</sup>
And bathe in pleasaunce of the joyous shade,
Which shielded them against the boyling heat,
And with greene boughes decking a gloomy glade,
About the fountaine like a girland made;
Whose bubbling wave did ever freshly well,
Ne ever would through fervent<sup>o</sup> sommer fade:<sup>o</sup>
The sacred Nymph, which therein wont<sup>o</sup> to dwell,
Was out of Dianes favour, as it then befell.

5

The cause was this: one day when Phoebe<sup>2</sup> fayre
With all her band was following the chace,<sup>o</sup>
This Nymph, quite tyred with heat of scorching ayre
Sat downe to rest in midst of the race:
The goddessse wroth<sup>o</sup> gan fowly her disgrace,
And bad the waters, which from her did flow,
Be such as she her selfe was then in place.<sup>o</sup>
Thenceforth her waters waxed dull and slow,
And all that drunke thereof, did faint and feeble grow.

6

Hereof this gentle knight unweeting<sup>o</sup> was,
And lying downe upon the sandie graile,<sup>o</sup>
Drunke of the streame, as cleare as cristall glas;
Eftsoones<sup>o</sup> his manly forces gan to faile,
And mightie strong was turnd to feeble fraile.
His chaunged powres at first themselves not felt,

Till crudled<sup>o</sup> cold his corage<sup>o</sup> gan assaile,
And chearefull<sup>o</sup> bloud in faintnesse chill did melt,
Which like a fever fit through all his body swelt.<sup>o</sup>

7

Yet goodly court he made still to his Dame,
Poured out in loosnesse<sup>3</sup> on the grassy grownd,
Both carelesse of his health, and of his fame:<sup>o</sup>
Till at the last he heard a dreadfull sownd,
Which through the wood loud bellowing, did rebownd,
That all the earth for terrour seemed to shake,
And trees did tremble. Th'Elfe therewith astownd,<sup>o</sup>
Upstartd lightly<sup>o</sup> from his looser make,<sup>4</sup>
And his unready weapons gan in hand to take.

8

But ere he could his armour on him dight,<sup>o</sup>
Or get his shield, his monstrous enemy
With sturdie steps came stalking in his sight,
An hideous Geant horrible and hye,
That with his talnesse seemd to threat the skye,
The ground eke<sup>o</sup> gronèd under him for dreed;<sup>o</sup>
His living like saw never living eye,
Ne durst behold: his stature did exceed
The hight of three the tallest sonnes of mortall seed.

9

The greatest Earth his uncouth<sup>o</sup> mother was,
And blustring Aeolus his boasted sire,<sup>5</sup>
Who with his breath, which through the world doth pas,
Her hollow womb did secretly inspire,<sup>o</sup>
And fild her hidden caves with stormie yre,<sup>o</sup>
That she conceived; and trebling the dew time,
In which the wombes of women do expire,<sup>o</sup>

Brought forth this monstrous masse of earthly slime,
Puft up with emptie wind, and fild with sinfull crime.

10

So growen great through arrogant delight
Of th'high descent, whereof he was yborne,
And through presumption of his matchlesse might,
All other powres and knighthood he did scorne.
Such now he marcheth to this man forlorne,<sup>o</sup>
And left to losse:<sup>o</sup> his stalking steps are stayde<sup>o</sup>
Upon a snaggy Oke,<sup>6</sup> which he had torne
Out of his mothers bowelles, and it made
His mortall<sup>o</sup> mace, wherewith his foemen he dismayde.<sup>7</sup>

11

That when the knight he spide, he gan advance
With huge force and insupportable mayne,<sup>o</sup>
And towards him with dreadfull fury praunce;<sup>o</sup>
Who haplesse,<sup>o</sup> and eke hopelesse, all in vaine
Did to him pace, sad battaile to darrayne,<sup>o</sup>
Disarmd, disgrast, and inwardly dismayde,
And eke so faint in every joynt and vaine,
Through that fraile<sup>o</sup> fountaine, which him feeble made,
That scarsely could he weeld his bootlesse<sup>o</sup> single blade.

12

The Geaunt strooke so maynly<sup>o</sup> mercillesse,
That could have overthrowne a stony towre,
And were not heavenly grace, that him did blesse,
He had beene pouldred<sup>o</sup> all, as thin as flowre:
But he was wary of that deadly stowre,<sup>o</sup>
And lightly<sup>o</sup> lept from underneath the blow:
Yet so exceeding was the villeins powre,
That with the wind it did him overthrow,
And all his sences stound,<sup>o</sup> that still he lay full low.

13

As when that divelish yron Engin<sup>o</sup> wrought
In deepest Hell, and framd by Furies skill,
With windy Nitre and quick Sulphur fraught,<sup>8</sup>
And ramd with bullet round, ordaind to kill,
Conceiveth fire, the heavens it doth fill
With thundring noyse, and all the ayre doth choke,
That none can breath, nor see, nor heare at will,
Through smouldry cloud of duskish stincking smoke,
That th'onely breath him daunts,<sup>9</sup> who hath escapt the stroke.

14

So daunted when the Geaunt saw the knight,
His heavie hand he heaved up on hye,
And him to dust thought to have battred quight,
Untill Duessa loud to him gan crye;
"O great Orgoglio,<sup>1</sup> greatest under skye,
O hold thy mortall hand for Ladies sake,
Hold for my sake, and do him not to dye,<sup>o</sup>
But vanquisht thine eternall bondslave make,
And me thy worthy meed unto thy Leman take."<sup>2</sup>

15

He hearkned, and did stay<sup>o</sup> from further harmes,
To gayne so goodly guerdon,<sup>o</sup> as she spake:
So willingly she came into his armes,
Who her as willingly to grace<sup>o</sup> did take,
And was possessèd of his new found make.<sup>o</sup>
Then up he tooke the slombred<sup>o</sup> sencelesse corse,
And ere he could out of his swowne awake,
Him to his castle brought with hastie forse,
And in a Dongeon deepe him threw without remorse.

16

From that day forth Duessa was his deare,
And highly honourd in his haughtie eye,
He gave her gold and purple pall<sup>o</sup> to weare,
And triple crowne set on her head full hye,<sup>3</sup>
And her endowd with royall majesty:
Then for to make her dreaded more of men,
And peoples harts with awfull terrour tye,<sup>o</sup>
A monstrous beast ybred in filthy fen<sup>o</sup>
He chose, which he had kept long time in darksome den.

17

Such one it was, as that renownèd Snake
Which great Alcides in Stremona slew,
Long fostred in the filth of Lerna lake,<sup>4</sup>
Whose many heads out budding ever new,
Did breed<sup>o</sup> him endlesse labour to subdew:
But this same Monster much more ugly was;
For seven great heads out of his body grew,
An yron brest, and backe of scaly bras,
And all embrewd<sup>o</sup> in bloud, his eyes did shine as glas.

18

His tayle was stretchèd out in wondrous length,
That to the house of heavenly gods it raught,<sup>o</sup>
And with extorted powre, and borrowed strength,
The ever-burning lamps<sup>o</sup> from thence it brought,
And proudly threw to ground, as things of nought;
And underneath his filthy feet did tread
The sacred things, and holy heasts foretaught.<sup>5</sup>
Upon this dreadfull Beast with sevenfold head
He set the false Duessa, for more aw and dread.

19

The wofull Dwarfe, which saw his maisters fall,

Whiles he had keeping of his grasing steed,
And valiant knight become a caytive<sup>o</sup> thrall,
When all was past, tooke up his forlorne weed,<sup>o</sup>
His mightie armour, missing most at need;
His silver shield, now idle maisterlesse;
His poynant<sup>o</sup> speare, that many made to bleed,
The ruefull moniments<sup>o</sup> of heavinesse,<sup>o</sup>
And with them all departes, to tell his great distresse.

20

He had not travaild long, when on the way
He wofull Ladie, wofull Una met,
Fast flying from the Paynims greedy pray,<sup>o</sup>
Whilest Satyrane him from pursuit did let:<sup>o</sup>
Who when her eyes she on the Dwarfe had set,
And saw the signes, that deadly tydings spake,
She fell to ground for sorrowfull regret,<sup>o</sup>
And lively breath her sad brest did forsake,
Yet might her pitteous hart be seene to pant and quake.

21

The messenger of so unhappie newes
Would faine<sup>o</sup> have dyde: dead was his hart within,
Yet outwardly some little comfort shewes:
At last recovering hart, he does begin
To rub her temples, and to chaufe<sup>o</sup> her chin,
And every tender part does tosse and turne:
So hardly he the flitted life does win,
Unto her native prison to retourne:<sup>6</sup>
Then gins her grievèd ghost<sup>o</sup> thus to lament and mourne.

22

"Ye dreary instruments of dolefull sight,
That doe this deadly spectacle behold,
Why do ye lenger<sup>o</sup> feed on loathèd light,

Or liking find to gaze on earthly mould,<sup>7</sup>
Sith<sup>o</sup> cruell fates the carefull<sup>o</sup> threeds unfould,
The which my life and love together tyde?
Now let the stony dart of senselesse cold<sup>o</sup>
Perce to my hart, and pas through every side,
And let eternall night so sad sight fro me hide.

23

“O lightsome day, the lampe of highest Jove,
First made by him,<sup>8</sup> mens wandring wayes to guyde,
When darknesse he in deepest dongeon drove,
Henceforth thy hated face for ever hyde,
And shut up heavens windowes shyning wyde:
For earthly sight can nought but sorrow breed,
And late<sup>o</sup> repentance, which shall long abyde.
Mine eyes no more on vanitie shall feed,
But seelèd up with death, shall have their deadly meed.”<sup>o</sup>

24

Then downe againe she fell unto the ground;
But he her quickly reared up againe:
Thrise did she sinke adowne in deadly swownd,
And thrise he her revived with busie paine:<sup>o</sup>
At last when life recovered had the raine,<sup>o</sup>
And over-wrestled his strong enemy,
With foltring<sup>o</sup> tong, and trembling every vaine,
“Tell on,” quoth she, “the wofull Tragedie,
The which these reliques<sup>o</sup> sad present unto mine eie.

25

“Tempestuous fortune hath spent all her spight,
And thrilling<sup>o</sup> sorrow throwne his utmost dart;
Thy sad tongue cannot tell more heavy plight,
Then that I feele, and harbour in mine hart:
Who hath endured the whole, can beare each part.

If death it be, it is not the first wound,
That launchèd<sup>o</sup> hath my brest with bleeding smart.
Begin, and end the bitter balefull stound;<sup>o</sup>
If lesse, then that<sup>o</sup> I feare, more favour I have found."

26

Then gan the Dwarfe the whole discourse<sup>o</sup> declare,
The subtill traines<sup>o</sup> of Archimago old;
The wanton loves of false Fidessa faire,
Bought with the bloud of vanquisht Paynim bold:
The wretched payre transformed to treen mould;<sup>o</sup>
The house of Pride, and perils round about;
The combat, which he with Sansjoy did hould;
The lucklesse conflict with the Gyant stout,
Wherein captived, of life or death he stood in doubt.

27

She heard with patience all unto the end,
And strove to maister sorrowfull assay,<sup>o</sup>
Which greater grew, the more she did contend,
And almost rent her tender hart in tway;<sup>o</sup>
And love fresh coles unto her fire did lay:
For greater love, the greater is the losse.
Was never Ladie lovèd dearer day,<sup>9</sup>
Then she did love the knight of the Redcrosse;
For whose deare sake so many troubles her did tosse.

28

At last when fervent sorrow slakèd was,
She up arose, resolving him to find
Alive or dead: and forward forth doth pas,
All<sup>o</sup> as the Dwarfe the way to her assynd:<sup>o</sup>
And evermore in constant carefull<sup>o</sup> mind
She fed her wound with fresh renewèd bale;<sup>o</sup>
Long tost with stormes, and bet<sup>o</sup> with bitter wind,

High over hils, and low adowne the dale,
She wandred many a wood, and measurd many a vale.

29

At last she chauncèd by good hap to meet
A goodly knight, faire marching by the way
Together with his Squire, arayèd meet:°
His glitterand° armour shinèd farre away,
Like glauncing° light of Phoebus brightest ray;
From top to toe no place appearèd bare,
That deadly dint° of steele endanger may:
Athwart his brest a bauldrick<sup>1</sup> brave° he ware,
That shynd, like twinkling stars, with stons most pretious rare.

30

And in the midst thereof one pretious stone
Of wondrous worth, and eke of wondrous might,° Shapt like a Ladies head, exceeding shone,
Like Hesperus° emongst the lesser lights,°
And strove for to amaze the weaker sights;
Thereby his mortall blade full comely hong
In yvory sheath, ycarved with curious slights;°
Whose hilts were burnisht gold, and handle strong
Of mother pearle, and buckled with a golden tong.°

31

His haughtie helmet, horrid° all with gold,
Both glorious brightnesse, and great terrour bred;
For all the crest a Dragon did enfold
With greedie pawes, and over all did spred
His golden wings: his dreadfull hideous hed
Close couchèd on the bever,° seemed to throw
From flaming mouth bright sparkles fierie red,
That suddeine horror to faint harts did show;
And scaly tayle was stretcht adowne his backe full low.

32

Upon the top of all his loftie crest,<sup>o</sup>
A bunch of haire discolourd<sup>o</sup> diversly,
With sprinckled pearle, and gold full richly drest,
Did shake, and seemed to daunce for jollity,
Like to an Almond tree ymounted hye
On top of greene Selinis<sup>2</sup> all alone,
With blossomes brave bedeckèd daintily;
Whose tender locks do tremble every one
At every little breath, that under heaven is blowne.

33

His warlike shield all closely covered was,
Ne might of mortall eye be ever seene;
Not made of steele, nor of enduring bras,
Such earthly mettals soone consumèd bene:<sup>o</sup>
But all of Diamond perfect pure and cleene<sup>o</sup>
It framèd was, one massie entire mould,<sup>3</sup>
Hewen out of Adamant rocke with engines<sup>o</sup> keene,
That point of speare it never percen could,
Ne dint<sup>o</sup> of direfull sword divide the substance would.

34

The same to wight<sup>o</sup> he never wont disclose,
But<sup>o</sup> when as monsters huge he would dismay,
Or daunt unequall armies of his foes,
Or when the flying heavens he would affray;<sup>4</sup>
For so exceeding shone his glistring ray,
That Phoebus golden face it did attaint,<sup>o</sup>
As when a cloud his beames doth over-lay;
And silver Cynthia<sup>o</sup> wexèd pale and faint,
As when her face is staynd with magicke arts constraint.<sup>5</sup>

35

No magicke arts hereof had any might,
Nor bloudie wordes of bold Enchaunters call,
But all that was not such, as seemd in sight,
Before that shield did fade, and suddeine fall:
And when him list<sup>o</sup> the raskall routes<sup>o</sup> appall,
Men into stoncs therewith he could transmew,<sup>o</sup>
And stoncs to dust, and dust to nought at all;
And when him list the prouder lookcs subdew,
He would thcm gazing blind, or turne to other hew.<sup>o</sup>

36

Ne let it seeme, that credence this exceeds,
For he that made the same, was knowne right well
To have done much more admirable<sup>o</sup> deedcs.
It Merlin was, which whylome<sup>o</sup> did excell
All living wightcs in might of magicke spell:
Both shield, and sword, and armour all he wrought
For this young Prince,<sup>6</sup> when first to armes he fell;<sup>o</sup>
But when he dyde, the Faerie Queene it brought
To Faerie lond, where yet it may be seene, if sought.

37

A gentle<sup>o</sup> youth, his dearely lovèd Squire
His speare of heben<sup>o</sup> wood behind him bare,
Whose harmefull head, thrice heated in the fire,
Had riven many a brest with pikehead<sup>o</sup> square;<sup>o</sup>
A goodly person, and could menage<sup>o</sup> faire
His stubborne steed with curbèd canon bit,<sup>7</sup>
Who under him did trample as the aire,
And chauf<sup>t</sup>,<sup>o</sup> that any on his backe should sit;
The yron rowels<sup>o</sup> into frothy fome he bit.

38

When as this knight nigh to the Ladie drew,
With lovely court<sup>o</sup> he gan her entertaine;

But when he heard her answers loth, he knew
Some secret sorrow did her heart distraine:<sup>o</sup>
Which to allay, and calme her storming paine,
Faire feeling words he wisely gan display,<sup>o</sup>
And for her humour fitting purpose faine,<sup>8</sup>
To tempt<sup>o</sup> the cause it selfe for to bewray;<sup>o</sup>
Wherewith emmowed, these bleeding words she gan to say.

39

"What worlds delight, or joy of living speach
Can heart, so plunged in sea of sorrowes deepe,
And heaped with so huge misfortunes, reach?
The carefull<sup>o</sup> cold beginneth for to creepe,
And in my heart his yron arrow steepe,
Soone as I thinke upon my bitter bale:<sup>o</sup>
Such helplesse harmes yts better hidden keepe,
Then rip up<sup>o</sup> grieve, where it may not availe,
My last left comfort is, my woes to weepe and waile."

40

"Ah Ladie deare," quoth then the gentle knight,
"Well may I weene,<sup>o</sup> your grieve is wondrous great;
For wondrous great grieve groneth in my spright,<sup>o</sup>
Whiles thus I heare you of your sorrowes treat.
But wofull Ladie let me you intrete,
For to unfold the anguish of your hart:
Mishaps are maistred by advice discrete,
And counsell mittigates the greatest smart;
Found never helpe, who never would his hurts impart."<sup>9</sup>

41

"O but," quoth she, "great grieve will not be tould,
And can more easily be thought, then said."
"Right so"; quoth he, "but he, that never would,

Could never: will to might gives greatest aid."<sup>1</sup>
"But grief," quoth she, "does greater grow displaid,<sup>o</sup>
If then it find not helpe, and breedes despaire."
"Despaire breedes not," quoth he, "where faith is staid."<sup>o</sup>
"No faith so fast," quoth she, "but flesh does paire."<sup>o</sup>
"Flesh may empaire," quoth he, "but reason can repaire."

42

His goodly reason, and well guided speach
So deepe did settle in her gracious thought,
That her perswaded to disclose the breach,<sup>o</sup>
Which love and fortune in her heart had wrought,
And said; "Faire Sir, I hope good hap<sup>o</sup> hath brought
You to inquire the secrets of my griefe,
Or<sup>o</sup> that your wisdom will direct my thought,
Or that your prowesse can me yield reliefe:
Then heare the storie sad, which I shall tell you brieve.

43

"The forlorne<sup>o</sup> Maiden, whom your eyes have seene
The laughing stocke of fortunes mockeries,
Am th'only daughter of a King and Queene,
Whose parents deare, whilest equall destinies
Did runne about,<sup>2</sup> and their felicities
The favourable heavens did not envy,
Did spread their rule through all the territories,
Which Phison and Euphrates floweth by,
And Gehons golden waves doe wash continually."<sup>3</sup>

44

"Till that their cruell cursèd enemy,
An huge great Dragon horrible in sight,
Bred in the loathly lakes of Tartary,<sup>o</sup>
With murderous ravine,<sup>o</sup> and devouring might

Their kingdome spoild,<sup>o</sup> and countrey wasted quight:
Themselves, for feare into his jawes to fall,
He forst to castle strong to take their flight,
Where fast embard<sup>o</sup> in mightie brasen wall,
He has them now foure yeres besiegd to make them thrall.

45

"Full many knights adventurous and stout
Have enterprizd that Monster to subdew;
From every coast<sup>o</sup> that heaven walks about,
Have thither come the noble Martiall crew,
That famous hard atchievements still pursew,
Yet never any could that girlond win,
But all still shronke,<sup>o</sup> and still he greater grew:
All they for want of faith, or guilt of sin,
The pitteous pray of his fierce crueltie have bin.

46

"At last yledd<sup>o</sup> with farre reported praise,
Which flying fame throughout the world had spread,
Of doughtie<sup>o</sup> knights, whom Faery land did raise,
That noble order hight<sup>o</sup> of Maidenhed,<sup>4</sup>
Forthwith to court of Gloriane I sped,
Of Gloriane great Queene of glory bright,
Whose kingdomes seat Cleopolis<sup>5</sup> is red,<sup>o</sup>
There to obtaine some such redoubted knight,
That Parents deare from tyrants powre deliver might.

47

"It was my chance (my chance was faire and good)
There for to find a fresh unprovèd<sup>o</sup> knight,
Whose manly hands imbrewed in guiltie blood
Had never bene,<sup>6</sup> ne ever by his might
Had throwne to ground the unregarded<sup>o</sup> right:

Yet of his prowesse prooffe he since hath made
(I witnesse am) in many a cruell fight;
The groning ghosts of many one dismaide<sup>o</sup>
Have felt the bitter dint<sup>o</sup> of his avenging blade.

48

"And ye the forlorne reliques of his powre,
His byting sword, and his devouring speare,
Which have endured many a dreadfull stowre,<sup>o</sup>
Can speake his prowesse, that did earst<sup>o</sup> you beare,
And well could rule: now he hath left you heare,
To be the record of his ruefull losse,
And of my dolefull disaventurous deare:<sup>o</sup>
O heavie record of the good Redcrosse,
Where have you left your Lord, that could so well you tosse?<sup>o</sup>

49

"Well hopèd I, and faire beginnings had,
That he my captive langour should redeeme,<sup>z</sup>
Till all unweeting,<sup>o</sup> an Enchaunter bad
His sence abusd, and made him to misdeeme<sup>o</sup>
My loyalty, not such as it did seeme;
That rather death desire, then such despight.<sup>8</sup>
Be judge ye heavens, that all things right esteeme,<sup>o</sup>
How I him loved, and love with all my might,
So thought I eke of him, and thinke I thought aright.

50

"Thenceforth me desolate he quite forsooke,
To wander, where wilde fortune would me lead,
And other bywaies he himselfe betooke,
Where never foot of living wight did tread,
That brought not backe the balefull body dead;<sup>o</sup>
In which him chauncèd false Duessa meete,

Mine onely foe, mine onely deadly dread,<sup>9</sup>
Who with her witchcraft and misseeming<sup>o</sup> sweete, Inveigled him to follow her desires unmeete.<sup>o</sup>

51

“At last by subtill sleights she him betraid
Unto his foe, a Gyant huge and tall,
Who him disarmèd, dissolute,<sup>o</sup> dismaid,
Unwares surprisèd and with mightie mall<sup>o</sup>
The monster mercillesse him made to fall,
Whose fall did never foe before behold;
And now in darkesome dungeon, wretched thrall,
Remedillesse, for aie<sup>1</sup> he doth him hold;
This is my cause of grieve, more great, then may be told.”

52

Ere she had ended all, she gan to faint:<sup>o</sup>
But he her comforted and faire bespake,
“Certès,<sup>o</sup> Madame, ye have great cause of plaint,
That stoutest heart, I weene, could cause to quake.
But be of cheare, and comfort to you take:
For till I have acquit<sup>o</sup> your captive knight,
Assure your selfe, I will you not forsake.”
His chearefull words revived her chearelesse spright,
So forth they went, the Dwarfe them guiding ever right.

Canto 8

*Faire virgin to redeeme her deare brings Arthur to the fight:
Who slayes the Gyant, wounds the beast, and strips Duessa quight.*

1

Ay me, how many perils doe enfold
The righteous man, to make him daily fall?
Were not, that heavenly grace doth him uphold,
And stedfast truth acquite<sup>o</sup> him out of all.
Her love is firme, her care continuall,
So oft as he through his owne foolish pride,
Or weaknesse is to sinfull bands<sup>o</sup> made thrall:
Else should this Redcrosse knight in bands have dyde,
For whose deliverance she this Prince doth thither guide.

2

They sadly traveild thus, untill they came
Nigh to a castle builded strong and hie:
Then cryde the Dwarfe, "lo yonder is the same,
In which my Lord my liege doth lucklesse lie,
Thrall to that Gyants hatefull tyrannie:
Therefore, deare Sir, your mightie powres assay."<sup>o</sup>
The noble knight alighted by and by<sup>o</sup>
From loftie steede, and bad the Ladie stay,
To see what end of fight should him befall that day.

3

So with the Squire, th'admirer of his might,
He marchèd forth towards that castle wall;
Whose gates he found fast shut, ne living wight
To ward<sup>o</sup> the same, nor answere commers call.

Then tooke that Squire an horne of bugle<sup>o</sup> small,
Which hong adowne his side in twisted gold,
And tassels gay. Wyde wonders over all<sup>o</sup>
Of that same hornes great vertues<sup>o</sup> weren told,<sup>2</sup>
Which had approvèd<sup>o</sup> bene in uses manifold.

4

Was never wight, that heard that shrilling sound,
But trembling feare did feele in every vaine;
Three miles it might be easie heard around,
And Ecchoes three answered it selfe againe:
No false enchauntment, nor deceitfull traine<sup>o</sup>
Might once abide the terror of that blast,
But presently<sup>o</sup> was voide and wholly vaine:
No gate so strong, no locke so firme and fast,
But with that percing noise flew open quite, or brast.<sup>o</sup>

5

The same before the Geants gate he blew,
That all the castle quakèd from the ground,
And every dore of freewill open flew.
The Gyant selfe dismaièd with that sownd,
Where he with his Duessa dalliance<sup>o</sup> fownd,
In hast came rushing forth from inner bowre,
With staring<sup>o</sup> countenance sterne, as one astownd,
And staggering steps, to weet, what suddein stowre<sup>o</sup>
Had wrought that horror strange, and dared his dreaded powre.

6

And after him the proud Duessa came,
High mounted on her manyheaded beast,
And every head with fyrie tongue did flame,
And every head was crownèd on his creast,
And bloudie mouthèd with late cruell feast.
That when the knight beheld, his mightie shild

Upon his manly arme he soone addrest,<sup>o</sup>
And at him fiercely flew, with courage fild,
And eger greedinesse<sup>o</sup> through every member thrild.

7

Therewith the Gyant buckled him to fight,
Inflamed with scornfull wrath and high disdaine,<sup>o</sup>
And lifting up his dreadfull club on hight,
All armed with ragged snubbes<sup>o</sup> and knottie graine,
Him thought at first encounter to have slaine.
But wise and warie was that noble Pere,<sup>o</sup>
And lightly leaping from so monstrous maine,<sup>o</sup>
Did faire<sup>o</sup> avoide the violence him nere;
It bootèd nought, to thinke, such thunderbolts to beare.<sup>3</sup>

8

Ne shame he thought to shunne so hideous might:
The idle<sup>o</sup> stroke, enforcing furious way,
Missing the marke of his misaymèd sight
Did fall to ground, and with his<sup>o</sup> heavie sway<sup>o</sup>
So deeply dinted in the driven clay,
That three yardes deepe a furrow up did throw:
The sad earth wounded with so sore assay,<sup>o</sup>
Did grone full grievous underneath the blow,
And trembling with strange feare, did like an earthquake show.

9

As when almightie Jove in wrathfull mood,
To wreake<sup>o</sup> the guilt of mortall sins is bent,<sup>o</sup>
Hurles forth his thundring dart with deadly food,<sup>o</sup>
Enrold in flames, and smouldring dreriment,<sup>o</sup>
Through riven cloudes and molten firmament;
The fierce threeforkèd engin<sup>o</sup> making way,
Both loftie towres and highest trees hath rent,
And all that might his angrie passage stay,

And shooting in the earth, casts up a mount of clay.

10

His boystrous<sup>o</sup> club, so buried in the ground,
He could not rearen up againe so light,<sup>o</sup>
But that the knight him at advantage found,
And whiles he strove his combred clubbe to quight<sup>4</sup>
Out of the earth, with blade all burning bright
He smote off his left arme, which like a blocke
Did fall to ground, deprived of native might;
Large streames of bloud out of the trunckèd stocke<sup>o</sup>
Forth gushèd, like fresh water streame from riven rocke.<sup>5</sup>

11

Dismaièd with so desperate deadly wound,
And eke<sup>o</sup> impatient of unwonted paine,<sup>6</sup>
He loudly brayd with beastly yelling sound,
That all the fields rebellowèd againe;
As great a noyse, as when in Cymbrian<sup>7</sup> plaine
An heard of Bulles, whom kindly<sup>o</sup> rage doth sting,
Do for the milkie mothers want complaine,<sup>8</sup>
And fill the fields with troublous bellowing,
The neighbour woods around with hollow murmur ring.

12

That when his deare Duessa heard, and saw
The evill stownd, that daungerd her estate,<sup>9</sup>
Unto his aide she hastily did draw
Her dreadfull beast, who swolne with bloud of late
Came ramping<sup>o</sup> forth with proud presumptuous gate,<sup>o</sup>
And threatned all his heads like flaming brands.<sup>o</sup>
But him the Squire made quickly to retrate, Encountring fierce with single<sup>o</sup> sword in hand,
And twixt him and his Lord did like a bulwarke stand.

13

The proud Duessa full of wrathfull spight,
And fierce disdaine, to be affronted so,
Enforst her purple<sup>o</sup> beast with all her might
That stop<sup>o</sup> out of the way to overthroe,
Scorning the let<sup>o</sup> of so unequall foe:
But nathemore<sup>o</sup> would that courageous swayne
To her yeeld passage, gainst his Lord to goe,
But with outrageous<sup>o</sup> strokes did him restraine,
And with his bodie bard the way atwixt them twaine.

14

Then tooke the angrie witch her golden cup,
Which still<sup>o</sup> she bore, replete with magick artes;<sup>1</sup>
Death and despayre did many thereof sup,
And secret poyson through their inner parts,
Th'eternall bale<sup>o</sup> of heaue wounded harts;
Which after charmes and some enchauntments said,
She lightly sprinkled on his weaker<sup>o</sup> parts;
Therewith his sturdie courage soone was quayd,<sup>o</sup>
And all his senses were with suddeine dread dismayd.

15

So downe he fell before the cruell beast,
Who on his necke his bloudie clawes did seize,
That life nigh crusht out of his panting brest:
No powre he had to stirre, nor will to rize.
That when the carefull<sup>o</sup> knight gan well advise,<sup>o</sup>
He lightly<sup>o</sup> left the foe, with whom he fought,
And to the beast gan turne his enterprise;
For wondrous anguish in his hart it wrought,
To see his lovèd Squire into such thraldome<sup>o</sup> brought.

16

And high advauncing<sup>o</sup> his bloud-thirstie blade,
Stroke one of those deformèd heads so sore,<sup>2</sup>
That of his puissance<sup>o</sup> proud ensample made;
His monstrous scalpe<sup>o</sup> downe to his teeth it tore
And that misformèd shape mis-shapèd more:
A sea of bloud gusht from the gaping wound,
That her gay garments staynd with filthy gore,
And overflowèd all the field around;
That over shoes<sup>3</sup> in bloud he waded on the ground.

17

Thereat he roarèd for exceeding paine,
That to have heard, great horror would have bred,<sup>o</sup>
And scourging th'emptie ayre with his long traine,<sup>o</sup>
Through great impatience of his grievèd hed<sup>4</sup>
His gorgeous ryder from her loftie sted<sup>o</sup>
Would have cast downe, and trod in durtie myre,
Had not the Gyant soone her succourèd;<sup>o</sup>
Who all enraged with smart<sup>o</sup> and franticke yre,<sup>o</sup>
Came hurtling in full fierce, and forst the knight retyre.

18

The force, which wont<sup>o</sup> in two to be disperst,
In one alone left hand<sup>5</sup> he now unites,
Which is through rage more strong then both were erst;<sup>o</sup>
With which his hideous club aloft he dites,<sup>o</sup>
And at his foe with furious rigour<sup>o</sup> smites,
That strongest Oake might seeme to overthrow:
The stroke upon his shield so heavie lites,
That to the ground it doubleth him full low:
What mortall wight could ever beare so monstrous blow?

19

And in his fall his shield, that covered was,

Did loose his vele<sup>o</sup> by chaunce, and open flew:
The light whereof, that heavens light did pas,<sup>o</sup>
Such blazing brightnesse through the aier threw,
That eye mote not the same endure to vew.
Which when the Gyaunt spyde with staring eye,
He downe let fall his arme, and soft withdrew
His weapon huge, that heavèd was on hye
For to have slaine the man, that on the ground did lye.

20

And eke the fruitfull-headed<sup>o</sup> beast, amazed
At flashing beames of that sunshiny shield,
Became starke blind, and all his senses dazed,
That downe he tumbled on the durty field,
And seemed himselfe as conquerèd to yield.
Whom when his maistresse proud perceived to fall,
Whiles yet his feeble feet for faintnesse reeld,
Unto the Gyant loudly she gan call,
"O helpe Orgoglio, helpe, or else we perish all."

21

At her so pitteous cry was much amoooved
Her champion stout, and for to ayde his frend,<sup>o</sup>
Againe his wonted<sup>o</sup> angry weapon prooved:<sup>o</sup>
But all in vaine: for he has read his end
In that bright shield, and all their forces spend
Themselves in vaine: for since that glauncing<sup>o</sup> sight,
He hath no powre to hurt, nor to defend;
As where th'Almighties lightning brond<sup>o</sup> does light,
It dimmes the dazèd eyen, and daunts the senses quight.

22

Whom when the Prince, to battell new addrest,
And threatning high his dreadfull stroke did see,
His sparkling blade about his head he blest,<sup>o</sup>

And smote off quite his right leg by the knee,
That downe he tumbled; as an agèd tree,
High growing on the top of rocky clift,
Whose hartstrings with keene steele nigh hewen be,
The mightie trunck halfe rent, with ragged rift<sup>o</sup>
Doth roll adowne the rocks, and fall with fearefull drift.<sup>o</sup>

23

Or as a Castle reared high and round,
By subtile engins and malicious slight<sup>6</sup>
Is underminèd from the lowest ground,
And her foundation forst,<sup>o</sup> and feebled quight,
At last downe falles, and with her heapèd hight
Her hastie ruine does more heavie make,
And yields it selfe unto the victours might;
Such was this Gyaunts fall, that seemed to shake
The stedfast globe of earth, as<sup>o</sup> it for feare did quake.

24

The knight then lightly<sup>o</sup> leaping to the pray,
With mortall steele him smot againe so sore,
That headlesse his unweldy bodie lay,
All wallowd in his owne fowle bloudy gore,
Which flowèd from his wounds in wondrous store.<sup>o</sup>
But soone as breath out of his breast did pas,
That huge great body, which the Gyaunt bore,
Was vanisht quite, and of that monstrous mas
Was nothing left, but like an emptie bladder was.

25

Whose grievous fall, when false Duessa spide,
Her golden cup she cast unto the ground,
And crownèd mitre<sup>7</sup> rudely<sup>o</sup> threw aside;
Such percing grieve her stubborne hart did wound,
That she could not endure that dolefull stound,<sup>o</sup>

But leaving all behind her, fled away:
The light-foot Squire her quickly turned around,
And by hard meanes enforcing her to stay,
So brought unto his Lord, as his deserved pray.

26

The royall Virgin, which beheld from farre,
In pensive<sup>o</sup> plight, and sad perplexitie,
The whole achievement of this doubtfull warre,<sup>8</sup>
Came running fast to greet his victorie,
With sober gladnesse, and myld modestie,
And with sweet joyous cheare<sup>o</sup> him thus bespake;
"Faire braunch of noblesse, flowre of chevalrie,
That with your worth the world amazed make,
How shall I quite<sup>o</sup> the paines, ye suffer for my sake?

27

"And you<sup>o</sup> fresh bud of vertue springing fast,
Whom these sad eyes saw nigh unto deaths dore,
What hath poore Virgin for such perill past,
Wherewith you to reward? Accept therefore
My simple selfe, and service evermore;
And he that high does sit, and all things see
With equall<sup>o</sup> eyes, their merites to restore,<sup>o</sup>
Behold what ye this day have done for mee,
And what I cannot quite,<sup>o</sup> requite with usuree.<sup>o</sup>

28

"But sith<sup>o</sup> the heavens, and your faire handeling<sup>o</sup>
Have made you maister of the field this day,
Your fortune maister eke with governing,<sup>9</sup>
And well begun end all so well, I pray,
Ne let that wicked woman scape away;
For she it is, that did my Lord bethrall,
My dearest Lord, and deepe in dongeon lay,

Where he his better dayes hath wasted all.<sup>1</sup>
O heare, how piteous he to you for ayd does call."

29

Forthwith he gave in charge unto his Squire,
That scarlot whore to keepen carefully;
Whiles he himselfe with greedie<sup>o</sup> great desire
Into the Castle entred forcibly,
Where living creature none he did espye;
Then gan he lowdly through the house to call:
But no man cared to answere to his crye.
There raignd a solemne silence over all,
Nor voice was heard, nor wight was seene in bowre or hall.

30

At last with creeping crooked pace forth came
An old old man, with beard as white as snow,
That on a staffe his feeble steps did frame,<sup>o</sup>
And guide his wearie gate<sup>o</sup> both too and fro:
For his eye sight him failèd long ygo,
And on his arme a bounch of keyes<sup>2</sup> he bore,
The which unusèd, rust did overgrow:
Those were the keyes of every inner dore,
But he could not them use, but kept them still in store.

31

But very uncouth<sup>o</sup> sight was to behold,
How he did fashion his untoward<sup>o</sup> pace,
For as he forward mooved his footing old,
So backward still was turned his wrinckled face,
Unlike to men, who ever as they trace,<sup>o</sup>
Both feet and face one way are wont to lead.
This was the auncient keeper of that place,
And foster father of the Gyant dead;
His name Ignaro<sup>o</sup> did his nature right aread.<sup>o</sup>

32

His reverend haire and holy gravitie
The knight much honord, as beseemèd well,<sup>o</sup>
And gently<sup>o</sup> askt, where all the people bee,
Which in that stately building wont to dwell.
Who answerd him full soft, he could not tell.
Againe he askt, where that same knight was layd,
Whom great Orgoglio with his puissaunce fell<sup>o</sup>
Had made his caytive<sup>o</sup> thrall; againe he sayde,
He could not tell: ne ever other answere made.

33

Then askèd he, which way he in might pas:
He could not tell, againe he answerèd.
Thereat the curteous knight displeasèd was,
And said, "Old sire, it seemes thou hast not red<sup>o</sup>
How ill it sits with<sup>o</sup> that same silver hed
In vaine to mocke, or mockt in vaine to bee:
But if thou be, as thou art pourtrahèd
With natures pen, in ages grave degree,

34

His answere likewise was, he could not tell.
Whose sencelesse speach, and doted<sup>o</sup> ignorance
When as the noble Prince had markèd well,
He ghest his nature by his countenance,
And calmd his wrath with goodly temperance.
Then to him stepping, from his arme did reach
Those keyes, and made himselfe free enterance.
Each dore he opened without any breach;<sup>o</sup>
There was no barre to stop, nor foe him to empeach.<sup>o</sup>

35

There all within full rich arayd he found,
With royal arras<sup>o</sup> and resplendent gold,
And did with store of every thing abound,
That greatest Princes presence<sup>o</sup> might behold.
But all the floore (too filthy to be told)
With bloud of guiltlesse babes, and innocents trew,<sup>3</sup>
Which there were slaine, as sheepe out of the fold,
Defilèd was, that dreadfull was to vew,
And sacred ashes over it was strowèd<sup>o</sup> new.

36

And there beside of marble stone was built
An Altare, carved with cunning imagery,<sup>4</sup>
On which true Christians bloud was often spilt,
And holy Martyrs often doen to dye,<sup>o</sup>
With cruell malice and strong tyranny:
Whose blessed sprites from underneath the stone
To God for vengeance cryde continually,<sup>5</sup>
And with great grieve were often heard to grone,
That hardest heart would bleede, to heare their piteous mone.

37

Through every rowme he sought, and every bowr,
But no where could he find that wofull thrall:
At last he came unto an yron doore,
That fast was lockt, but key found not at all
Emongst that bounch, to open it withall;
But in the same a little grate was pight,<sup>o</sup>
Through which he sent his voyce, and lowd did call
With all his powre, to weet,<sup>o</sup> if living wight
Were housèd therewithin, whom he enlargen<sup>o</sup> might.

38

Therewith an hollow, dreary, murmuring voyce

These piteous plaints and dolours<sup>o</sup> did resound;
"O who is that, which brings me happy choyce
Of death,<sup>6</sup> that here lye dying every stound,<sup>o</sup>
Yet live perforce in balefull<sup>o</sup> darkenesse bound?
For now three Moones have changèd thrice their hew,<sup>o</sup>
And have beene thrice hid underneath the ground,
Since I the heavens chearefull face did vew,
O welcome thou, that doest of death bring tydings trew."

39

Which when that Champion heard, with percing point
Of pittie deare<sup>o</sup> his hart was thrillèd<sup>o</sup> sore,
And trembling horror ran through every joynt,
For ruth<sup>o</sup> of gentle knight so fowle forlore:<sup>o</sup>
Which shaking off, he rent<sup>o</sup> that yron dore,
With furious force, and indignation fell;<sup>o</sup>
Where entred in, his foot could find no flore,
But all a deepe descent, as darke as hell,
That breathèd ever forth a filthie banefull smell.

40

But neither darkenesse fowle, nor filthy bands,<sup>o</sup>
Nor noyous<sup>o</sup> smell his purpose could withhold,
(Entire<sup>o</sup> affection hateth nicer<sup>o</sup> hands)
But that with constant zeale, and courage bold,
After long paines and labours manifold,
He found the meanes that Prisoner up to reare;
Whose feeble thighs, unable to uphold
His pinèd<sup>o</sup> corse, him scarce to light could beare,
A ruefull spectacle of deathe and ghastly drere.<sup>o</sup>

41

His sad dull eyes deepe sunck in hollow pits,
Could not endure th'unwonted<sup>o</sup> sunne to view;
His bare thin cheekes for want of better bits,<sup>o</sup>

And empty sides deceived<sup>o</sup> of their dew,
Could make a stony hart his hap to rew;<sup>o</sup>
His rawbone armes, whose mighty brawnèd bowrs<sup>o</sup>
Were wont to rive steele plates, and helmets hew,
Were cleane consumed, and all his vitall powres
Decayd, and all his flesh shronk up like withered flowres.

42

Whom when his Lady saw, to him she ran
With hasty joy: to see him made her glad,
And sad to view his visage pale and wan,
Who earst<sup>o</sup> in flowres of freshest youth was clad.
Tho<sup>o</sup> when her well of teares she wasted<sup>o</sup> had,
She said, "Ah dearest Lord, what evill starre
On you hath fround, and poud his influence bad,
That of your selfe ye thus berobbèd arre,
And this misseeming hew<sup>o</sup> your manly looks doth marre?

43

"But welcome now my Lord, in wele<sup>o</sup> or woe,
Whose presence I have lackt to long a day;
And fie on Fortune mine avowèd foe,
Whose wrathfull wreakes<sup>o</sup> them selves do now alay.
And for these wrongs shall treble penaunce pay
Of treble good: good growes of evils priefe."<sup>7</sup>
The chearelesse man, whom sorrow did dismay,<sup>o</sup>
Had no delight to treaten<sup>o</sup> of his grieve;
His long endured famine needed more reliefe.

44

"Faire Lady," then said that victorious knight,<sup>o</sup>
"The things, that grievous were to do, or beare,
Them to renew,<sup>o</sup> I wote,<sup>o</sup> breeds no delight;
Best musicke breeds delight in loathing eare:
But th'onely good, that growes of passèd feare,

Is to be wise, and ware<sup>o</sup> of like agein.
This dayes ensample hath this lesson deare
Deepe written in my heart with yron pen,
That blisse may not abide in state of mortall men.

45

"Henceforth sir knight, take to you wonted strength,
And maister these mishaps with patient might;
Loe<sup>o</sup> where your foe lyes stretcht in monstrous length,
And loe that wicked woman in your sight,
The roote of all your care, and wretched plight,
Now in your powre, to let her live, or dye."
"To do her dye," quoth Una, "were despight,<sup>8</sup>
And shame t'avenge so weake an enemy;
But spoile<sup>o</sup> her of her scarlot robe, and let her fly."

46

So as she bad, that witch they disaraid,
And robd of royall robes, and purple pall,<sup>o</sup>
And ornaments that richly were displaid;
Ne sparèd they to strip her naked all.
Then when they had despoild her tire<sup>o</sup> and call,<sup>o</sup>
Such as she was, their eyes might her behold,
That her misshapèd parts did them appall,
A loathly, wrinckled hag, ill favoured, old,
Whose secret filth good manners biddeth not be told.

47

Her craftie head was altogether bald,
And as in hate of honorable eld,<sup>o</sup>
Was overgrowne with scurfe<sup>o</sup> and filthy scald;<sup>9</sup>
Her teeth out of her rotten gummes were feld,<sup>o</sup>
And her sowre breath abhominably smeld;
Her drièd dugs,<sup>o</sup> like bladders lacking wind,
Hong downe, and filthy matter from them weld;<sup>o</sup>

Her wrizled<sup>o</sup> skin as rough, as maple rind,
So scabby was, that would have loathd<sup>o</sup> all womankind.

48

Her neather parts, the shame of all her kind,<sup>o</sup>
My chaster<sup>o</sup> Muse for shame doth blush to write;
But at her rompe she growing had behind
A foxes taile, with dong all fowly dight;<sup>o</sup>
And eke her feete most monstrous were in sight;
For one of them was like an Eagles claw,
With griping talaunts armd to greedy fight,
The other like a Beares uneven<sup>o</sup> paw:
More ugly shape yet never living creature saw.<sup>1</sup>

49

Which when the knights beheld, amazd they were,
And wondred at so fowle deformèd wight.
"Such then," said Una, "as she seemeth here,
Such is the face of falshood, such the sight
Of fowle Duessa, when her borrowed light
Is laid away, and counterfesaunce<sup>o</sup> knowne."
Thus when they had the witch disrobèd quight,
And all her filthy feature<sup>o</sup> open showne,
They let her goe at will, and wander wayes unknowne.

50

She flying fast from heavens hated face,
And from the world that her discovered<sup>o</sup> wide,
Fled to the wastfull<sup>o</sup> wildernesses apace,
From living eyes her open shame to hide,
And lurkt in rocks and caves long unespide.
But that faire crew<sup>o</sup> of knights, and Una faire
Did in that castle afterwards abide,
To rest them selves, and weary powres repaire,
Where store they found of all, that dainty<sup>o</sup> was and rare.

Canto 9

*His loves and lineage<sup>o</sup> Arthur tells:
The knights knit friendly bands:<sup>o</sup>
Sir Trevisan flies from Despayre, Whom Redcrosse knight withstands.*

1

O goodly golden chaine,<sup>2</sup> wherewith yfere<sup>o</sup>
The vertues linkèd are in lovely wize:<sup>o</sup>
And noble minds of yore allyèd were,
In brave poursuit of chevalrous emprize,<sup>o</sup>
That none did others safety despize,<sup>o</sup>
Nor aid envy<sup>o</sup> to him, in need that stands,
But friendly each did others prayse devize
How to advaunce with favourable hands,
As this good Prince redeemd the Redcrosse knight from bands.

2

Who when their powres, empaired through labour long,
With dew repast<sup>o</sup> they had recured<sup>o</sup> well,
And that weake captive wight now wexèd<sup>o</sup> strong,
Them list<sup>o</sup> no lenger there at leasure dwell,
But forward fare, as their adventures fell,
But ere they parted, Una faire besought
That straunger knight his name and nation tell;
Least<sup>o</sup> so great good, as he for her had wrought,
Should die unknown, and buried be in thanklesse thought.

3

“Faire virgin,” said the Prince, “ye me require
A thing without the compas of<sup>o</sup> my wit:
For both the lignage and the certain Sire,
From which I sprong, from me are hidden yit.<sup>o</sup>”

For all so soone as life did me admit
Into this world, and shewèd heavens light,
From mothers pap I taken was unfit:°
And streight delivered to a Faery knight,
To be upbrought in gentle thewes° and martiall might.

4

“Unto old Timon<sup>3</sup> he me brought bylive,°
Old Timon, who in youthly yeares hath beene
In warlike feates th’expertest man alive,
And is the wisest now on earth I weene;
His dwelling is low in a valley greene,
Under the foot of Rauran mossy hore,°
From whence the river Dee as silver cleene°
His tombling billowes rolls with gentle rore:⁴
There all my dayes he traind me up in vertuous lore.

5

“Thither the great Magicien Merlin came,
As was his use,° ofttimes to visit me:
For he had charge my discipline° to frame,°
And Tutours nouriture° to oversee.
Him oft and oft I askt in privitie,
Of what loines and what lignage I did spring:
Whose aunswere bad me still assurèd bee,
That I was sonne and heire unto a king,
As time in her just terme° the truth to light should bring.”

6

“Well worthy impe,”° said then the Lady gent,°
“And Pupill fit for such a Tutours hand.
But what adventure, or what high intent
Hath brought you hither into Faery land,
Aread° Prince Arthur,⁵ crowne of Martiall band?”

"Full hard it is," quoth he, "to read<sup>o</sup> aright
The course of heavenly cause, or understand
The secret meaning of th'eternall might,
That rules mens wayes, and rules the thoughts of living wight.

7

"For whither he through fatall deepe foresight,<sup>6</sup>
Me hither sent, for cause to me unghest,<sup>o</sup>
Or that fresh bleeding wound, which day and night
Whilome<sup>o</sup> doth rangle in my riven<sup>o</sup> brest,
With forcèd fury following his behest,<sup>o</sup>
Me hither brought by wayes yet never found,
You to have helpt I hold my selfe yet blest."
"Ah curteous knight," quoth she, "what secret wound Could ever find,<sup>o</sup> to grieve the gentlest hart on ground?"

8

"Deare Dame," quoth he, "you sleeping sparkes awake,
Which troubled once, into huge flames will grow,
Ne ever will their fervent fury slake
Till living moysture into smoke do flow,
And wasted<sup>o</sup> life do lye in ashes low.
Yet sithens<sup>o</sup> silence lesseneth not my fire,
But told it flames, and hidden it does glow,
I will revele, what ye so much desire:
Ah Love, lay downe thy bow, the whiles I may respire.<sup>o</sup>

9

"It was in freshest flowre of youthly yeares,
When courage first does creepe in manly chest,
Then first the coale of kindly<sup>o</sup> heat appeares
To kindle love in every living brest;
But me had warnd old Timons wise behest,
Those creeping flames by reason to subdew,
Before their rage grew to so great unrest,

As miserable lovers use<sup>o</sup> to rew,
Which still wex<sup>o</sup> old in woe, whiles woe still wexeth new.

10

“That idle name of love, and lovers life,
As<sup>o</sup> losse of time, and vertues enemy
I ever scornd, and joyd to stirre up strife,
In midst of their mournfull Tragedy,
Ay<sup>o</sup> wont to laugh, when them I heard to cry,
And blow the fire, which them to ashes brent:<sup>o</sup>
Their God himselfe, grieved at my libertie,
Shot many a dart at me with fiers intent,
But I them warded all with wary government.<sup>z</sup>

11

“But all in vaine: no fort can be so strong,
Ne fleshly brest can armèd be so sound,
But will at last be wonne with battrie<sup>o</sup> long,
Or unawares at disavantage found;
Nothing is sure, that growes on earthly ground:
And who most trustes in arme of fleshly might,
And boasts, in beauties chaine not to be bound,
Doth soonest fall in disaventrous<sup>o</sup> fight,
And yeeldes his caytive<sup>o</sup> neck to victours most<sup>o</sup> despight.

12

“Ensample make of him your haplesse joy,<sup>o</sup>
And of my selfe now mated,<sup>o</sup> as ye see;
Whose prouder<sup>o</sup> vaunt that proud avenging boy
Did soone pluck downe, and curbd my libertie.
For on a day prickt<sup>o</sup> forth with jollitie
Of looser<sup>o</sup> life, and heat of hardiment,<sup>o</sup>
Raunging the forest wide on courser<sup>o</sup> free,
The fields, the floods, the heavens with one consent
Did seeme to laugh on me, and favour mine intent.

13

"For-wearied<sup>o</sup> with my sports, I did alight
From loftie steed, and downe to sleepe me layd;
The verdant<sup>o</sup> gras my couch did goodly dight,<sup>o</sup>
And pillow was my helmet faire displayd:
Whiles every sence the humour sweet embayd,<sup>8</sup>
And slombring soft my hart did steale away,
Me seemèd, by my side a royall Mayd
Her daintie limbes full softly down did lay:
So faire a creature yet saw never sunny day.

14

"Most goodly glee<sup>o</sup> and lovely blandishment<sup>o</sup>
She to me made, and bad me love her deare,
For dearely sure her love was to me bent,<sup>o</sup>
As when just time expired<sup>9</sup> should appeare.
But whether dreames delude, or true it were,
Was never hart so ravisht with delight,
Ne living man like words did ever heare,
As she to me delivered all that night;
And at her parting said, She Queene of Faeries hight.<sup>1</sup>

15

"When I awoke, and found her place devoyd,<sup>o</sup>
And nought but pressèd gras, where she had lyen,
I sorrowed all so much, as earst<sup>o</sup> I joyd,
And washèd all her place with watry eyen.
From that day forth I loved that face divine;
From that day forth I cast<sup>o</sup> in carefull<sup>o</sup> mind,
To seeke her out with labour, and long tyne,<sup>o</sup>
And never vowd<sup>o</sup> to rest, till her I find,
Nine monethes I seeke in vaine yet ni'll<sup>o</sup> that vow unbind."

16

Thus as he spake, his visage wexed pale,
And chaunge of hew great passion did bewray;
Yet still he strove to cloke his inward bale,
And hide the smoke, that did his fire display,
Till gentle Una thus to him gan say;
"O happy Queene of Faeries, that hast found
Mongst many, one that with his prowess may Defend thine honour, and thy foes confound:
True Loves are often sown, but seldom grow on ground."

17

"Thine, O then," said the gentle Redcrosse knight,
"Next to that Ladies love shalbe the place,
O fairest virgin, full of heavenly light,
Whose wondrous faith, exceeding earthly race,
Was firmest fixt in mine extremest case.
And you, my Lord, the Patrone of my life,
Of that great Queene may well gaine worthy grace:
For onely worthy you through prowes priefe
Yf living man mote worthy be, to be her liefe."

18

So diversly discoursing of their loves,
The golden Sunne his glistring head gan shew,
And sad remembraunce now the Prince amoves,
With fresh desire his voyage to pursew:
Als Una earnd her traveill to renew.
Then those two knights, fast friendship for to bynd,
And love establish each to other trew,
Gave goodly gifts, the signes of gratefull mynd,
And eke as pledges firme, right hands together joynd.

19

Prince Arthur gave a boxe of Diamond sure,
Embowd with gold and gorgeous ornament,

Wherein were closd few drops of liquor pure,
Of wondrous worth, and vertue<sup>o</sup> excellent,
That any wound could heale incontinent:<sup>o</sup>
Which to requite, the Redcrosse knight him gave
A booke, wherein his Saveours testament
Was writ with golden letters rich and brave;<sup>o</sup>
A worke of wondrous grace, and able soules to save.

20

Thus beene they parted, Arthur on his way
To seeke his love, and th'other for to fight
With Unas foe, that all her realme did pray.<sup>o</sup>
But she now weighing the decayed plight,
And shrunkn synewes of her chosen knight,
Would not a while her forward course pursew,
Ne bring him forth in face of dreadfull fight,
Till he recovered had his former hew:<sup>o</sup>
For him to be yet weake and wearie well she knew.

21

So as they traveild, lo they gan espy
An armed knight towards them gallop fast,
That seemed from some feared foe to fly,
Or other griesly thing, that him agast.<sup>o</sup>
Still<sup>o</sup> as he fled, his eye was backward cast,
As if his feare still followed him behind;
Als flew his steed, as he his bands had brast,<sup>o</sup>
And with his winged heeles did tread the wind,
As he had beene a fole of Pegasus his kind.<sup>2</sup>

22

Nigh as he drew, they might<sup>o</sup> perceive his head
To be unarmd, and curld uncombèd heares
Upstaring<sup>o</sup> stiffe, dismayd with uncouth<sup>o</sup> dread;
Nor drop of bloud in all his face appeares

Nor life in limbe: and to increase his feares,
In fowle reproch<sup>o</sup> of knighthoods faire degree,<sup>o</sup>
About his neck an hempen rope he weares,
That with his glistring armes does ill agree;
But he of rope or armes has now no memoree.

23

The Redcrosse knight toward him crossèd fast,
To weet,<sup>o</sup> what mister<sup>o</sup> wight was so dismayd:
There him he finds all sencelesse and aghast,
That of him selfe he seemd to be afrayd;
Whom hardly<sup>o</sup> he from flying forward stayd,
Till he these wordes to him deliver might;
"Sir knight, aread<sup>o</sup> who hath ye thus arayd,
And eke from whom make ye this hasty flight:
For never knight I saw in such misseeming<sup>o</sup> plight."

24

He answerd nought at all, but adding new Feare to his first amazment, staring wide
With stony eyes, and hartlesse hollow hew,<sup>3</sup>
Astonisht stood, as one that had aspide
Infernall furies, with their chaines untide.
Him yet againe, and yet againe bespake
The gentle knight; who nought to him replide,
But trembling every joynt did inly quake,
And foltring tongue at last these words seemd forth to shake.

25

"For Gods deare love, Sir knight, do me not stay;
For loe he comes, he comes fast after mee."
Eft<sup>o</sup> looking backe would faine have runne away;
But he him forst to stay, and tellen free
The secret cause of his perplexitie:<sup>o</sup>
Yet nathemore<sup>o</sup> by his bold hartie speach,

Could his bloud-frozen hart emboldned bee,
But through his boldnesse rather feare did reach,
Yet forst, at last he made through silence suddein breach.

26

"And am I now in safetie sure," quoth he,
"From him, that would have forcèd me to dye?
And is the point of death now turnd fro mee,
That I may tell this haplesse history?"<sup>o</sup>
"Feare nought:" quoth he, "no daunger now is nye."
"Then shall I you recount a ruefull cace,"<sup>o</sup>
Said he, "the which with this unlucky eye
I late beheld, and had not greater grace
Me reft<sup>o</sup> from it, had bene partaker of the place."<sup>4</sup>

27

"I lately chaunst (Would I had never chaunst)
With a faire knight to keepen companee,
Sir Terwin<sup>5</sup> hight,<sup>o</sup> that well himselfe advaunst
In all affaires, and was both bold and free,
But not so happie as mote happie bee:
He loved, as was his lot, a Ladie gent,<sup>o</sup>
That him againe<sup>o</sup> loved in the least degree:
For she was proud, and of too high intent,<sup>o</sup>
And joyd to see her lover languish and lament.

28

"From whom returning sad and comfortlesse,<sup>o</sup>
As on the way together we did fare,
We met that villen (God from him me blesse<sup>o</sup>)
That cursèd wight, from whom I scapt whyleare,<sup>o</sup>
A man of hell, that cals himselfe Despaire;<sup>6</sup>
Who first us greets, and after faire areedes<sup>o</sup>
Of tydings strange, and of adventures rare:

So creeping close, as Snake in hidden weedes,
Inquireth of our states, and of our knightly deedes.

29

"Which when he knew, and felt our feeble harts
Embost<sup>o</sup> with bale,<sup>o</sup> and bitter byting griefe,
Which love had launchèd<sup>o</sup> with his deadly darts,
With wounding words and termes of foule reprimede,<sup>o</sup>
He pluckt from us all hope of due reliefe,
That earst<sup>o</sup> us held in love of lingring life;
Then hopelesse hartlesse, gan the cunning thiefe
Perswade us die, to stint<sup>o</sup> all further strife:
To me he lent this rope, to him a rustie<sup>o</sup> knife.

30

"With which sad instrument of hastie death,
That wofull lover, loathing lenger<sup>o</sup> light,
A wide way made to let forth living breath.
But I more fearefull, or more luckie wight,
Dismayd with that deformèd dismall sight,
Fled fast away, halfe dead with dying feare:<sup>o</sup>
Ne yet assur'd of life by you, Sir knight,
Whose like infirmitie like chaunce may beare:
But God you never let his charmèd speeches heare."<sup>7</sup>

31

"How may a man," said he, "with idle speach
Be wonne, to spoyle<sup>o</sup> the Castle of his health?"
"I wote,"<sup>o</sup> quoth he, "whom triall<sup>o</sup> late did teach,
That like would not<sup>8</sup> for all this worldes wealth:
His subtill tongue, like dropping honny, mealtth<sup>o</sup>
Into the hart, and searcheth every vaine,
That ere one be aware, by secret stealth
His powre is reft,<sup>o</sup> and weaknesse doth remaine.
O never Sir desire to try<sup>o</sup> his guilefull traine."<sup>o</sup>

32

"Certès,"<sup>o</sup> said he, "hence shall I never rest,
Till I that treachours art have heard and tride;
And you Sir knight, whose name mote<sup>o</sup> I request,
Of grace<sup>o</sup> do me unto his cabin<sup>o</sup> guide."
"I that hight<sup>o</sup> Trevisan,"<sup>o</sup> quoth he, "will ride
Against my liking backe, to doe you grace:<sup>o</sup>
But nor for gold nor glee<sup>1</sup> will I abide
By you, when ye arrive in that same place;
For lever<sup>o</sup> had I die, then<sup>o</sup> see his deadly face."

33

Ere long they come, where that same wicked wight
His dwelling has, low in an hollow cave,
Farre underneath a craggie clift ypight,<sup>o</sup>
Darke, dolefull, drearie, like a greedie grave,
That still<sup>o</sup> for carrion carcasses doth crave:
On top whereof aye<sup>o</sup> dwelt the ghastly Owle,<sup>2</sup>
Shrieking his balefull note, which ever drave
Farre from that haunt all other chearefull fowle;
And all about it wandring ghostes did waile and howle.

34

And all about old stockes<sup>o</sup> and stubs of trees,
Whereon nor fruit, nor leafe was ever seene,
Did hang upon the ragged rocky knees;<sup>o</sup>
On which had many wretches hangèd beene,
Whose carcasses were scattered on the greene,
And throwne about the cliffs. Arrivèd there,
That bare-head knight for dread and dolefull teene,<sup>o</sup>
Would faine<sup>o</sup> have fled, ne durst approachen neare,
But th' other forst him stay, and comforted in feare.

35

That darkesome cave they enter, where they find
That cursèd man, low sitting on the ground,
Musing full sadly in his sullein<sup>o</sup> mind;
His griesie<sup>o</sup> lockes, long growen, and unbound,
Disordred hong about his shoulders round,
And hid his face; through which his hollow eyne
Lookt deadly dull, and starèd as astound;<sup>o</sup>
His raw-bone cheekes through penurie and pine,<sup>o</sup>
Were shronke into his jawes, as<sup>o</sup> he did never dine.

36

His garment nought but many ragged clouts,<sup>o</sup>
With thornes together pind and patchèd was,
The which his naked sides he wrapt abouts;
And him beside there lay upon the gras
A drearie corse,<sup>o</sup> whose life away did pas,
All wallowd in his owne yet luke-warme blood,
That from his wound yet wellèd fresh alas;
In which a rustie knife fast fixèd stood,
And made an open passage for the gushing flood.

37

Which piteous spectacle, approving<sup>o</sup> trew
The wofull tale that Trevisan had told,
When as the gentle Redcrosse knight did vew,
With firie zeale he burnt in courage bold,
Him to avenge, before his bloud were cold,
And to the villein said, "Thou agèd damnèd wight,
The author of this fact,<sup>o</sup> we here behold,
What justice can but judge against thee right,
With thine owne bloud to price<sup>o</sup> his bloud, here shed in sight?"

38

"What franticke fit," quoth he, "hath thus distraught
Thee, foolish man, so rash a doome<sup>o</sup> to give?

What justice ever other judgement taught,
But he should die, who merites not to live?
None else to death this man despayring drive,<sup>o</sup>
But his owne guiltie mind deserving death.
Is then unjust to each his due to give?
Or let him die, that loatheth living breath?
Or let him die at ease, that liveth here uneath?<sup>o</sup>

39

"Who travels by the wearie wandring way,
To come unto his wishèd home in haste,
And meetes a flood, that doth his passage stay,
Is not great grace to helpe him over past,
Or free his feet, that in the myre sticke fast?
Most envious man, that grieves at neighbours good,
And fond,<sup>o</sup> that joyest in the woe thou hast,
Why wilt not let him passe, that long hath stood
Upon the banke, yet wilt thy selfe not passe the flood?

40

"He there does now enjoy eternall rest
And happie ease, which thou doest want and crave,
And further from it daily wanderest:
What if some litle paine the passage have,
That makes fraile flesh to feare the bitter wave?
Is not short paine well borne, that brings long ease,
And layes the soule to sleepe in quiet grave?
Sleepe after toyle, port after stormie seas,
Ease after warre, death after life does greatly please."<sup>3</sup>

41

The knight much wondred at his suddeine wit,<sup>o</sup>
And said, "The terme of life is limited,
Ne may a man prolong, nor shorten it;
The souldier may not move from watchfull sted,<sup>4</sup>

Nor leave his stand, untill his Captaine bed."<sup>o</sup>
"Who life did limit by almightie doome," Quoth he, "knowes best the termes established;
And he, that points the Centonell his roome,"<sup>o</sup>
Doth license him depart at sound of morning droome.<sup>5</sup>

42

"Is not his deed, what ever thing is donne,
In heaven and earth? did not he all create
To die againe? all ends that was begonne.
Their times in his eternall booke of fate
Are written sure, and have their certaine<sup>o</sup> date.
Who then can strive with strong necessitie,
That holds the world in his still chaunging state,
Or shunne the death ordaynd by destinie?
When houre of death is come, let none aske whence, nor why.

43

"The lenger<sup>o</sup> life, I wote<sup>o</sup> the greater sin,
The greater sin, the greater punishment:
All those great battels, which thou boasts to win,
Through strife, and bloud-shed, and avengement,
Now praysd, hereafter deare<sup>o</sup> thou shalt repent:
For life must life, and bloud must bloud repay.<sup>6</sup>
Is not enough thy evill life forespent?<sup>o</sup>
For he, that once hath missed the right way,
The further he doth goe, the further he doth stray.

44

"Then do no further goe, no further stray,
But here lie downe, and to thy rest betake,
Th'ill to prevent, that life ensewen may.<sup>7</sup>
For what hath life, that may it lovèd make,
And gives not rather cause it to forsake?

Feare, sicknesse, age, losse, labour, sorrow, strife,
Paine, hunger, cold, that makes the hart to quake;
And ever fickle fortune rageth rife,<sup>o</sup>
All which, and thousands mo<sup>o</sup> do make a loathsome life.

45

"Thou wretched man, of death hast greatest need,
If in true ballance thou wilt weigh thy state:
For never knight, that darèd warlike deede,
More lucklesse disaventures<sup>o</sup> did amate:<sup>o</sup>
Witnesse the dongeon deepe, wherein of late
Thy life shut up, for death so oft did call;
And though good lucke prolongedè hath thy date,<sup>o</sup>
Yet death then, would the like mishaps forestall,
Into the which hereafter thou maiest happen fall.<sup>o</sup>

46

"Why then doest thou, O man of sin, desire
To draw thy dayes forth to their last degree?
Is not the measure of thy sinfull hire<sup>o</sup>
High heaped up with huge iniquitie,
Against the day of wrath,<sup>o</sup> to burden thee?
Is not enough that to this Ladie milde
Thou falsèd<sup>o</sup> hast thy faith with perjurie,<sup>o</sup>
And sold thy selfe to serve Duessa vilde,<sup>o</sup>
With whom in all abuse thou hast thy selfe defilde?

47

"Is not he just, that all this doth behold
From highest heaven, and beares an equall<sup>o</sup> eye?
Shall he thy sins up in his knowledge fold,<sup>o</sup>
And guiltie be of thine impietie?
Is not his law, Let every sinner die:<sup>8</sup>
Die shall all flesh? what then must needs be donne,
Is it not better to doe willinglie,

Then<sup>o</sup> linger, till the glasse<sup>o</sup> be all out ronne?
Death is the end of woes: die soone, O faeries sonne.”

48

The knight was much enmovèd with his speach,
That as a swords point through his hart did perse,
And in his conscience made a secret breach,<sup>o</sup>
Well knowing true all, that he did rehearse,<sup>o</sup>
And to his fresh remembrance did reverse<sup>o</sup>
The ugly vew of his deformèd crimes,
That all his manly powres it did disperse,
As he were charmèd with inchaunted rimes,
That oftentimes he quakt, and fainted<sup>o</sup> oftentimes.

49

In which amazement, when the Miscreant<sup>o</sup>
Perceivèd him to waver weake and fraile,
Whiles trembling horror did his conscience dant,<sup>o</sup>
And hellish anguish<sup>o</sup> did his soule assaile,
To drive him to despaire, and quite to quaile,<sup>o</sup>
He shewed him painted in a table<sup>o</sup> plaine,
The damnèd ghosts, that doe in torments waile,
And thousand feends that doe them endlesse paine
With fire and brimstone, which for ever shall remaine.

50

The sight whereof so throughly him dismaid,
That nought but death before his eyes he saw,
And ever burning wrath before him laid,
By righteous sentence of th’Almighties law:
Then gan the villein him to overcraw,<sup>o</sup>
And brought unto him swords, ropes, poison, fire,
And all that might him to perdition draw;
And bad him choose, what death he would desire:
For death was due to him, that had provokt Gods ire.

51

But when as none of them he saw him take,
He to him raught<sup>o</sup> a dagger sharpe and keene,
And gave it him in hand: his hand did quake,
And tremble like a leafe of Aspin greene,
And troubled bloud through his pale face was seene
To come, and goe with tydings from the hart,
As it a running messenger had beene.
At last resolved to worke his finall smart,<sup>o</sup>
He lifted up his hand, that backe againe did start.

52

Which when as Una saw, through every vaine
The crudled<sup>o</sup> cold ran to her well of life,<sup>o</sup>
As in a swowne: but soone relived<sup>o</sup> againe,
Out of his hand she snatcht the cursèd knife,
And threw it to the ground, enraged rife,<sup>o</sup>
And to him said, "Fie, fie, faint harted knight,
What meanest thou by this reprochfull<sup>o</sup> strife?
Is this the battell, which thou vauntst to fight
With the fire-mouthèd Dragon, horrible and bright?

53

"Come, come away, fraile, feeble, fleshly wight,
Ne let vaine words bewitch thy manly hart,
Ne divelish thoughts dismay thy constant spright.<sup>o</sup>
In heavenly mercies hast thou not a part?
Why shouldst thou then despeire, that chosen<sup>9</sup> art?
Where justice growes, there grows eke<sup>o</sup> greater grace,
The which doth quench the brond<sup>o</sup> of hellish smart,
And that accurst hand-writing<sup>1</sup> doth deface.<sup>o</sup>
Arise, Sir knight arise, and leave this cursèd place."

54

So up he rose, and thence amounted<sup>o</sup> streight.
Which when the carle<sup>o</sup> beheld, and saw his guest
Would safe depart, for<sup>o</sup> all his subtill sleight,
He chose an halter<sup>o</sup> from among the rest,
And with it hung himselfe, unbid<sup>o</sup> unblest.
But death he could not worke himselfe thereby;
For thousand times he so himselfe had drest,<sup>o</sup>
Yet nathelesse it could not doe<sup>o</sup> him die,
Till he should die his last, that is eternally.

Canto 10

*Her faithfull knight faire Una brings to house of Holinesse,
Where he is taught repentance, and the way to heavenly blesse.◊*

1

What man is he, that boasts of fleshly might,
And vaine assurance of mortality,◊
Which all so soone, as it doth come to fight, Against spirituall foes, yeelds by and by,◊
Or from the field most cowardly doth fly?
Ne let the man ascribe it to his skill,
That thorough◊ grace hath gainèd victory.
If any strength we have, it is to ill,
But all the good is Gods, both power and eke◊ will.◊

2

By that, which lately hapned, Una saw,
That this her knight was feeble, and too faint;
And all his sinews woxen weake and raw,◊
Through long enprisonment, and hard constraint,◊
Which he endurèd in his late restraint,
That yet he was unfit for bloudie fight:
Therefore to cherish◊ him with diets daint,◊
She cast◊ to bring him, where he chearen◊ might,
Till he recovered had his◊ late decayèd plight.

3

There was an auntient house not farre away,
Renowmd throughout the world for sacred lore,
And pure unspotted life: so well they say
It governd was, and guided evermore,

Through wisdom of a matrone grave and hore;<sup>o</sup>
Whose onely joy was to relieve the needes
Of wretched soules, and helpe the helpelesse pore:
All night she spent in bidding of her bedes,<sup>o</sup>
And all the day in doing good and godly deedes.

4

Dame Caelia<sup>o</sup> men did her call, as thought
From heaven to come, or thither to arise,
The mother of three daughters, well upbrought
In goodly thewes,<sup>o</sup> and godly exercise:<sup>o</sup>
The eldest two most sober, chast, and wise,
Fidelia and Speranza virgins were,
Though spoused,<sup>o</sup> yet wanting<sup>o</sup> wedlocks solemnize;<sup>3</sup>
But faire Charissa to a lovely fere<sup>o</sup>
Was linckèd, and by him had many pledges dere.<sup>4</sup>

5

Arrivèd there, the dore they find fast lockt;
For it was warely watchèd night and day,
For feare of many foes: but when they knockt,
The Porter opened unto them streight way:
He was an agèd syre, all hory gray,
With lookes full lowly cast, and gate<sup>o</sup> full slow,
Wont<sup>o</sup> on a staffe his feeble steps to stay,
Hight Humilta.<sup>o</sup> They passe in stouping low;
For streight and narrow was the way, which he did show.<sup>5</sup>

6

Each goodly thing is hardest to begin,
But entred in a spacious court they see,
Both plaine, and pleasant to be walkèd in,
Where them does meete a francklin<sup>6</sup> faire and free,
And entertaines with comely courteous glee,

His name was Zele,<sup>o</sup> that him right well became,
For in his speeches and behaviour hee
Did labour lively to expresse the same,
And gladly did them guide, till to the Hall they came.

7

There fairely them receives a gentle Squire,
Of milde demeanure, and rare courtesie,
Right cleanly clad in comely sad<sup>o</sup> attire;
In word and deede that shewed great modestie,
And knew his good<sup>o</sup> to all of each degree,
Hight Reverence. He them with speeches meet<sup>o</sup>
Does faire entreat; no courting nicetie,<sup>z</sup>
But simple true, and eke unfainèd sweet,
As might become a Squire so great persons to greet.

8

And afterwards them to his Dame he leades,
That agèd Dame, the Ladie of the place:
Who all this while was busie at her beades:
Which doen, she up arose with seemely grace,
And toward them full matronely<sup>8</sup> did pace.
Where when that fairest Una she beheld,
Whom well she knew to spring from heavenly race,
Her hart with joy unwonted<sup>o</sup> inly sweld,<sup>o</sup>
As feeling wondrous comfort in her weaker eld.<sup>o</sup>

9

And her embracing said, "O happie earth,
Whereon thy innocent feet doe ever tread,
Most vertuous virgin borne of heavenly berth,
That to redeeme thy woefull parents head,
From tyrans rage, and ever-dying dread,<sup>o</sup>
Hast wandred through the world now long a day<sup>o</sup>
Yet ceasest not thy wearie soles to lead,

What grace hath thee now hither brought this way?
Or doest<sup>o</sup> thy feeble feet unweeting<sup>o</sup> hither stray?

10

"Strange thing it is an errant<sup>o</sup> knight to see
Here in this place, or any other wight,
That hither turnes his steps. So few there bee,
That chose the narrow path, or seeke the right:
All keepe the broad high way, and take delight
With many rather for to go astray,
And be partakers of their evill plight,
Then with a few to walke the Tightest way;<sup>9</sup>
O foolish men, why haste ye to your owne decay?"

11

"Thy selfe to see, and tyred limbs to rest,
O matrone sage," quoth she, "I hither came,
And this good knight his way with me addrest,<sup>o</sup>
Led with thy prayes and broad-blazèd fame,
That up to heaven is blowne."<sup>1</sup> The auncient Dame
Him goodly greeted in her modest guise,
And entertaynd them both, as best became,
With all the court'sies,<sup>o</sup> that she could devise,
Ne wanted ought,<sup>o</sup> to shew her bounteous or wise.

12

Thus as they gan of sundry things devise,<sup>o</sup>
Loe two most goodly virgins came in place,
Ylinkèd arme in arme in lovely wise,<sup>o</sup>
With countenance demure, and modest grace,
They numbred even steps and equall pace:
Of which the eldest, that Fidelia hight,
Like sunny beames threw from her Christall face,
That could have dazd<sup>o</sup> the rash beholders sight,
And round about her head did shine like heavens light.

13

She was araièd<sup>o</sup> all in lilly white,
And in her right hand bore a cup of gold,
With wine and water<sup>2</sup> fild up to the hight,
In which a Serpent<sup>3</sup> did himselfe enfold,
That horreur made to all, that did behold;
But she no whit did chaunge her constant mood:<sup>o</sup>
And in her other hand she fast did hold
A booke,<sup>4</sup> that was both signd and seald with blood,
Wherein darke<sup>o</sup> things were writ, hard to be understood.<sup>5</sup>

14

Her younger sister, that Speranza hight,
Was clad in blew, that her beseemèd<sup>o</sup> well;
Not all so chearefull seemèd she of sight,<sup>o</sup>
As was her sister; whether dread<sup>o</sup> did dwell,
Or anguish in her hart, is hard to tell:
Upon her arme a silver anchor<sup>6</sup> lay,
Whereon she leanèd ever, as befell:<sup>o</sup>
And ever up to heaven, as she did pray,
Her stedfast eyes were bent, ne swarvèd other way.

15

They seeing Una, towards her gan wend,<sup>o</sup>
Who them encounters<sup>o</sup> with like courtesie;
Many kind speeches they betwene them spend,
And greatly joy each other well to see:
Then to the knight with shamefast<sup>o</sup> modestie
They turne themselves, at Unas meeke request,
And him salute with well beseeming glee;<sup>o</sup>
Who faire them quites,<sup>o</sup> as him beseemèd best,
And goodly gan discourse of many a noble gest.<sup>o</sup>

16

Then Una thus; "But she your sister deare,
The deare Charissa where is she become?<sup>o</sup>
Or wants<sup>o</sup> she health, or busie is elsewhere?"
"Ah no," said they, "but forth she may not come:
For she of late is lightned of her wombe,
And hath encreast the world with one sonne more,<sup>7</sup>
That her to see should be but troublesome."
"Indeede," quoth she, "that should her trouble sore,
But thank be God, that her encrease so evermore."<sup>8</sup>

17

Then said the agèd Caelia, "Deare dame,
And you good Sir, I wote<sup>o</sup> that of your toyle,
And labours long, through which ye hither came,
Ye both forwearied<sup>o</sup> be: therefore a whyle
I read<sup>o</sup> you rest, and to your bowres recoyle."<sup>9</sup>
Then callèd she a Groome, that forth him led
Into a goodly lodge, and gan despoile<sup>o</sup>
Of puissant armes, and laid in easie<sup>o</sup> bed;
His name was meeke Obedience rightfully arèd.<sup>o</sup>

18

Now when their wearie limbes with kindly<sup>o</sup> rest,
And bodies were refresht with due repast,<sup>o</sup>
Faire Una gan Fidelia faire request,
To have her knight into her schoolehouse plaste,<sup>o</sup>
That of her heavenly learning he might taste,
And heare the wisdom of her words divine.
She graunted, and that knight so much agraste,<sup>o</sup>
That she him taught celestiall discipline,<sup>o</sup>
And opened his dull eyes, that light mote in them shine.

19

And that her sacred Booke, with bloud<sup>o</sup> ywrit,

That none could read, except she did them teach,
She unto him disclosed every whit,<sup>o</sup>
And heavenly documents<sup>o</sup> thereout did preach,
That weaker wit<sup>o</sup> of man could never reach,
Of God, of grace, of justice, of free will,
That wonder was to heare her goodly speach:
For she was able, with her words to kill,
And raise againe to life the hart, that she did thrill.<sup>o</sup>

20

And when she list<sup>o</sup> poure out her larger spright,<sup>o</sup>
She would commaund the hastie Sunne to stay,
Or backward turne his course from heavens hight;
Sometimes great hostes of men she could dismay,
Dry-shod to passe, she parts the flouds in tway;<sup>o</sup>
And eke huge mountaines from their native seat
She would commaund, themselves to beare away,
And throw in raging sea with roaring threat.
Almightie God her gave such powre, and puissance great.<sup>1</sup>

21

The faithfull knight now grew in litle space,<sup>o</sup>
By hearing her, and by her sisters lore,
To such perfection of all heavenly grace,
That wretched world he gan for to abhore,<sup>2</sup>
And mortall life gan loath, as thing forelore,<sup>o</sup>
Greeved with remembrance of his wicked wayes,
And prickt with anguish of his sinnes so sore,
That he desirde to end his wretched dayes:
So much the dart of sinfull guilt the soule dismayes.

22

But wise Speranza gave him comfort sweet,
And taught him how to take assurèd hold
Upon her silver anchor, as was meet;

Else had his sinnes so great, and manifold
Made him forget all that Fidelia told.
In this distressed doubtful<sup>o</sup> agonie,
When him his dearest Una did behold,
Disdeining life, desiring leave to die,
She found her selfe assayld with great perplexitie.<sup>o</sup>

23

And came to Caelia to declare her smart,<sup>o</sup>
Who well acquainted with that commune<sup>o</sup> plight,
Which sinfull horror<sup>o</sup> workes in wounded hart,
Her wisely comforted all that she might,
With goodly counsell and advisement right;
And streightway sent with carefull diligence,
To fetch a Leach,<sup>o</sup> the which had great insight
In that disease of grievèd<sup>o</sup> consciënce,
And well could cure the same; His name was Patiënce.

24

Who comming to that soule-diseased knight,
Could hardly<sup>o</sup> him intreat, to tell his grieve:
Which knowne, and all that noyd<sup>o</sup> his heavie spright
Well searcht,<sup>o</sup> eftsoones<sup>o</sup> he gan apply reliefe
Of salves and med'cines, which had passing priefe,<sup>3</sup>
And thereto added words of wondrous might:
By which to ease he him recured<sup>o</sup> briefe,<sup>o</sup>
And much asswaged the passion<sup>o</sup> of his plight,
That he his paine endured, as seeming now more light.

25

But yet the cause and root of all his ill,
Inward corruption, and infected sin,<sup>4</sup>
Not purged nor heald, behind remainèd still,
And festring sore did rankle yet within,
Close<sup>o</sup> creeping twixt the marrow and the skin.

Which to extirpe,<sup>o</sup> he laid him privily
Downe in a darkesome lowly place farre in,
Whereas<sup>o</sup> he meant his corrosives to apply,
And with streight<sup>o</sup> diet tame his stubborne malady.

26

In ashes and sackcloth<sup>5</sup> he did array
His daintie corse,<sup>o</sup> proud humors<sup>6</sup> to abate,
And dieted with fasting every day,
The swelling of his wounds to mitigate,
And made him pray both earely and eke late:
And ever as superfluous flesh did rot
Amendment readie still at hand did wayt,
To pluck it out with pincers firie whot,<sup>o</sup>
That soone in him was left no one corrupted jot.

27

And bitter Penance with an yron whip,
Was wont him once to disple<sup>o</sup> every day:
And sharpe Remorse his hart did pricke and nip,
That drops of bloud thence like a well did play;
And sad Repentance usèd to embay<sup>o</sup>
His bodie in salt water smarting sore,
The filthy blots of sinne to wash away.<sup>7</sup>
So in short space they did to health restore
The man that would not live, but earst<sup>o</sup> lay at deathes dore.

28

In which his torment often was so great,
That like a Lyon he would cry and rore,
And rend his flesh, and his owne synewes eat.
His own deare Una hearing evermore
His ruefull shriekes and gronings, often tore
Her guiltlesse garments, and her golden heare,

For pittie of his paine and anguish sore;
Yet all with patience wisely she did beare;
For well she wist, his crime could else be never cleare.°

29

Whom thus recovered by wise Patiënce,
And trew Repentance they to Una brought:
Who joyous of his curèd consciënce,
Him dearely kist, and fairely° eke besought
Himselfe to chearish,° and consuming thought
To put away out of his carefull° brest.
By this° Charissa, late° in child-bed brought,
Was woxen° strong, and left her fruitfull nest;
To her faire Una brought this unacquainted guest.

30

She was a woman in her freshest age,
Of wondrous beauty, and of bountie° rare,
With goodly grace and comely personage,°
That was on earth not easie to compare;°
Full of great love, but Cupids wanton snare
As hell she hated, chast in worke and will;
Her necke and breasts were ever open bare,
That ay° thereof her babes might sucke their fill;
The rest was all in yellow robes arayèd still.⁸

31

A multitude of babes about her hong,
Playing their sports, that joyd her to behold,
Whom still she fed, whiles they were weake and young,
But thrust them forth° still, as they wexèd old:
And on her head she wore a tyre° of gold,
Adornd with gemmes and owches° wondrous faire,
Whose passing° price uneath° was to be told;
And by her side there sate a gentle paire

Of turtle doves,<sup>9</sup> she sitting in an yvorie chaire.

32

The knight and Una entring, faire her greet,
And bid her joy of that her happie brood;
Who them requites with court'sies seeming meet,<sup>o</sup>
And entertaines with friendly chearefull mood.
Then Una her besought, to be so good,
As in her vertuous rules to schoole her knight,
Now after all his torment well withstood,
In that sad<sup>o</sup> house of Penance, where his spright
Had past<sup>o</sup> the paines of hell, and long enduring night.

33

She was right joyous of her just request,
And taking by the hand that Faeries sonne,
Gan him instruct in every good behest,<sup>o</sup>
Of love, and righteousness, and well to donne,<sup>o</sup>
And wrath, and hatred warely<sup>o</sup> to shonne,
That drew on men Gods hatred, and his wrath,
And many soules in dolours<sup>o</sup> had fordonne:<sup>o</sup>
In which when him she well instructed hath,
From thence to heaven she teacheth him the ready<sup>o</sup> path.

34

Wherein his weaker<sup>o</sup> wandring steps to guide,
An auncient matrone she to her does call,
Whose sober looks her wisdom well descride:<sup>o</sup>
Her name was Mercie, well knowne over all,
To be both gracious, and eke liberall:
To whom the carefull charge of him she gave,
To lead aright, that he should never fall
In all his wayes through this wide worldès wave,<sup>o</sup>
That Mercy in the end his righteous soule might save.

35

The godly Matrone by the hand him beares<sup>o</sup>
Forth from her<sup>o</sup> presence, by a narrow way,
Scattered with bushy thornes, and ragged breares,<sup>o</sup>
Which still before him she removed away,
That nothing might his ready passage stay:<sup>o</sup>
And ever when his feet encombred were,
Or gan to shrink, or from the right to stray,
She held him fast, and firmly did upbeare,
As carefull Nourse her child from falling oft does reare.

36

Eftsoones unto an holy Hospitall,<sup>o</sup>
That was fore<sup>o</sup> by the way, she did him bring,
In which seven Bead-men<sup>o</sup> that had vowed all
Their life to service of high heavens king
Did spend their dayes in doing godly thing:
Their gates to all were open evermore,
That by the wearie way were traveiling,
And one sate wayting ever them before,
To call in commers-by, that needy were and pore.<sup>1</sup>

37

The first of them that eldest was, and best,<sup>o</sup>
Of all the house had charge and government,
As Guardian and Steward of the rest:
His office<sup>o</sup> was to give entertainment
And lodging, unto all that came, and went:
Not unto such, as could him feast againe,<sup>o</sup>
And double quite,<sup>o</sup> for that he on them spent,
But such, as want of harbour<sup>o</sup> did constraine:<sup>o</sup>
Those for Gods sake his dewty was to entertaine.

38

The second was as Almner<sup>2</sup> of the place,
His office was, the hungry for to feed,
And thristy give to drinke, a worke of grace:
He feard not once him selfe to be in need,
Ne cared to hoord for those, whom he did breede:°
The grace of God he layd up still in store,
Which as a stocke° he left unto his seede;°
He had enough, what need him care for more?
And had he lesse, yet some he would give to the pore.

39

The third had of their wardrobe custodie,
In which were not rich tyres,° nor garments gay,
The plumes of pride, and wings of vanitie,
But clothes meet to keepe keene could° away,
And naked nature seemely° to aray;
With which bare wretched wights he dayly clad,
The images of God in earthly clay;
And if that no spare clothes to give he had,
His owne coate he would cut, and it distribute glad.

40

The fourth appointed by his office was,
Poore prisoners to relieve with gracious ayd,
And captives to redeeme with price of bras,°
From Turkes and Sarazins, which them had stayd;°
And though they faultie were, yet well he wayd,°
That God to us forgiveth every howre
Much more then that, why° they in bands° were layd,
And he that harrowd hell<sup>3</sup> with heavie stowre,°
The faultie° soules from thence brought to his heavenly bowre.

41

The fift had charge sicke persons to attend,
And comfort those, in point of death which lay;

For them most needeth comfort in the end,
When sin, and hell, and death do most dismay
The feeble soule departing hence away.
All is but lost, that living we bestow,<sup>o</sup>
If not well ended at our dying day.
O man have mind of that last bitter throw;<sup>o</sup>
For as the tree does fall, so lyes it ever low.<sup>4</sup>

42

The sixt had charge of them now being dead,
In seemely sort their corses to engrave,<sup>o</sup>
And deck with dainty flowres their bridall bed,
That to their heavenly spouse<sup>o</sup> both sweet and brave<sup>o</sup>
They might appeare, when he their soules shall save.
The wondrous workemanship of Gods owne mould,<sup>5</sup>
Whose face he made, all beasts to feare,<sup>o</sup> and gave
All in his hand,<sup>6</sup> even dead we honour should.
Ah dearest God me graunt, I dead be not defould.<sup>o</sup>

43

The seventh now after death and buriall done,
Had charge the tender Orphans of the dead
And widowes ayd, least<sup>o</sup> they should be undone:
In face of judgement<sup>o</sup> he their right would plead,
Ne ought<sup>o</sup> the powre of mighty men did dread
In their defence, nor would for gold or fee<sup>o</sup>
Be wonne their rightfull causes downe to tread:
And when they stood in most necessitee,
He did supply their want, and gave them ever free.<sup>7</sup>

44

There when the Elfin knight arrivèd was,
The first and chieftest of the seven, whose care
Was guests to welcome, towardes him did pas:

Where seeing Mercie, that his steps up bare,<sup>o</sup>
And alwayes led, to her with reverence rare<sup>o</sup>
He humbly louted<sup>o</sup> in meeke lowlinesse,
And seemely welcome for her did prepare:
For of their order she was Patronesse,
Albe<sup>o</sup> Charissa were their chiefest founderesse.

45

There she awhile him stayes, him selfe to rest,
That to the rest more able he might bee:
During which time, in every good behest<sup>o</sup>
And godly worke of Almes and charitee
She him instructed with great industree;
Shortly therein so perfect he became,
That from the first unto the last degree,
His mortall life he learnèd had to frame
In holy righteousness, without rebuke or blame.

46

Thence forward by that painfull way they pas,
Forth to an hill, that was both steepe and hy;
On top whereof a sacred chappell was,
And eke a litle Hermitage thereby,
Wherein an agèd holy man did lye,<sup>o</sup>
That day and night said his devotiön,
Ne other worldly busines did apply;<sup>8</sup>
His name was heavenly Contemplatiön;
Of God and goodnesse was his meditatiön.

47

Great grace that old man to him given had;
For God he often saw from heavens hight,
All<sup>o</sup> were his earthly eyen both blunt<sup>o</sup> and bad,
And through great age had lost their kindly<sup>o</sup> sight,
Yet wondrous quick and persant<sup>o</sup> was his spright,<sup>o</sup>

As Eagles eye, that can behold the Sunne:<sup>9</sup>
That hill they scale with all their powre and might,
That his frayle thighes nigh<sup>o</sup> wearie and fordonne<sup>o</sup>
Gan faile, but by her helpe the top at last he wonne.

48

There they do finde that godly agèd Sire,
With snowy lockes adowne his shoulders shed,
As hoarie frost with spangles doth attire
The mossy braunches of an Oke halfe ded.
Each bone might through his body well be red,<sup>o</sup>
And every sinew seene through<sup>o</sup> his long fast:
For nought he cared his carcas long unfed;
His mind was full of spirituall repast,
And pynd<sup>o</sup> his flesh, to keepe his body low<sup>o</sup> and chast.

49

Who when these two approching he aspide,
At their first presence grew agrievèd sore,<sup>1</sup>
That forst him lay his heavenly thoughts aside;
And had he not that Dame respected more,<sup>o</sup>
Whom highly he did reverence and adore,
He would not once have movèd for the knight.
They him saluted standing far afore;<sup>o</sup>
Who well them greeting, humbly did requight,<sup>o</sup>
And askèd, to what end they clomb<sup>o</sup> that tedious height.

50

“What end,” quoth she, “should cause us take such paine,
But that same end, which every living wight
Should make his marke,<sup>o</sup> high heaven to attaine?
Is not from hence the way, that leadeth right
To that most glorious house, that glistreth<sup>o</sup> bright
With burning starres, and everliving fire,
Whereof the keyes are to thy hand behight<sup>o</sup>

By wise Fidelia? she doth thee require,
To shew it to this knight, according<sup>o</sup> his desire."

51

"Thrise happy man," said then the father grave,
"Whose staggering steps thy<sup>o</sup> steady hand doth lead,
And shewes the way, his sinfull soule to save.
Who better can the way to heaven aread<sup>o</sup>
Then thou thy selfe, that was both borne and bred
In heavenly throne, where thousand Angels shine?
Thou doest the prayers of the righteous sead<sup>o</sup>
Present before the majestie divine,
And his avenging wrath to clemencie incline.

52

"Yet since thou bidst, thy pleasure shalbe donne.
Then come thou man of earth,<sup>2</sup> and see the way,
That never yet was seene of Faeries sonne,
That never leads the traveiler astray,
But after labours long, and sad delay,
Brings them to joyous rest and endlesse blis.
But first thou must a season fast and pray,
Till from her bands the spright assoilèd<sup>o</sup> is,
And have her strength recured<sup>o</sup> from fraile infirmitis."

53

That done, he leads him to the highest Mount;
Such one, as that same mighty man<sup>o</sup> of God,
That bloud-red billowes like a wallèd front
On either side disparted<sup>o</sup> with his rod,
Till that his army dry-foot through them yod,<sup>o</sup>
Dwelt fortie dayes upon; where writ in stone
With bloody letters by the hand of God,
The bitter doome of death and balefull mone<sup>3</sup>
He did receive, whiles flashing fire about him shone.

54

Or like that sacred hill, whose head full hie,
Adorn'd with fruitfull Olives all arownd,
Is, as it were for endlesse memory
Of that deare Lord, who oft thereon was fownd,
For ever with a flowring girlond crownd:
Or like that pleasaunt Mount, that is for ay<sup>o</sup>
Through famous Poets verse each where<sup>o</sup> renown'd,
On which the thrise three learned Ladies play
Their heavenly notes, and make full many a lovely lay.<sup>4</sup>

55

From thence, far off he unto him did shew
A litle path, that was both steepe and long,
Which to a goodly Citie led his vew;
Whose wals and towres were builded high and strong
Of perle and precious stone,<sup>5</sup> that earthly tong
Cannot describe, nor wit of man can tell;
Too high a ditty<sup>o</sup> for my simple song;
The Citie of the great king hight<sup>o</sup> it well,
Wherein eternall peace and happinesse doth dwell.

56

As he thereon stood gazing, he might<sup>o</sup> see
The blessed Angels to and fro descend
From highest heaven, in gladsome companee,
And with great joy into that Citie wend,<sup>o</sup>
As commonly<sup>o</sup> as friend does with his frend.<sup>6</sup>
Whereat he wondred much, and gan enquire,
What stately building durst so high extend
Her loftie towres unto the starry sphere,
And what unknownen nation there empeopled were.<sup>o</sup>

57

“Faire knight,” quoth he, “Hierusalem that is,
The new Hierusalem, that God has built
For those to dwell in, that are chosen his,
His chosen people purged from sinfull guilt,
With pretious bloud, which cruelly was spilt
On cursèd tree, of that unspotted lam,<sup>7</sup>
That for the sinnes of all the world was kilt:
Now are they Saints all in that Citie sam,<sup>o</sup>
More deare unto their God, then younglings to their dam.”<sup>8</sup>

58

“Till now,” said then the knight, “I weened<sup>o</sup> well,
That great Cleopolis,<sup>9</sup> where I have beene,
In which that fairest Faerie Queene doth dwell,
The fairest Citie was, that might be seene;
And that bright towre all built of christall cleene,<sup>o</sup>
Panthea,<sup>1</sup> seemd the brightest thing, that was:
But now by prooffe<sup>o</sup> all otherwise I weene;
For this great Citie that<sup>2</sup> does far surpas,
And this bright Angels towre quite dims that towre of glas.”

59

“Most trew,” then said the holy agèd man;
“Yet is Cleopolis for earthly frame,<sup>o</sup>
The fairest peece,<sup>o</sup> that eye beholden can:
And well beseemes<sup>o</sup> all knights of noble name,
That covet in th’immortall booke of fame
To be eternizèd, that same to haunt,<sup>o</sup>
And doen their service to that soveraigne Dame,
That glorie does to them for guerdon<sup>o</sup> graunt:
For she is heavenly borne, and heaven may justly vaunt.”<sup>3</sup>

60

“And thou faire ymp,<sup>o</sup> sprong out from English race,

How ever now accompted<sup>o</sup> Elfins sonne,
Well worthy doest thy service for her grace,<sup>o</sup>
To aide a virgin desolate foredonne.<sup>o</sup>
But when thou famous victorie hast wonne,
And high emongst all knights hast hong thy shield,
Thenceforth the suit<sup>o</sup> of earthly conquest shonne,<sup>o</sup>
And wash thy hands from guilt of bloudy field:
For bloud can nought but sin, and wars but sorrowes yield.

61

"Then seeke this path, that I to thee presage,<sup>o</sup>
Which after all to heaven shall thee send;
Then peaceably thy painefull<sup>o</sup> pilgrimage
To yonder same Hierusalem do bend,
Where is for thee ordaind a blessèd end:
For thou emongst those Saints, whom thou doest see,
Shalt be a Saint, and thine owne nations frend
And Patrone: thou Saint George shalt callèd bee, Saint George of mery England, the signe of victoree."<sup>4</sup>

62

"Unworthy wretch," quoth he, "of so great grace,
How dare I thinke such glory to attaine?"
"These that have it attained, were in like cace," Quoth he, "as wretched, and lived in like paine."
"But deeds of armes must I at last be faine,<sup>o</sup>
And Ladies love to leave so dearly bought?"
"What need of armes, where peace doth ay<sup>o</sup> remaine,"
Said he, "and battailes none are to be fought?
As for loose<sup>o</sup> loves are<sup>o</sup> vaine, and vanish into nought."

63

"O let me not," quoth he, "then turne againe
Backe to the world, whose joyes so fruitlesse are;
But let me here for aye in peace remaine,

Or streight way on that last long voyage fare,<sup>o</sup>
That nothing may my present hope empare."<sup>o</sup>
"That may not be," said he, "ne maist thou yit
Forgo that royall maides bequeathèd care,<sup>o</sup>
Who did her cause into thy hand commit,
Till from her cursèd foe thou have her freely quit."<sup>o</sup>

64

"Then shall I soone," quoth he, "so God me grace,
Abet<sup>o</sup> that virgins cause disconsolate,
And shortly backe returne unto this place
To walke this way in Pilgrims poore estate.
But now aread,<sup>o</sup> old father, why of late
Didst thou behight<sup>o</sup> me borne of English blood, Whom all a Faeries sonne doen nominate?"<sup>o</sup>
"That word shall I," said he, "avouchen<sup>o</sup> good, Sith<sup>o</sup> to thee is unknowne the cradle of thy brood."<sup>5</sup>

65

"For well I wote,<sup>o</sup> thou springst from ancient race
Of Saxon kings, that have with mightie hand
And many bloudie battailes fought in place<sup>o</sup>
High reard their royall throne in Britane land,
And vanquisht them,<sup>o</sup> unable to withstand:
From thence a Faerie thee unweeting reft,<sup>o</sup>
There as thou slepst in tender swadling band,
And her base Elfin brood<sup>o</sup> there for thee left.
Such men do Chaungelings call, so chaungd by Faeries theft.

66

"Thence she thee brought into this Faerie lond,
And in an heapèd furrow did thee hyde,
Where thee a Ploughman all unweeting fond,<sup>o</sup>
As he his toylesome teme<sup>o</sup> that way did guyde,
And brought thee up in ploughmans state to byde,

Whereof Georgos he thee gave to name;<sup>6</sup>
Till prickt<sup>o</sup> with courage, and thy forces pryde,
To Faery court thou cam'st to seeke for fame,
And prove thy puissaunt<sup>o</sup> armes, as seemes thee best became."<sup>7</sup>

67

"O holy Sire," quoth he, "how shall I quight<sup>o</sup>
The many favours I with thee have found,
That hast my name and nation red<sup>o</sup> aright,
And taught the way that does to heaven bound?"<sup>o</sup>
This said, adowne he looked to the ground,
To have returnd, but dazed<sup>o</sup> were his eyne,
Through passing<sup>o</sup> brightnesse, which did quite confound
His feeble sence, and too exceeding shyne.
So darke are earthly things compard to things divine.

68

At last whenas<sup>o</sup> himselfe he gan to find,<sup>o</sup>
To Una back he cast him to retire;<sup>o</sup>
Who him awaited still with pensive<sup>o</sup> mind.
Great thanks and goodly meed<sup>o</sup> to that good syre,
He thence departing gave for his paines hyre.<sup>o</sup>
So came to Una, who him joyd to see,
And after litle rest, gan him desire,
Of her adventure mindfull for to bee.
So leave they take of Caelia, and her daughters three.

Endnotes

- Note 2: "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast" (Ephesians 2:8–9); "it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure" (Philippians 2:13).Return to reference 2

- Note 3: Solemnization.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: That is, many children. The daughters' names mean Faith, Hope, and Charity; compare the three Saracens: Sansfoy, Sansjoy, and Sansloy. This canto draws heavily on scriptural references, especially 1 Corinthians 13:13: "And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity." Many aspects of the House of Holiness oppose their counterparts in the House of Pride (canto 4).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Alluding to Matthew 7:13–14: see stanza 10, n. 9.Return to reference 5

Canto 11

*The knight with that old Dragon fights
two dayes incessantly:
The third him overthrowes, and gayns most glorious victory.*

1

High time now gan it wex<sub>o</sub> for Una faire,
To thinke of those her captive Parents deare,
And their forwasted kingdome to repaire:<sup>8</sup>
Whereto whenas they now approachèd neare,
With hartie<sub>o</sub> words her knight she gan to cheare,
And in her modest manner thus bespake;
"Deare knight, as deare, as ever knight was deare,
That all these sorrowes suffer for my sake,
High heaven behold the tedious toyle, ye for me take.

2

"Now are we come unto my native soyle,
And to the place, where all our perils dwell;
Here haunts that feend,<sub>o</sub> and does his dayly spoyle,
Therefore henceforth be at your keeping well,<sub>o</sub>
And ever ready for your foeman fell.<sub>o</sub>
The sparke of noble courage now awake,
And strive your excellent selfe to excell;
That shall ye evermore renownèd make,
Above all knights on earth, that batteill undertake."

3

And pointing forth, "lo yonder is," said she,
"The brasen towre in which my parents deare
For dread of that huge feend emprisond be,
Whom I from far see on the walles appeare,

Whose sight my feeble soule doth greatly cheare:
And on the top of all I do espye
The watchman wayting tydings glad to heare,
That O my parents might I happily
Unto you bring, to ease you of your misery."

4

With that they heard a roaring hideous sound,
That all the ayre with terrour fillèd wide,
And seemd uneath<sup>o</sup> to shake the stedfast ground.
Eftsoones<sup>o</sup> that dreadfull Dragon they espide,
Where stretcht he lay upon the sunny side
Of a great hill, himselfe like a great hill.
But all so soone, as he from far descride
Those glistring armes, that heaven with light did fill,
He rousd himselfe full blith,<sup>o</sup> and hastned them untill.<sup>o</sup>

5

Then bad<sup>o</sup> the knight his Lady yede<sup>o</sup> aloofe,
And to an hill her selfe withdraw aside,
From whence she might behold that battailles proof<sup>o</sup>
And eke<sup>o</sup> be safe from daunger far descryde:<sup>o</sup>
She him obayd, and turnd a little wyde.<sup>o</sup>
Now O thou sacred Muse, most learnèd Dame,
Faire ympe<sup>o</sup> of Phoebus, and his agèd bride,<sup>9</sup>
The Nourse of time, and everlasting fame,
That warlike hands ennoblest with immortall name;

6

O gently come into my feeble brest,
Come gently, but not with that mighty rage,
Wherewith the martiall troupes thou doest infest,<sup>o</sup>
And harts of great Heroes doest enrage,
That nought their kindled courage may aswage,<sup>o</sup>
Soone as thy dreadfull trompe<sup>o</sup> begins to sownd;

The God of warre with his fiers equipage<sup>o</sup>
Thou doest awake, sleepe never he so sownd,
And scarèd nations doest with horroure sterne astown.<sup>o</sup>

7

Faire Goddesses lay that furious fit<sup>o</sup> aside,
Till I of warres and bloudy Mars do sing,<sup>1</sup>
And Briton fields with Sarazin<sup>o</sup> bloud bedyde,<sup>o</sup>
Twixt that great faery Queene and Paynim<sup>o</sup> king,
That with their horroure heaven and earth did ring,
A worke of labour long, and endlesse prayse:
But now a while let downe that haughtie string,
And to my tunes thy second tenor rayse,<sup>2</sup>
That I this man of God his godly armes may blaze.<sup>o</sup>

8

By this the dreadfull Beast drew nigh to hand,
Halfe flying, and halfe footing<sup>o</sup> in his hast,
That with his largenesse measurèd much land,
And made wide shadow under his huge wast;<sup>o</sup>
As mountaine doth the valley overcast.
Approching nigh, he reared high afore
His body monstrous, horrible, and vast,
Which to increase his wondrous greatnesse more,
Was swolne with wrath, and poyson, and with bloudy gore.

9

And over, all with brasen scales was armd,
Like plated coate of steele, so couchèd neare,<sup>o</sup>
That nought mote perce,<sup>3</sup> ne might his corse<sup>o</sup> be harmd
With dint of sword, nor push of pointed speare;
Which as an Eagle, seeing pray appeare,
His aery Plumes doth rouze,<sup>o</sup> full rudely dight,<sup>o</sup>
So shakèd he, that horroure was to heare,

For as the clashing of an Armour bright,
Such noyse his rouzèd scales did send unto the knight.

10

His flaggy<sup>o</sup> wings when forth he did display,
Were like two sayles, in which the hollow wynd
Is gathered full, and worketh speedy way:
And eke the pennes, that did his pineons bynd,
Were like mayne-yards, with flying canvas lynd,<sup>4</sup>
With which whenas him list<sup>o</sup> the ayre to beat,
And there by force unwonted<sup>o</sup> passage find,
The cloudes before him fled for terrour great,
And all the heavens stood still amazed with his threat.

11

His huge long tayle wound up in hundred foldes,
Does overspred his long bras-scaly backe,
Whose wreathèd boughts<sup>o</sup> when ever he unfolde,
And thicke entangled knots adown does slacke,
Bespotted as with shields<sup>o</sup> of red and blacke,
It sweepeth all the land behind him farre,
And of three furlongs<sup>5</sup> does but litle lacke;
And at the point two stings in-fixèd arre,
Both deadly sharpe, that sharpest steele exceeden farre.

12

But stings and sharpest steele did far exceed<sup>o</sup>
The sharpnesse of his cruell rending clawes;
Dead was it sure, as sure as death in deed,<sup>o</sup>
What ever thing does touch his ravenous pawes,
Or what within his reach he ever drawes.
But his most hideous head my tounge to tell
Does tremble: for his deepe devouring jawes
Wide gapèd, like the griesly<sup>o</sup> mouth of hell,
Through which into his darke abisse all ravin<sup>o</sup> fell.

13

And that<sup>o</sup> more wondrous was, in either jaw
Three ranckes of yron teeth enraungèd<sup>o</sup> were,
In which yet trickling bloud and gobbets raw<sup>o</sup>
Of late<sup>o</sup> devourèd bodies did appeare,
That sight thereof bred cold congealèd feare:
Which to increase, and all at once to kill,
A cloud of smothering smoke and sulphur seare<sup>o</sup>
Out of his stinking gorge<sup>o</sup> forth steemèd still,
That all the ayre about with smoke and stench did fill.

14

His blazing eyes, like two bright shining shields,
Did burne with wrath, and sparkled living fyre;
As two broad Beacons, set in open fields,
Send forth their flames farre off to every shyre,<sup>o</sup>
And warning give, that enemies conspyre,
With fire and sword the region to invade;
So flamed his eyne<sup>o</sup> with rage and rancorous yre:<sup>o</sup>
But farre within, as in a hollow glade,
Those glaring lampes were set, that made a dreadfull shade.

15

So dreadfully he towards him did pas,
Forelifting up aloft his speckled brest,
And often bounding on the brusèd gras,
As for great joyance of his newcome guest.
Eftsoones he gan advance his haughtie crest,
As chauffèd<sup>o</sup> Bore his bristles doth upreare,
And shoke his scales to battell readie drest;<sup>o</sup>
That made the Redcrosse knight nigh quake for feare,
As bidding bold defiance to his foeman neare.

16

The knight gan fairely couch<sup>o</sup> his steadie speare,
And fiercely ran at him with rigorous<sup>o</sup> might:
The pointed steele arriving rudely<sup>o</sup> theare,
His harder hide would neither perce, nor bight,
But glauncing by forth passèd forward right;
Yet sore amovèd with so puissant push,
The wrathfull beast about him turnèd light,<sup>o</sup>
And him so rudely passing by, did brush
With his long tayle, that horse and man to ground did rush.

17

Both horse and man up lightly rose againe,
And fresh encounter towards him addrest:
But th'idle<sup>o</sup> stroke yet backe recoyld in vaine,
And found no place his<sup>o</sup> deadly point to rest.
Exceeding rage enflamed the furious beast,
To be avengèd of so great despight;<sup>o</sup>
For never felt his imperceable brest
So wondrous force, from hand of living wight;
Yet had he proved<sup>o</sup> the powre of many a puissant knight.

18

Then with his waving wings displayèd wyde,
Himselfe up high he lifted from the ground,
And with strong flight did forcibly divide
The yielding aire, which nigh<sup>o</sup> too feeble found
Her flitting<sup>o</sup> partes, and element unsound,<sup>o</sup>
To beare so great a weight: he cutting way
With his broad sayles, about him soarèd round:
At last low stouping with unweldie sway,<sup>o</sup>
Snatcht up both horse and man, to beare them quite away.

19

Long he them bore above the subject plaine,<sup>o</sup>
So farre as Ewghen<sup>o</sup> bow a shaft may send,

Till struggling strong did him at last constraine,
To let them downe before his flightès end:
As hagard hauke presuming to contend
With hardie fowle, above his hable might,o
His wearie pounceso all in vaine doth spend,
To trusseo the pray too heaue for his flight;
Which comming downe to ground, does free it selfe by fight.

20

He so disseizèd of his gryping grosse,6
The knight his thrilanto speare againe assayd
In his bras-plated body to embosse,o
And three mens strength unto the stroke he layd;
Wherewith the stiffe beame quakèd, as affrayd,
And glauncing from his scaly necke, did glyde
Close under his left wing, then broad displayd.
The percing steele there wrought a wound full wyde,
That with the uncoutho smart the Monster lowdly cryde.

21

He cryde, as raging seas are wonto to rore,
When wintry storme his wrathfull wrecko does threat,
The rolling billowes beat the ragged shore,
Aso they the earth would shouldero from her seat,
And greedie gulfeo does gape, as he would eat
His neighbour elemento in his revenge:
Then gin the blustering brethreno boldly threat,
To move the world from off his stedfast henge,o
And boystrous battell make, each other to avenge.o

22

The steely head stucke fast still in his flesh,
Till with his cruell clawes he snatcht the wood,
And quite a sunder broke. Forth flowèd fresh
A gushing river of blacke goarieo blood,

That drownèd all the land, whereon he stood;
The stream thereof would drive a water-mill.
Trebly augmented was his furious mood
With bitter sense of his deepe rooted ill,<sup>o</sup>
That flames of fire he threw forth from his large nosethrill.<sup>o</sup>

23

His hideous taylor then hurlèd he about,
And therewith all enwrapt the nimble thy<sup>o</sup>
Of his froth-fomy steed, whose courage stout
Striving to loose the knot, that fast him tyes,
Himselfe in streighter<sup>o</sup> bandes too rash implies,<sup>7</sup>
That to the ground he is perforce<sup>o</sup> constaynd
To throw his rider: who can<sup>o</sup> quickly ryse
From off the earth, with durty bloud distaynd,<sup>o</sup>
For that reprochfull fall right fowly he disdaynd.<sup>o</sup>

24

And fiercely tooke his trenchand<sup>o</sup> blade in hand,
With which he stroke so furious and so fell,<sup>o</sup>
That nothing seemd the puissance could withstand:
Upon his crest the hardned yron fell,
But his more hardned crest was armd so well,
That deeper dint therein it would not make;<sup>8</sup>
Yet so extremely did the buffe<sup>o</sup> him quell,<sup>o</sup>
That from thenceforth he shund the like to take,
But when he saw them come, he did them still forsake.<sup>o</sup>

25

The knight was wrath to see his stroke beguyld,<sup>o</sup>
And smote againe with more outrageous might;
But backe againe the sparckling steele recoyld,
And left not any marke, where it did light;
As if in Adamant rocke it had bene pight.<sup>o</sup>
The beast impatient of his smarting wound,

And of so fierce and forcible despight,<sup>o</sup>
Thought with his wings to stye<sup>o</sup> above the ground;
But his late wounded wing unserviceable found.

26

Then full of grieve and anguish vehement,
He lowdly brayd, that like was never heard,
And from his wide devouring oven sent
A flake of fire, that flashing in his beard,
Him all amazd, and almost made affeard;
The scorching flame sore swingèd<sup>o</sup> all his face,
And through his armour all his bodie seard,
That he could not endure so cruell cace,<sup>o</sup>
But thought his armes to leave, and helmet to unlace.

27

Not that great Champion of the antique world,<sup>o</sup>
Whom famous Poetes verse so much doth vaunt,
And hath for twelve huge labours high extold,
So many furies and sharpe fits did haunt,
When him the poysoned garment did enchaunt
With Centaures bloud, and bloudie verses charmed,
As did this knight twelve thousand dolours<sup>o</sup> daunt,
Whom fyrie steele now burnt, that earst<sup>o</sup> him armed,
That erst him goodly armed, now most of all him harmed.<sup>9</sup>

28

Faint, wearie, sore, emboylèd,<sup>o</sup> grievèd, brent<sup>o</sup>
With heat, toyle, wounds, armes, smart, and inward fire
That never man such mischiefes<sup>o</sup> did torment;
Death better were, death did he oft desire,
But death will never come, when needes require.
Whom so dismayd when that his foe beheld,
He cast to suffer<sup>o</sup> him no more respire,<sup>o</sup>
But gan his sturdie sterne<sup>o</sup> about to weld,<sup>o</sup>

And him so strongly stroke, that to the ground him feld.

29

It fortunèd (as faire it then befell)
Behind his backe unweeting, <sup>o</sup> where he stood,
Of auncient time there was a springing well,
From which fast trickled forth a silver flood,
Full of great vertues, <sup>o</sup> and for med'cine good.
Whylome, <sup>o</sup> before that cursèd Dragon got
That happie land, and all with innocent blood
Defyld those sacred waves, it rightly hot <sup>o</sup>
The Well of Life, <sup>1</sup> ne yet his vertues had forgot.

30

For unto life the dead it could restore,
And guilt of sinfull crimes cleane wash away,
Those that with sicknesse were infected sore,
It could recure, and agèd long decay
Renew, as one were borne that very day.
Both Silo this, and Jordan did excell,
And th'English Bath, and eke the german Spau,
Ne can Cephise, nor Hebrus match this well:
Into the same the knight backe overthrown, fell. <sup>2</sup>

31

Now gan the golden Phoebus for to steepe
His fierie face in billowes of the west,
And his faint steedes watred in Ocean deepe,
Whiles from their journall <sup>o</sup> labours they did rest,
When that infernall Monster, having kest <sup>o</sup>
His wearie foe into that living well,
Can <sup>o</sup> high advaunce his broad discoloured brest,
Above his wonted pitch, <sup>o</sup> with countenance fell, <sup>o</sup>
And clapt his yron wings, as victor he did dwell. <sup>o</sup>

32

Which when his pensive<sup>o</sup> Ladie saw from farre,
Great woe and sorrow did her soule assay,<sup>o</sup>
As weening<sup>o</sup> that the sad end of the warre,
And gan to highest God entirely<sup>o</sup> pray,
That feared<sup>o</sup> chaunce<sup>o</sup> from her to turne away;
With folded hands and knees full lowly bent
All night she watcht, ne once adowne would lay
Her daintie limbs in her sad dreriment,<sup>o</sup>
But praying still did wake, and waking did lament.

33

The morrow next gan early to appeare,
That<sup>o</sup> Titan<sup>o</sup> rose to runne his daily race;
But early ere the morrow next gan reare
Out of the sea faire Titans deawy face,
Up rose the gentle virgin from her place,
And lookèd all about, if she might spy
Her lovèd knight to move<sup>o</sup> his manly pace:
For she had great doubt of his safety,
Since late she saw him fall before his enemy.

34

At last she saw, where he upstarted brave
Out of the well, wherein he drenchèd lay;
As Eagle fresh out of the Ocean wave,
Where he hath left his plumes all hoary gray,
And deckt himselfe with feathers youthly gay,
Like Eyas hauke<sup>o</sup> up mounts unto the skies,
His newly budded pineons to assay,<sup>o</sup>
And marveiles at himselfe, still as he flies:
So new this new-borne knight to battell new did rise.

35

Whom when the damnèd feend so fresh did spy,
No wonder if he wondred at the sight,
And doubted, whether his late enemy
It were, or other new supplièd knight.
He, now to prove<sup>o</sup> his late renewèd might,
High brandishing his bright deaw-burning blade,
Upon his crested scalpe so sore did smite,
That to the scull a yawning wound it made:
The deadly dint<sup>o</sup> his dullèd senses all dismaid.

36

I wote<sup>o</sup> not, whether the revenging steele
Were hardnèd with that holy water dew,
Wherein he fell, or sharper edge did feele,
Or his baptizèd hands now greater<sup>o</sup> grew;
Or other secret vertue<sup>o</sup> did ensew;
Else never could the force of fleshly arme,
Ne molten mettall in his bloud embrew:<sup>o</sup>
For till that stownd<sup>o</sup> could never wight him harme,
By subtilty, nor slight,<sup>o</sup> nor might, nor mighty charme.

37

The cruell wound enragèd him so sore,
That loud he yellèd for exceeding paine;
As hundred ramping<sup>o</sup> Lyons seemed to rore,
Whom ravenous hunger did thereto constraine:
Then gan he tosse aloft his stretchèd traine,<sup>o</sup>
And therewith scourge the buxome<sup>o</sup> aire so sore,
That to his force to yeelden it was faine;<sup>o</sup>
Ne ought his sturdie strokes might stand afore,<sup>3</sup>
That high trees overthrew, and rocks in peeces tore.

38

The same advauncing high above his head,
With sharpe intended<sup>o</sup> sting so rude<sup>o</sup> him smot,

That to the earth him drove, as stricken dead,
Ne living wight would have him life behot:<sup>4</sup>
The mortall sting his angry needle shot
Quite through his shield, and in his shoulder seasd,
Where fast it stucke, ne would there out be got:
The griefe<sup>o</sup> thereof him wondrous sore diseasd,<sup>o</sup>
Ne might his ranckling paine with patience be appeasd.

39

But yet more mindfull of his honour deare,
Then<sup>o</sup> of the grievous smart, which him did wring,<sup>o</sup>
From loathèd soile he can<sup>o</sup> him lightly reare,
And strove to loose the farre infixèd sting:
Which when in vaine he tryde with struggeling,
Inflamed with wrath, his raging blade he heft,<sup>o</sup>
And strooke so strongly, that the knotty string
Of his huge taile he quite a sunder cleft,
Five joynts thereof he hewd, and but the stump him left.

40

Hart cannot thinke, what outrage,<sup>o</sup> and what cries,
With foule enfouldred<sup>5</sup> smoake and flashing fire,
The hell-bred beast threw forth unto the skyes,
That all was coverèd with darknesse dire:
Then fraught<sup>o</sup> with rancour, and engorgèd<sup>o</sup> ire,
He cast at once him to avenge for all,
And gathering up himselfe out of the mire,
With his uneven wings did fiercely fall
Upon his sunne-bright shield, and gript it fast withall.

41

Much was the man encombred with his hold,
In feare to lose his weapon in his paw,
Ne wist<sup>o</sup> yet, how his talents<sup>o</sup> to unfold;

Nor harder was from Cerberus<sup>6</sup> greedie jaw
To plucke a bone, then from his cruell claw
To reave<sup>o</sup> by strength the gripèd gage<sup>o</sup> away:
Thrise he assayd<sup>o</sup> it from his foot to draw,
And thrise in vaine to draw it did assay,
It bootèd nought to thinke, to robbe him of his pray.

42

Tho<sup>o</sup> when he saw no power might prevaile,
His trustie sword he cald to his last aid,
Wherewith he fiercely did his foe assaile,
And double blowes about him stoutly laid,
That glauncing fire out of the yron plaid;
As sparckles from the Andvile<sup>o</sup> use to fly,
When heavie hammers on the wedge are swaid;<sup>o</sup>
Therewith at last he forst him to unty<sup>o</sup>
One of his grasping feete, him to defend thereby.

43

The other foot, fast fixèd on his shield,
Whenas no strength, nor stroks mote<sup>o</sup> him constraine
To loose, ne yet the warlike pledge to yield,
He smot thereat with all his might and maine,<sup>o</sup>
That nought so wondrous puissance might sustaine;
Upon the joynt the lucky steele did light,
And made such way, that hewd it quite in twaine;
The paw yet missèd not his minisht<sup>o</sup> might,
But hong still on the shield, as it at first was pight.<sup>o</sup>

44

For griefe<sup>o</sup> thereof, and divelish despight,
From his infernall founnace forth he threw
Huge flames, that dimmèd all the heavens light,
Enrold in duskish smoke and brimstone blew;
As burning Aetna<sup>7</sup> from his boyling stew<sup>o</sup>

Doth belch out flames, and rockes in peeces broke,
And ragged ribs of mountaines molten new
Enwrapt in coleblacke clouds and filthy smoke,
That all the land with stench, and heaven with horror choke.

45

The heate whereof, and harmefull pestilence
So sore him noyd,<sup>o</sup> that forst him to retire
A little backward for his best defence,
To save his bodie from the scorching fire,
Which he from hellish entrailes did expire.<sup>o</sup>
It chaunst (eternall God that chaunce did guide)
As he recoylèd backward, in the mire
His nigh forwearied<sup>o</sup> feeble feet did slide,
And downe he fell, with dread of shame sore terrifide.

46

There grew a goodly tree him faire beside,
Loaden with fruit and apples rosie red,
As they in pure vermilion had beene dide,
Whereof great vertues over all were red:<sup>o</sup>
For happie life to all, which thereon fed,
And life eke everlasting did befall:
Great God it planted in that blessed sted<sup>o</sup>
With his almightie hand, and did it call
The Tree of Life, the crime of our first fathers fall.<sup>8</sup>

47

In all the world like was not to be found,
Save in that soile, where all good things did grow,
And freely sprong out of the fruitfull ground,
As incorrupted Nature did them sow,
Till that dread Dragon all did overthrow.
Another like faire tree eke grew thereby,
Whereof who so did eat, eftsoones<sup>o</sup> did know

Both good and ill: O mornefull memory:
That tree through one mans fault hath doen us all to dy.°

48

From that first tree forth flowd, as from a well,
A trickling streame of Balme, most soveraine°
And daintie deare,° which on the ground still fell,
And overflowèd all the fertill plaine,
As it had deawèd bene with timely° raine:
Life and long health that gracious° ointment gave,
And deadly woundes could heale, and reare° againe
The senselesse corse appointed° for the grave.
Into that same he fell: which did from death him save.°

49

For nigh thereto the ever damnèd beast
Durst not approch, for he was deadly made,°
And all that life preservèd, did detest:
Yet he it oft adventured° to invade.
By this the drouping day-light gan to fade,
And yeeld his roome° to sad succeeding° night,
Who with her sable mantle gan to shade
The face of earth, and wayes of living wight,
And high her burning torch set up in heaven bright.

50

When gentle Una saw the second fall
Of her deare knight, who wearie of long fight,
And faint through losse of bloud, moved not at all,
But lay as in a dreame of deepe delight,
Besmeard with pretious Balme, whose vertuous might Did heale his wounds, and scorching heat alay,° Againe she stricken was with sore affright,
And for his safetie gan devoutly pray;
And watch the noyous° night, and wait for joyous day.

51

The joyous day gan early to appeare,
And faire Aurora from the deawy bed
Of agèd Tithone gan her selfe to reare,<sup>2</sup>
With rosie cheekes, for shame as blushing red;
Her golden lockes for haste were loosely shed
About her eares, when Una her did marke
Clymbe to her charet,<sup>o</sup> all with flowers spred,
From heaven high to chase the chearelesse darke;
With merry note her loud salutes the mounting larke.

52

Then freshly up arose the doughtie<sup>o</sup> knight,
All healèd of his hurts and woundès wide,
And did himselfe to battell readie dight;<sup>o</sup>
Whose early foe awaiting him beside
To have devourd, so soone as day he spyde,
When now he saw himselfe so freshly reare,
As if late fight had nought him damnifyde,<sup>o</sup>
He woxe<sup>o</sup> dismayd, and gan his fate to feare;

53

And in his first encounter, gaping wide,
He thought attonce him to have swallowed quight,
And rusht upon him with outrageous pride;
Who him r'encountring fierce, as hauke in flight,
Perforce rebutted<sup>o</sup> backe. The weapon bright
Taking advantage of his open jaw,
Ran through his mouth with so importune<sup>o</sup> might,
That deepe emperst his darksome hollow maw,<sup>o</sup>
And back retyrd,<sup>3</sup> his life bloud forth with all did draw.

54

So downe he fell, and forth his life did breath,
That vanisht into smoke and cloudès swift;
So downe he fell, that th'earth him underneath
Did grone, as feeble so great load to lift;
So downe he fell, as an huge rockie clift,
Whose false<sup>o</sup> foundation waves have washt away,
With dreadfull poyse<sup>o</sup> is from the mayneland rift,<sup>o</sup>
And rolling downe, great Neptune doth dismay;
So downe he fell, and like an heapèd mountaine lay.

55

The knight himselfe even trembled at his fall,
So huge and horrible a masse it seemed;
And his deare Ladie, that beheld it all,
Durst not approach for dread, which she misdeemed,<sup>o</sup>
But yet at last, when as the direfull feend
She saw not stirre, off-shaking vaine affright,
She nigher drew, and saw that joyous end:
Then God she prayisd, and thankd her faithfull knight,
That had atchiev'd so great a conquest by his might.

Endnotes

- Note 8: That is, to restore their kingdom, laid waste (by the dragon).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: That is, Mnemosyne (memory), mother of the Muses.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Perhaps a reference to a projected but unwritten book of The Faerie Queene.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The high-pitched ("haughtie") mode would be appropriate to a large-scale epic war; a lower pitch ("second tenor") suits this present battle.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Nothing might pierce.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: That is, the ribs of his wings were like the massive spars (main yards) to which a ship's mainsail is affixed.Return to

- Note 6: Freed from his formidable grip.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: That is, too quickly entangles.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, it could not make a deep gash there.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Redcrosse's fire baptism is compared with the burning shirt of Nessus, which killed Hercules. His "twelve huge labours" are paralleled to the knight's "twelve thousand dolours."Return to reference 9
- Note 1: An allusion to Revelation 22:1–2: "And he showed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb. In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations."Return to reference 1
- Note 2:
The Well of Life, with its powers of renewal, is successively compared with waters of the Bible, of England and Europe, and of classical antiquity. In the pool of Siloam ("Silo"), a blind man was cured by Christ (John 9:7). Water of the river Jordan cured Naaman of leprosy (2 Kings 5:14) and Christ was baptized therein (Matthew 3:16). The towns of Bath and Spa ("Spau") were famed for their medicinal waters. Cephise and Hebrus, in Greece, were rivers noted for purifying and healing powers.

- Note 3: That is, neither could anything ("ought") stand before his violent ("sturdie") strokes.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Promised. That is, no one would have thought he could survive the blow.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Black as a thundercloud.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The dog that guards the mouth of Hades.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Mount Etna, an active volcano in Sicily.Return to reference 7

- Note 8: Genesis 2:9 describes the Tree of Life and also the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, both of which God planted in the Garden of Eden. The “crime of our first fathers fall” is that Adam, in eating of the second and being banished from Eden, separated himself—and (according to Christian doctrine) his descendants—from the first. The Tree of Life appears again in the New Jerusalem (Revelation 22:2).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The healing balm flowing from the Tree of Life is understood to be Christ’s blood, shed to redeem humankind from eternal damnation.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Compare Revelation 2:7: “To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life” and 2:11: “He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death” (that is, the eternal death, of the soul).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Aurora is goddess of the dawn. Tithonus is her husband (“agèd” because he was granted everlasting life without everlasting youth).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: That is, on being drawn back.Return to reference 3

Canto 12

*Faire Una to the Redcrosse knight betrouthèd is with joy:
Though false Duessa it to barre her false sleights doe imploy.*

1

Behold I see the haven nigh at hand,
To which I meane my wearie course to bend;
Vere the maine shete, and beare up with the land,<sup>4</sup>
The which afore is fairely to be kend,<sup>o</sup>
And seemeth safe from stormes, that may offend;
There this faire virgin wearie of her way
Must landed be, now at her journeyes end:
There eke<sup>o</sup> my feeble barke<sup>o</sup> a while may stay,
Till merry<sup>o</sup> wind and weather call her thence away.

2

Scarsely had Phoebus in the glooming East<sup>o</sup>
Yet harnessèd his firie-footed teeme,
Ne reard above the earth his flaming creast,<sup>o</sup>
When the last deadly smoke aloft did steeme,
That signe of last outbreathèd life did seeme
Unto the watchman on the castle wall;
Who thereby dead that balefull<sup>o</sup> Beast did deeme,
And to his Lord and Ladie lowd gan call,
To tell, how he had seene the Dragons fatall fall.

3

Uprose with hastie joy, and feeble speed
That agèd Sire, the Lord of all that land,
And lookèd forth, to weet,<sup>o</sup> if true indeede
Those tydings were, as he did understand,

Which whenas true by tryall he out fond,
He bad<sup>o</sup> to open wyde his brazen gate,
Which long time had bene shut, and out of hond<sup>o</sup>
Proclaymèd joy and peace through all his state;
For dead now was their foe, which them forrayèd late.<sup>5</sup>

4

Then gan triumphant Trompets sound on hie,
That sent to heaven the ecchoed report
Of their new joy, and happie victorie
Gainst him, that had them long opprest with tort,<sup>o</sup>
And fast imprisonèd in siegèd fort.
Then all the people, as in solemne feast,
To him assembled with one full consort,<sup>o</sup>
Rejoycing at the fall of that great beast,
From whose eternall bondage now they were releast.

5

Forth came that auncient Lord and agèd Queene,
Arayd in antique robes downe to the ground,
And sad habiliments right well beseene;<sup>6</sup>
A noble crew about them waited round
Of sage and sober Peres,<sup>o</sup> all gravely gownd;
Whom farre before did march a goodly band
Of tall young men, all hable armes to sownd,<sup>7</sup>
But now they laurell braunches bore in hand;
Glad signe of victorie and peace in all their land.

6

Unto that doughtie Conquerour they came,
And him before themselves prostrating low,
Their Lord and Patrone<sup>o</sup> loud did him proclame,
And at his feet their laurell boughes did throw.
Soone after them all dauncing on a row

The comely virgins came, with girlands dight,<sup>o</sup>
As fresh as flowres in meadow greene do grow,
When morning dew upon their leaves doth light:
And in their hands sweet Timbrels<sup>o</sup> all upheld on hight.

7

And them before, the fry<sup>o</sup> of children young
Their wanton<sup>o</sup> sports and childish mirth did play,
And to the Maydens sounding tymbrels sung
In well attuned notes, a joyous lay,<sup>o</sup>
And made delightfull musicke all the way,
Untill they came, where that faire virgin stood;
As faire Diana<sup>o</sup> in fresh sommers day
Beholds her Nymphes, enraunged<sup>o</sup> in shadie wood,
Some wrestle, some do run, some bathe in christall flood.

8

So she beheld those maydens meriment
With chearefull vew; who when to her they came,
Themselves to ground with gracious humblesse<sup>o</sup> bent,
And her adored by honorable name,<sup>o</sup>
Lifting to heaven her everlasting fame:
Then on her head they set a girland greene,
And crownèd her twixt earnest and twixt game:<sup>o</sup>
Who in her selfe-resemblance well beseene,<sup>8</sup>
Did seeme such, as she was, a goodly maiden Queene.

9

And after all, the raskall many<sup>o</sup> ran,
Heapèd together in rude rablement,<sup>o</sup>
To see the face of that victorious man:
Whom all admirèd,<sup>o</sup> as from heaven sent,
And gazd upon with gaping wonderment.
But when they came, where that dead Dragon lay,
Stretcht on the ground in monstrous large extent,

The sight with idle<sup>o</sup> feare did them dismay,
Ne durst approach him nigh, to touch, or once assay.<sup>o</sup>

10

Some feard, and fled; some feard and well it faynd;<sup>o</sup>
One that would wiser seeme, then all the rest,
Warnd him not touch, for yet perhaps remaynd
Some lingring life within his hollow brest,
Or in his wombe might lurke some hidden nest
Of many Dragonets,<sup>o</sup> his fruitfull seed;
Another said, that in his eyes did rest
Yet sparckling fire, and bad thereof take heed;
Another said, he saw him move his eyes indeed.

11

One mother, when as her foolehardie chyld
Did come too neare, and with his talants<sup>o</sup> play,
Halfe dead through feare, her litle babe revyld,<sup>o</sup>
And to her gossips<sup>o</sup> gan in counsell<sup>o</sup> say;
"How can I tell, but that his talants may Yet scratch my sonne, or rend his tender hand?"
So diversly themselves in vaine they fray;<sup>o</sup>
Whiles some more bold, to measure him nigh stand,
To prove<sup>o</sup> how many acres he did spread of land.

12

Thus flockèd all the folke him round about,
The whiles that hoarie<sup>o</sup> king, with all his traine,
Being arrivèd, where that champion stout
After his foes defeasance<sup>o</sup> did remaine,
Him goodly greetes, and faire does entertaine,
With princely gifts of yvorie and gold,
And thousand thanks him yeelds for all his paine.
Then when his daughter deare he does behold,
Her dearely doth imbrace, and kisseth manifold.<sup>o</sup>

13

And after to his Pallace he them brings,
With shaumes, and trompets, and with Clarions<sup>9</sup> sweet;
And all the way the joyous people sings,
And with their garments strowes the paved street:
Whence mounting up, they find purveyance<sup>o</sup> meet
Of all, that royall Princes court became,<sup>o</sup>
And all the floore was underneath their feet
Bespred with costly scarlot of great name,<sup>o</sup>
On which they lowly sit, and fitting purpose frame.<sup>1</sup>

14

What needs me tell their feast and goodly guize,<sup>o</sup>
In which was nothing riotous nor vaine?
What needs of daintie dishes to devize,<sup>o</sup>
Of comely<sup>o</sup> services, or courtly trayne?<sup>o</sup>
My narrow leaves cannot in them containe
The large discourse<sup>o</sup> of royall Princes state.
Yet was their manner then but bare and plaine:
For th'antique world excesse and pride did hate;
Such proud luxurious pompe is swollen up but late.<sup>o</sup>

15

Then when with meates and drinkes of every kinde
Their fervent appetites they quenched had,
That auncient Lord gan fit occasion finde,
Of straunge adventures, and of perils sad,<sup>o</sup>
Which in his travell him befallen had,
For to demaund<sup>o</sup> of his renownèd guest:
Who then with utt'rance grave, and count'nance sad,
From point to point,<sup>o</sup> as is before exprest,

16

Great pleasure mixt with pittifull<sup>o</sup> regard,
That godly King and Queene did passionate,<sup>o</sup>
Whiles they his pittifull<sup>o</sup> adventures heard,
That oft they did lament his lucklesse state,
And often blame the too importune<sup>o</sup> fate,
That heapd on him so many wrathfull wreaques:<sup>o</sup>
For never gentle knight, as he of late,
So tossèd was in fortunes cruell freakes;<sup>o</sup>
And all the while salt teares bedewd the hearers cheeks.

17

Then said that royall Pere in sober wise:
"Deare Sonne, great beene the evils, which ye bore
From first to last in your late enterprise,
That I note,<sup>o</sup> whether prayse, or pittie more:
For never living man, I weene,<sup>o</sup> so sore
In sea of deadly daungers was distrest;
But since now safe ye seised<sup>o</sup> have the shore,
And well arrivèd are (high God be blest),
Let us devize<sup>o</sup> of ease and everlasting rest."

18

"Ah dearest Lord," said then that doughty knight,
"Of ease or rest I may not yet devize;
For by the faith, which I to armes have plight,<sup>o</sup>
I bounden am streight<sup>o</sup> after this emprize,<sup>o</sup>
As that your daughter can ye well advize,
Backe to returne to that great Faerie Queene,
And her to serve six yeares in warlike wize,<sup>o</sup>
Gainst that proud Paynim king, that workes her teene:<sup>o</sup>
Therefore I ought<sup>o</sup> crave pardon, till I there have beene."<sup>2</sup>

19

"Unhappie falles that hard necessitie," Quoth he, "the troubler of my happie peace,

And vowèd foe of my felicitie;
Ne<sup>o</sup> I against the same can justly preace:<sup>o</sup>
But since that band<sup>o</sup> ye cannot now release,
Nor doen undo (for vowes may not be vaine),<sup>3</sup>
Soone as the terme of those six yeares shall cease,
Ye then shall hither backe returne againe,
The marriage to accomplish vovd betwixt you twain.

20

“Which for my part I covet to performe,
In sort as<sup>o</sup> through the world I did proclame,
That who so kild that monster most deforme,<sup>o</sup>
And him in hardy battaile overcame,
Should have mine onely daughter to his Dame,<sup>o</sup>
And of my kingdome heire apparaunt bee:
Therefore since now to thee pertienes<sup>o</sup> the same,
By dew desert of noble chevalree,
Both daughter and eke kingdome, lo I yield to thee.”

21

Then forth he callèd that his daughter faire,
The fairest Un’ his onely daughter deare,
His onely daughter, and his onely heyre;
Who forth proceeding with sad<sup>o</sup> sober cheare,<sup>o</sup>
As bright as doth the morning starre appeare
Out of the East, with flaming lockes bedight,<sup>o</sup>
To tell that dawning day is drawing neare,
And to the world does bring long wishèd light;
So faire and fresh that Lady shewd her selfe in sight.

22

So faire and fresh, as freshest flowre in May;
For she had layd her mournfull stole<sup>4</sup> aside,
And widow-like sad wimple<sup>o</sup> throwne away,
Wherewith her heavenly beautie she did hide,

Whiles on her wearie journey she did ride;
And on her now a garment she did weare,
All lilly white, withoutten spot, or pride,<sup>o</sup>
That seemed like silke and silver woven neare,<sup>o</sup>
But neither silke nor silver therein did appeare.<sup>5</sup>

23

The blazing brightnesse of her beauties beame,
And glorious light of her sunshyny face<sup>6</sup>
To tell, were as to strive against the streame.
My ragged rimes are all too rude and bace,
Her heavenly lineaments for to enchace.<sup>o</sup>
Ne wonder; for her owne deare lovèd knight,
All<sup>o</sup> were she dayly with himselfe in place,
Did wonder much at her celestiall sight:
Oft had he seene her faire, but never so faire dight.<sup>o</sup>

24

So fairely dight, when she in presence came,
She to her Sire made humble reverence,
And bowèd low, that her right well became,
And added grace unto her excellence:
Who with great wisdom, and grave eloquence
Thus gan to say. But eare<sup>o</sup> he thus had said,
With flying speede, and seeming great pretence,<sup>o</sup>
Came running in, much like a man dismaid,
A Messenger with letters, which his message said.

25

All in the open hall amazèd stood,
At suddeinnesse of that unwarie<sup>o</sup> sight,
And wondred at his breathlesse hastie mood.
But he for nought would stay his passage right<sup>o</sup>
Till fast<sup>o</sup> before the king he did alight;
Where falling flat, great humblesse he did make,

And kist the ground, whereon his foot was pight;°
Then to his hands that writ° he did betake,°
Which he disclosing, red thus, as the paper spake.

26

“To thee, most mighty king of Eden faire,
Her greeting sends in these sad lines addrest,
The wofull daughter, and forsaken heire
Of that great Emperour of all the West;
And bids thee be advized for the best,
Ere thou thy daughter linck in holy band
Of wedlocke to that new unknownen guest:
For he already plighted his right hand
Unto another love, and to another land.

27

“To me sad mayd, or rather widow sad,
He was affiauncèd long time before,
And sacred pledges he both gave, and had,
False erraunt knight, infamous, and forswore:
Witnesse the burning Altars, which° he swore,
And guiltie heavens of° his bold perjury,
Which though he hath polluted oft of yore,
Yet I to them for judgement just do fly,
And them conjure° t’avenge this shamefull injury.

28

“Therefore since mine he is, or° free or bond,°
Or false or trew, or living or else dead,
Withhold, O soveraine Prince, your hasty hond°
From knitting league with him, I you aread;°
Ne wene° my right with strength adowne to tread,
Through weakenesse of my widowhed, or woe:
For truth is strong, her rightfull cause to plead,
And shall find friends, if need requireth soe,

So bids thee well to fare, Thy neither friend, nor foe, Fidessa."

29

When he these bitter byting words had red,
The tydings straunge did him abashèd make,
That still he sate long time astonishèd
As in great muse,o ne word to creature spake.
At last his solemne silence thus he brake,
With doubtfull eyes fast fixèd on his guest:
"Redoubtedo knight, that for mine onely sake<sup>7</sup>
Thy life and honour late adventurst,
Let nought be hid from me, that ought to be exprest.

30

"What meane these bloudy vowes, and idle threats,
Throwne out from womanish impatient mind?
What heavens? what altars? what enragèd heates
Here heapèd up with termes of love unkind,o
My conscience cleare with guilty bandso would bind?
High God be witnesse, that I guiltlesse ame.
But if your selfe, Sir knight, ye faultieo find,
Or wrappèd be in loves of former Dame,
With crime do not it cover, but disclose the same."

31

To whom the Redcrosse knight this answere sent,
"My Lord, my King, be nought hereat dismayd,
Till well ye wote by grave intendiment,o
What woman, and wherefore doth me upbrayd
With breach of love, and loyalty betrayd.
It was in my mishaps, as hitherward
I lately traveild, that unwares I strayd
Out of my way, through perils straunge and hard;
That day should faile me, ere I had them all declard.

32

"There did I find, or rather I was found
Of this false woman, that Fidessa hight,<sup>o</sup>
Fidessa hight the falsest Dame on ground,
Most false Duessa, royall richly dight,
That easie was t'invegle weaker<sup>o</sup> sight:
Who by her wicked arts, and wylie skill,
Too false and strong for earthly skill or might,
Unwares me wrought unto her wicked will,
And to my foe betrayd, when least I feared ill."

33

Then steppèd forth the goodly royall Mayd,
And on the ground her selfe prostrating low,
With sober countenance thus to him sayd:
"O pardon me, my soveraigne Lord, to show
The secret treasons, which of late I know
To have bene wrought by that false sorceresse.
She onely she it is, that earst<sup>o</sup> did throw
This gentle knight into so great distresse,
That death him did awaite in dayly wretchednesse.

34

"And now it seemes, that she subornèd hath
This craftie messenger with letters vaine,
To worke new woe and improvided scath,<sup>o</sup>
By breaking of the band<sup>o</sup> betwixt us twaine;
Wherein she usèd hath the practicke paine<sup>o</sup>
Of this false footman, clokt with simplenesse,
Whom if ye please for to discover plaine,
Ye shall him Archimago find, I ghesse,
The falsest man alive; who tries<sup>o</sup> shall find no lesse."

35

The king was greatly movèd at her speach,
And all with suddein indignation fraight,<sup>o</sup>
Bad<sup>o</sup> on that Messenger rude<sup>o</sup> hands to reach.
Eftsoones<sup>o</sup> the Gard, which on his state did wait,
Attacht<sup>o</sup> that faylor<sup>o</sup> false, and bound him strait:
Who seeming sorely chauffèd<sup>o</sup> at his band,
As chainèd Beare, whom cruell dogs do bait,
With idle force did faine<sup>o</sup> them to withstand,
And often semblaunce made to scape out of their hand.

36

But they him layd full low in dungeon deepe,
And bound him hand and foote with yron chains.
And with continuall watch did warely<sup>o</sup> keepe;
Who then would thinke, that by his subtile trains<sup>o</sup>
He could escape fowle death or deadly paines?<sup>8</sup>
Thus when that Princes wrath was pacifide,
He gan renew the late forbidden banes,<sup>9</sup>
And to the knight his daughter deare he tyde,
With sacred rites and vowes for ever to abyde.

37

His owne two hands the holy knots did knit,
That none but death for ever can devide;
His owne two hands, for such a turne<sup>o</sup> most fit,
The housling<sup>o</sup> fire did kindle and provide,
And holy water thereon sprinckled wide;<sup>1</sup>
At which the bushy Teade<sup>o</sup> a groome did light,
And sacred lampe in secret chamber hide,
Where it should not be quenched day nor night,
For feare of evill fates, but burnen ever bright.

38

Then gan they sprinckle all the posts with wine,

And made great feast to solemnize that day;
They all perfumde with frankencense divine,
And precious odours fetcht from far away,
That all the house did sweat with great aray:
And all the while sweete Musicke did apply
Her curious<sup>o</sup> skill, the warbling notes to play,
To drive away the dull Melancholy;
The whiles one sung a song of love and jollity.

39

During the which there was an heavenly noise
Heard sound through all the Pallace pleasantly,
Like as it had bene many an Angels voice,
Singing before th'eternall majesty,
In their trinall triplicities<sup>2</sup> on hye;
Yet wist<sup>o</sup> no creature, whence that heavenly sweet<sup>o</sup>
Proceeded, yet each one felt secretly<sup>o</sup>
Himselfe thereby reft of his senses meet,<sup>o</sup>
And ravishèd with rare impression in his sprite.<sup>3</sup>

40

Great joy was made that day of young and old,
And solemne feast proclaimd throughout the land,
That their exceeding merth may not be told:
Suffice it heare by signes to understand
The usuall joyes at knitting of loves band.
Thrise happy man the knight himselfe did hold,
Possessèd of his Ladies hart and hand,
And ever, when his eye did her behold,
His heart did seeme to melt in pleasures manifold.

41

Her joyous presence and sweet company
In full content he there did long enjoy,
Ne wicked envie, ne vile gealosy

His deare delights were able to annoy:
Yet swimming in that sea of blisfull joy,
He nought forgot, how he whilome<sup>o</sup> had sworne,
In case he could that monstrous beast destroy,
Unto his Faerie Queene backe to returne:
The which he shortly did, and Una left to mourne.

42

Now strike your sailes ye jolly Mariners,
For we be come unto a quiet rode,<sup>o</sup>
Where we must land some of our passengers,
And light this wearie vessell of her lode.
Here she a while may make her safe abode,
Till she repaired have her tackles spent,<sup>o</sup>
And wants supplide. And then againe abroad
On the long voyage whereto she is bent:
Well may she speede and fairely finish her intent.

Endnotes

- Note 4: Release the mainsail line and sail toward the land. The nautical metaphor echoes many classical authors and Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde (2.1–7).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Had recently ravaged.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: That is, sober, appropriate ("right well beseeene") attire.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Able to fight with weapons.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, looking appropriately like herself.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Trumpet calls. "Shaumes": the shawm was the medieval and Renaissance predecessor of the oboe.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Make seemly conversation.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The final Christian triumph, the marriage of Christ and the true Church, will be achieved only at the end of time.

Meanwhile, the struggle against evil (and the Roman Church) continues.Return to reference 2

- Note 3: That is, you cannot undo what is done ("doen"), for vows may not be (made) vain.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Her black robe (canto 1, stanza 4).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: "The marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready. And to her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white: for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints" (Revelation 19:7–8).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Revelation 21:9, 11 describes the New Jerusalem as "the bride, the Lamb's wife . . . her light was like unto a stone most precious."Return to reference 6
- Note 7: For my sake alone.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: "And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, And cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled: and after that he must be loosed a little season" (Revelation 20:2–3).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Banns; that is, proclamation or public notice of an intended marriage. Una and Redcrosse are now betrothed; the consummation of their marriage is postponed.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Marriages in ancient times were solemnized with sacramental fire and water.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The nine angelic orders, divided into three groups of three, the whole hierarchy corresponding to the nine spheres of the universe. The music heard in this stanza is the music of the spheres, not audible on earth since the Fall.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Spirit. "Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honour to him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come" (Revelation 19.7). In Revelation, the marriage of Christ and the New Jerusalem signals the general redemption.Return to reference 3

Mutabilitie Cantos In 1609, in an edition of The Faerie Queene published ten years after Spenser's death, two cantos and a two-stanza fragment of a third one appeared for the first time. If they actually are, as their editor's note suggests, part of an uncompleted book of the poem, centered on the virtue of constancy, they constitute a longer digression from the main story than any in the other books. The cantos give Spenser's reflections on change and permanence in the world—a subject that fascinated and disturbed him and his contemporaries. How is it possible to secure any stable meaning in a world that is forever in flux? Where can beauty and truth be found in the midst of relentless strife? In a great trial scene, the Goddess of Nature rules against Mutabilitie in favor of Jove's principle of underlying order. But in the moving two-stanza fragment, the poet discloses his longing for eternal rest in the changeless realm of heaven.

Two Cantos of Mutabilitie:

Which, both for Forme and Matter, appeare to be parcell of some following Booke of the Faerie Queene

Under the Legend of Constance.

Canto 6

Proud Change (not pleasd, in mortall things, beneath the Moone, to raigne)<sup>1</sup> Pretends,<sup>o</sup> as well of Gods, as Men to be the Soveraine.

1

What man that sees the ever-whirling wheele
Of Change, the which all mortall things doth sway,<sup>o</sup>
But that therby doth find, and plainly feelee,
How Mutability in them doth play
Her cruell sports, to many mens decay?<sup>o</sup>
Which that to all may better yet appeare,
I will rehearse<sup>o</sup> that whylome<sup>o</sup> I heard say,
How she at first her selfe began to reare,
Gainst all the Gods, and th'empire sought from them to beare.

2

But first, here falleth fittest to unfold
Her antique race and lineage ancient,
As I have found it registred of old,

In Faery Land mongst records permanent:
She was, to weet,<sup>o</sup> a daughter by descent
Of those old Titans,<sup>2</sup> that did whylome strive
With Saturnes sonne for heavens regiment.<sup>o</sup>
Whom, though high Jove of kingdome did deprive,
Yet many of their stemme<sup>o</sup> long after did survive.

3

And many of them, afterwards obtained
Great power of Jove, and high authority;
As Hecate,<sup>3</sup> in whose almighty hand,
He plac't all rule and principality,
To be by her disposèd diversly,
To Gods, and men, as she them list<sup>o</sup> divide:
And drad<sup>o</sup> Bellona,<sup>4</sup> that doth sound on hie
Warres and allarums unto Nations wide,
That makes both heaven and earth to tremble at her pride.

4

So likewise did this Titanesse aspire,
Rule and dominion to her selfe to gaine;
That as a Goddesse, men might her admire,<sup>o</sup>
And heavenly honours yield, as to them twaine.<sup>5</sup>
And first, on earth she sought it to obtaine;
Where she such prooffe and sad<sup>o</sup> examples shewed
Of her great power, to many ones great paine,
That not men onely (whom she soone subdued)
But eke<sup>o</sup> all other creatures, her bad dooings rewed.<sup>o</sup>

5

For, she the face of earthly things so changed,
That all which Nature had establisht first
In good estate,<sup>o</sup> and in meet<sup>o</sup> order ranged,
She did pervert,<sup>o</sup> and all their statutes burst:

And all the worlds faire frame (which none yet durst
Of Gods or men to alter or misguide)
She altered quite, and made them all accurst
That God had blest; and did at first provide
In that still<sup>o</sup> happy state for ever to abide.

6

Ne<sup>o</sup> shee the lawes of Nature onely brake,
But eke of Justice, and of Policie;<sup>o</sup>
And wrong of right, and bad of good did make,
And death for life exchanged foolishlie:
Since which, all living wights<sup>o</sup> have learned to die,
And all this world is woxen<sup>o</sup> daily worse.
O pittious worke of Mutabilitie!
By which, we all are subject to that curse,
And death in stead of life have suckèd from our Nurse.<sup>o</sup>

7

And now, when all the earth she thus had brought
To her behest,<sup>o</sup> and thrallèd to her might,
She gan to cast<sup>o</sup> in her ambitious thought,
T'attempt<sup>o</sup> the empire of the heavens hight,
And Jove himselfe to shoulder from his right.
And first, she past the region of the ayre,
And of the fire,<sup>6</sup> whose substance thin and slight,
Made no resistance, ne could her contraire,<sup>o</sup>
But ready passage to her pleasure did prepaire.

8

Thence, to the Circle of the Moone<sup>7</sup> she clambe,
Where Cynthia<sup>8</sup> raignes in everlasting glory,
To whose bright shining palace straight she came,
All fairely deckt with heavens goodly story;<sup>9</sup>
Whose silver gates (by which there sate an hory

Old aged Sire, with hower-glasse in hand,
Hight<sup>o</sup> Tyme) she entred, were he lief or sorry:<sup>1</sup>
Ne staide till she the highest stage<sup>o</sup> had scand,<sup>o</sup>
Where Cynthia did sit, that never still did stand.<sup>o</sup>

9

Her sitting on an Ivory throne shee found,
Drawne of two steeds, th'one black, the other white,
Environd with tenne thousand starres around,
That duly her attended day and night;
And by her side, there ran her Page, that hight
Vesper, whom we the Evening-starre intend:<sup>o</sup>
That with his Torche, still twinkling like twilight,
Her lightened all the way where she should wend,<sup>o</sup>
And joy to weary wandring travellers did lend:

10

That when the hardy Titanesse beheld
The goodly building of her Palace bright,
Made of the heavens substance, and up-held
With thousand Crystall pillors of huge hight,
Shee gan to burne in her ambitious spright,<sup>o</sup>
And t'evnie her that in such glorie rained.
Eftsoones she cast<sup>2</sup> by force and tortious<sup>o</sup> might,
Her to displace; and to her selfe to have gained
The kingdome of the Night, and waters by her wained.<sup>o</sup>

11

Boldly she bid the Goddesse downe descend,
And let her selfe into that Ivory throne;
For, shee her selfe more worthy thereof wend,<sup>o</sup>
And better able it to guide alone:
Whether to men, whose fall she did bemone,
Or unto Gods, whose state she did maligne,<sup>o</sup>
Or to th'infernall Powers, her need give lone

Of her faire light, and bounty most benigne,
Her selfe of all that rule shee deemèd most condigne.°

12

But shee that had to her that soveraigne seat
By highest Jove assigned, therein to beare
Nights burning lamp, regarded not her threat,
Ne yielded ought for favour or for feare;
But with sterne countenance and disdainfull cheare,°
Bending her hornèd browes,³ did put her back:
And boldly blaming her for comming there,
Bade her attonce from heavens coast to pack,°
Or at her perill bide the wrathfull Thunders wrack.°

13

Yet nathemore° the Giantesse forbare:
But boldly preacing-on,° raught forth her hand
To pluck her downe perforce° from off her chaire;
And there-with lifting up her golden wand,
Threatned to strike her if she did with-stand.
Where-at the starres, which round about her blazed,
And eke the Moones bright wagon,° still did stand,
All beeing with so bold attempt amazed,
And on her uncouth habit⁴ and sterne looke still gazed.

14

Meane-while, the lower World, which nothing knew
Of all that chauncèd here, was darkned quite;
And eke the heavens, and all the heavenly crew
Of happy wights, now unpurvaide° of light,
Were much afraid, and wondred at that sight;
Fearing least° Chaos broken had his chaine,
And brought againe on them eternall night:
But chiefly Mercury, that next doth raigne,⁵

Ran forth in haste, unto the king of Gods to plaine.°

15

All ran together with a great out-cry,
To Joves faire Palace, fixt in heavens hight;
And beating at his gates full earnestly,
Gan call to him aloud with all their might,
To know what meant that suddaine lack of light.
The father of the Gods when this he heard,
Was troubled much at their so strange affright,
Doubting least° Typhon<sup>6</sup> were againe upreared,
Or other his old foes, that once him sorely feared.°

16

Eftsoones the sonne of Maia° forth he sent Downe to the Circle of the Moone, to knowe
The cause of this so strange astonishment,
And why shee did her wonted° course forslowe;°
And if that any were on earth belowe
That did with charmes or Magick her molest,
Him to attache,° and downe to hell to throwe:
But, if from heaven it were, then to arrest
The Author, and him bring before his presence prest.°

17

The wingd-foot God, so fast his plumes did beat,
That soone he came where-as the Titanesse
Was striving with faire Cynthia for her seat:
At whose strange sight, and haughty hardinesse,°
He wondred much, and feared her no lesse.
Yet laying feare aside to doe his charge,°
At last, he bade her (with bold stedfastnesse)
Ceasse to molest the Moone to walke at large,<sup>7</sup>
Or come before high Jove, her dooings to discharge.°

18

And there-with-all, he on her shoulder laid
His snaky-wreathèd Mace,<sup>8</sup> whose awfull power
Doth make both Gods and hellish fiends affraid:
Where-at the Titanesse did sternely lower,<sup>o</sup>
And stoutly answered, that in evill hower
He from his Jove such message to her brought,
To bid her leave faire Cynthias silver bower;
Sith<sup>o</sup> shee his Jove and him esteemèd nought,
No more then<sup>o</sup> Cynthia's selfe; but all their kingdoms sought.

19

The Heavens Herald staid not to reply,
But past away, his doings to relate
Unto his Lord; who now in th'highest sky,
Was placed in his principall Estate,<sup>o</sup>
With all the Gods about him congregate:
To whom when Hermes had his message told,
It did them all exceedingly amate,<sup>o</sup>
Save Jove; who, changing nought his count'nance bold,
Did unto them at length these speeches wise unfold;

20

"Harken to mee awhile yee heavenly Powers;
Ye may remember since th'Earths cursèd seed
Sought to assaile the heavens eternall towers,
And to us all exceeding feare did breed:
But how we then defeated all their deed,
Yee all doe knowe, and them destroied quite;
Yet not so quite, but that there did succeed
An off-spring of their bloud, which did alite
Upon the fruitfull earth, which doth us yet despite.<sup>o</sup>

21

"Of that bad seed is this bold woman bred,
That now with bold presumption doth aspire
To thrust faire Phoebe<sup>9</sup> from her silver bed,
And eke our selves from heavens high Empire,
If that her might were match to her desire:
Wherefore, it now behoves us to advise<sup>o</sup>
What way is best to drive her to retire;
Whether by open force, or counsell wise,
Areed<sup>o</sup> ye sonnes of God, as best ye can devise."

22

So having said, he ceast; and with his brow
(His black eye-brow, whose doomefull dreaded beck<sup>1</sup>
Is wont to wield<sup>o</sup> the world unto his vow,<sup>o</sup>
And even the highest Powers of heaven to check)
Made signe to them in their degrees to speake:
Who straight gan cast<sup>2</sup> their counsell grave and wise.
Mean-while, th'Earths daughter, thogh she nought did reck<sup>3</sup>
Of Hermes message; yet gan now advise,
What course were best to take in this hot bold emprize.<sup>o</sup>

23

Eftsoones she thus resolved; that whil'st the Gods
(After returne of Hermes Embassie)
Were troubled, and amongst themselves at ods,
Before they could new counsels re-allie,<sup>o</sup>
To set upon them in that extasie;<sup>o</sup>
And take what fortune time and place would lend:
So, forth she rose, and through the purest sky
To Joves high Palace straight cast<sup>o</sup> to ascend,
To prosecute her plot: Good on-set boads good end.

24

Shee there arriving, boldly in did pass;

Where all the Gods she found in counsell close,<sup>o</sup>
All quite unarmed, as then their manner was.
At sight of her they suddaine all arose,
In great amaze,<sup>o</sup> ne wist<sup>o</sup> what way to chose.
But Jove, all fearelesse, forc't them to aby;<sup>o</sup>
And in his souveraine throne, gan straight dispose<sup>o</sup>
Himselfe more full of grace and Majestie,
That mote encheare<sup>o</sup> his friends, and foes mote terrifie.

25

That, when the haughty Titanesse beheld,
All<sup>o</sup> were she fraught with pride and impudence,
Yet with the sight thereof was almost queld;
And inly quaking, seemed as<sup>o</sup> reft of sense,
And voyd of speech in that drad<sup>o</sup> audience;
Until that Jove himself, her selfe bespake:
"Speake thou fraile woman, speake with confidence,
Whence art thou, and what doost thou here now make?<sup>o</sup>
What idle errand hast thou, earths mansion to forsake?"

26

Shee, halfe confusèd with his great commaund,
Yet gathering spirit of her natures pride,
Him boldly answered thus to his demaund:
"I am a daughter, by the mothers side,
Of her that is Grand-mother magnifide<sup>o</sup>
Of all the Gods, great Earth, great Chaos child:<sup>4</sup>
But by the fathers (be it not envie<sup>o</sup>)
I greater am in bloud (whereon I build<sup>o</sup>)
Then all the Gods, though wrongfully from heaven exiled.

27

"For, Titan (as ye all acknowledge must)
Was Saturnes elder brother by birth-right;
Both, sonnes of Uranus: but by unjust

And guilefull meanes, through Corybantes slight,<sup>o</sup>
The younger thrust the elder from his right:<sup>5</sup>
Since which, thou Jove, injuriously<sup>o</sup> hast held
The Heavens rule from Titans sonnes by might;
And them to hellish dungeons downe hast feld:
Witnesse ye Heavens the truth of all that I have teld."

28

Whil'st she thus spake, the Gods that gave good eare
To her bold words, and markèd well her grace,
Beeing of stature tall as any there
Of all the Gods, and beautifull of face,
As any of the Goddesses in place,<sup>o</sup>
Stood all astonied, like a sort<sup>o</sup> of Steeres;
Mongst whom, some beast of strange and forraine race,
Unwares<sup>o</sup> is chaunc't, far straying from his peeres:
So did their ghastly gaze bewray<sup>o</sup> their hidden feares.

29

Till having pauzed awhile, Jove thus bespake;
"Will never mortall thoughts cease to aspire,
In this bold sort, to Heaven claime to make,
And touch celestiall seates with earthly mire?
I would have thought, that bold Procrustes<sup>6</sup> hire,<sup>o</sup>
Or Typhons fall, or proud Ixions paine,
Or great Prometheus, tasting of our ire,
Would have suffized, the rest for to restraine;
And warned all men by their example to refraine:

30

"But now, this off-scum of that cursèd fry,<sup>o</sup>
Dare to renew the like bold enterprize,
And challenge<sup>o</sup> th'heritage of this our skie;
Whom what should hinder, but that we likewise
Should handle as the rest of her allies,

And thunder-drive to hell?" With that, he shooke
His Nectar-deawèd locks,<sup>7</sup> with which the skyes
And all the world beneath for terror quooke,<sup>6</sup>
And eft<sup>5</sup> his burning levin-brond<sup>8</sup> in hand he tooke.

31

But, when he lookèd on her lovely face,
In which, faire beames of beauty did appeare,
That could the greatest wrath soone turne to grace
(Such sway<sup>4</sup> doth beauty even in Heaven beare)
He staide his hand: and having changed his cheare,<sup>3</sup>
He thus againe in milder wise began;
"But ah! if Gods should strive with flesh yfere,<sup>2</sup>
Then shortly should the progeny of Man
Be rooted out, if Jove should doe still<sup>1</sup> what he can:

32

"But thee faire Titans child, I rather weene,<sup>8</sup>
Through some vaine errour or inducement light,<sup>7</sup>
To see that<sup>6</sup> mortall eyes have never seene;
Or through ensample<sup>5</sup> of thy sisters might,
Bellona; whose great glory thou doost spight,<sup>4</sup>
Since thou hast seene her dreadfull power belowe,
Mongst wretched men (dismaide with her affright)<sup>9</sup>
To bandie Crownes, and Kingdomes to bestowe:
And sure thy worth, no lesse then hers doth seem to showe.

33

"But wote<sup>3</sup> thou this, thou hardy Titanesse,
That not the worth of any living wight
May challenge ought in Heavens interesse,<sup>1</sup>
Much lesse the Title of old Titans Right:
For, we by Conquest of our sovaine might,
And by eternall doome of Fates decree,

Have wonne the Empire of the Heavens bright;
Which to our selves we hold, and to whom wee
Shall worthy deeme partakers of our blisse to bee.

34

"Then ceasse thy idle claime thou foolish gerle,
And seeke by grace and goodnesse to obtaine
That place from which by folly Titan fell;
There-to thou maist perhaps, if so thou faine<sup>o</sup>
Have Jove thy gracious Lord and Soveraigne."
So, having said, she thus to him replide;
"Ceasse Saturnes sonne, to seeke by proffers vaine
Of idle hopes t'allure mee to thy side,
For to betray my Right, before I have it tride.

35

"But thee, O Jove, no equall<sup>o</sup> Judge I deeme
Of my desert, or of my dewfull<sup>o</sup> Right;
That in thine owne behalfe maist partiall seeme:
But to the highest him, that is behight<sup>o</sup>
Father of Gods and men by equall might;<sup>2</sup>
To weet, the God of Nature, I appeale."
There-at Jove wexèd<sup>o</sup> wroth, and in his spright<sup>o</sup>
Did inly grudge, yet did it well conceale;
And bade Dan Phoebus Scribe<sup>3</sup> her Appellation<sup>o</sup> seale.

36

Eftsoones the time and place appointed were,
Where all, both heavenly Powers, and earthly wights,
Before great Natures presence should appeare,
For triall of their Titles and best Rights:
That was, to weet, upon the highest hights
Of Arlo-hill<sup>4</sup> (Who knowes not Arlo-hill?)
That is the highest head (in all mens sights)

Of my old father Mole, whom Shepheards quill Renowmèd hath with hymnes fit for a rurall skill.

37

And, were it not ill fitting for this file,<sup>5</sup>
To sing of hilles and woods, mongst warres and Knights,
I would abate the sternenesse of my stile,
Mongst these sterne stounds<sup>o</sup> to mingle soft delights;
And tell how Arlo through Dianaes spights
(Beeing of old the best and fairest Hill
That was in all this holy-Islands<sup>6</sup> hights)
Was made the most unpleasant, and most ill.<sup>o</sup>

38

Whylome,<sup>o</sup> when Ireland florishèd in fame
Of wealths and goodnesse, far above the rest
Of all that beare the British Islands name,
The Gods then used<sup>8</sup> (for pleasure and for rest)
Oft to resort there-to, when seemed them best:
But none of all there-in more pleasure found,
Then Cynthia;<sup>9</sup> that is soveraine Queene profest<sup>o</sup>
Of woods and forrests, which therein abound,
Sprinkled with wholsom waters, more then most on ground.

39

But mongst them all, as fittest for her game,<sup>o</sup>
Either for chace of beasts with hound or boawe,
Or for to shroude in shade from Phoebus flame,
Or bathe in fountaines that doe freshly flowe,
Or<sup>o</sup> from high hilles, or from the dales belowe,
She chose this Arlo; where shee did resort
With all her Nymphes enrangèd on<sup>o</sup> a rowe,
With whom the woody Gods did oft consort:<sup>o</sup>

For, with the Nymphes, the Satyres love to play and sport.<sup>1</sup>

40

Amongst the which, there was a Nymph that hight
Molanna; daughter of old father Mole,
And sister unto Mulla,<sup>2</sup> faire and bright:
Unto whose bed false Bregog whylome stole,
That Shepheard Colin dearely did condole,<sup>o</sup>
And made her lucklesse loves well knowne to be.
But this Molanna, were she not so shole,<sup>o</sup>
Were no lesse faire and beautifull then shee:
Yet as she is, a fairer flood may no man see.

41

For, first, she springs out of two marble Rocks,
On which, a grove of Oakes high mounted growes,
That as a girlond seemes to deck the locks
Of som faire Bride, brought forth with pompous<sup>3</sup> showes
Out of her bowre,<sup>o</sup> that many flowers strowes:
So, through the flowry Dales she tumbling downe,
Through many woods, and shady coverts<sup>o</sup> flowes
(That on each side her silver channell crowne)
Till to the Plaine she come, whose Valleyes shee doth drowne.

42

In her sweet streames, Diana usèd oft
(After her sweatie chace and toilesome play)
To bathe her selfe; and after, on the soft
And downy grasse, her dainty limbes to lay
In covert<sup>o</sup> shade, where none behold her may:
For, much she hated sight of living eye.
Foolish God Faunus, though full many a day
He saw her clad, yet longèd foolishly
To see her naked mongst her Nymphes in privity.<sup>4</sup>

43

No way he found to compasse<sup>o</sup> his desire,
But to corrupt Molanna, this her maid,
Her to discover<sup>o</sup> for some secret hire:<sup>o</sup>
So, her with flattering words he first assaid;
And after, pleasing gifts for her purvaid,<sup>o</sup>
Queene-apples,<sup>5</sup> and red Cherries from the tree,
With which he her allurèd and betraid,
To tell what time he might her Lady see
When she her selfe did bathe, that he might secret<sup>o</sup> bee.

44

There-to hee promist, if she would him pleasure
With this small boone, to quit<sup>o</sup> her with a better;
To weet, that where-as she had out of measure
Long loved the Fanchin, who by nought did set her,<sup>6</sup>
That he would undertake, for this to get her
To be his Love, and of him likèd well:
Besides all which, he vowed to be her debter
For many moe<sup>o</sup> good turnes then he would tell;
The least of which, this little pleasure should excell.

45

The simple maid did yield to him anone;<sup>o</sup>
And eft him placèd where he close<sup>7</sup> might view
That<sup>o</sup> never any saw, save onely one;
Who, for his hire to so foole-hardy dew,<sup>o</sup>
Was of his hounds devoured in Hunters hew.<sup>8</sup>
Tho,<sup>o</sup> as her manner was on sunny day,
Diana, with her Nymphes about her, drew
To this sweet spring; where, doffing her array,
She bathed her lovely limbes, for Jove a likely pray.<sup>o</sup>

46

There Faunus saw that pleased much his eye,
And made his hart to tickle<sup>o</sup> in his brest,
That for great joy of some-what he did spy,
He could him not containe in silent rest;
But breaking forth in laughter, loud profest
His foolish thought. A foolish Faune indeed,
That couldst not hold thy selfe so<sup>o</sup> hidden blest,
But wouldest needs thine owne conceit<sup>9</sup> areed.<sup>o</sup>
Babblers unworthy been of so divine a meed.<sup>o</sup>

47

The Goddesse, all abashed with that noise,
In haste forth started from the guilty brooke;
And running straight where-as she heard his voice,
Enclosed the bush about, and there him tooke,
Like darrèd<sup>1</sup> Larke; not daring up to looke
On her whose sight before so much he sought.
Thence, forth they drew him by the hornes, and shooke
Nigh all to peeces, that they left him nought;<sup>o</sup>
And then into the open light they forth him brought.

48

Like as an huswife, that with busie care
Thinks of her Dairie to make wondrous gaine,
Finding where-as some wicked beast unware<sup>o</sup>
That breakes into her Dayr'house, there doth draine
Her creaming pannes, and frustrate all her paine;<sup>o</sup>
Hath in some snare or gin<sup>o</sup> set close behind,
Entrappèd him, and caught into her traine,<sup>o</sup>
Then thinks what punishment were best assigned,
And thousand deathes deviseth in her vengefull mind:

49

So did Diana and her maydens all
Use silly Faunus, now within their baile:<sup>o</sup>

They mocke and scorne him, and him foule miscall;°
Some by the nose him pluckt, some by the taile,
And by his goatish beard some did him haile:°
Yet he (poore soule) with patience all did beare;
For, nought against their wils might countervale:°
Ne ought he said what ever he did heare;
But hanging downe his head, did like a Mome° appeare.

50

At length, when they had flouted him their fill,
They gan to cast° what penance him to give.
Some would have gelt° him, but that same would spill²
The Wood-gods breed, which must for ever live:
Others would through the river him have drive,°
And duckèd deepe: but that seemed penance light;
But most agreed and did this sentence give,
Him in Deares skin to clad; and in that plight,°
To hunt him with their hounds, him selfe save how hee might.

51

But Cynthia's selfe, more angry then the rest,
Thought not enough, to punish him in sport,
And of her shame to make a gamesome° jest;
But gan examine him in straighter° sort,
Which of her Nymphes, or other close consort,°
Him thither brought, and her to him betraid?
He, much affeard, to her confessèd short,°
That 'twas Molanna which her so bewraid.°
Then all attonce their hands upon Molanna laid.

52

But him (according as they had decreed)
With a Deeres-skin they covered, and then chast
With all their hounds that after him did speed;
But he more speedy, from them fled more fast

Then any Deere: so sore him dread aghast.<sup>o</sup>
They after followed all with shrill out-cry,
Shouting as they the heavens would have brast:<sup>o</sup>
That all the woods and dales where he did flie,
Did ring againe, and loud reeccho to the skie.

53

So they him followed till they weary were;
When, back returning to Molann' againe,
They, by commaund'ment of Diana, there
Her whelmed with stones.<sup>3</sup> Yet Faunus (for her paine)<sup>o</sup>
Of her belovèd Fanchin did obtaine,
That her he would receive unto his bed.
So now her waves passe through a pleasant Plaine,
Till with the Fanchin she her selfe doe wed,
And (both combined) themselves in one faire river spred.

54

Nath'lesse,<sup>o</sup> Diana, full of indignatiön,
Thence-forth abandond her delicious brooke;
In whose sweet streame, before that bad occasiön,
So much delight to bathe her limbes she tooke:
Ne onely her,<sup>o</sup> but also quite forsooke
All those faire forrests about Arlo hid,
And all that Mountaine, which doth over-looke
The richest champion that may else be rid,<sup>4</sup>
And the faire Shure,<sup>5</sup> in which are thousand Salmons bred.

55

Them all, and all that she so deare did way,<sup>o</sup>
Thence-forth she left; and parting from the place,
There-on an heavy haplesse curse did lay,
To weet, that Wolves, where she was wont to space,<sup>o</sup>
Should harboured be, and all those Woods deface,

And Thieves should rob and spoile<sup>6</sup> that Coast<sup>o</sup> around.
Since which, those Woods, and all that goodly Chase,<sup>7</sup>
Doth to this day with Wolves and Thieves abound:
Which too-too true that lands in-dwellers since have found.

Canto 7

*Pealing,<sup>o</sup> from Jove, to Natur's Bar, bold Alteration<sup>o</sup> pleades
Large<sup>o</sup> Evidence: but Nature soone her righteous Doome areads.<sup>8</sup>*

1

Ah! whither doost thou now thou greater<sup>o</sup> Muse<sup>9</sup>
Me from these woods and pleasing forrests bring?
And my fraile spirit (that dooth oft refuse
This too high flight, unfit for her weake wing)
Lift up aloft, to tell of heavens King
(Thy souveraine Sire)<sup>1</sup> his fortunate successe,
And victory, in bigger<sup>o</sup> noates to sing,
Which he obtained against that Titanesse,
That him of heavens Empire sought to dispossesse.

2

Yet sith<sup>o</sup> I needs must follow thy behest,
Doe thou my weaker<sup>o</sup> wit with skill inspire,
Fit for this turne;<sup>o</sup> and in my feeble brest
Kindle fresh sparks of that immortall fire,
Which learnèd minds inflameth with desire
Of heavenly things: for, who but thou alone,
That art yborne of heaven and heavenly Sire,
Can tell things doen in heaven so long ygone;
So farre past memory of man that may be knowne.

3

Now, at the time that was before agreed,
The Gods assembled all on Arlo hill;
As well those that are sprung of heavenly seed,
As those that all the other world<sup>o</sup> doe fill,
And rule both sea and land unto their will:
Onely th'infernall Powers might not appeare;
Aswell for horror of their count'naunce ill,
As for th'unruly fiends which they did feare;<sup>2</sup>
Yet Pluto and Proserpina were present there.<sup>3</sup>

4

And thither also came all other creatures,
What-ever life or motion doe retaine,
According to their sundry kinds of features;
That Arlo scarsly could them all containe;
So full they fillèd every hill and Plaine:
And had not Natures Sergeant (that is Order)
Them well disposèd by his busie paine,<sup>o</sup>
And raungèd<sup>o</sup> farre abroad in every border,
They would have causèd much confusion and disorder.

5

Then forth issewed (great goddesse) great dame Nature,
With goodly port<sup>o</sup> and gracious Majesty;
Being far greater and more tall of stature
Then any of the gods or Powers on hie:
Yet certes<sup>o</sup> by her face and physnomy,<sup>o</sup>
Whether she man or woman inly were,
That could not any creature well descry:
For, with a veile that wimples<sup>o</sup> every where,
Her head and face was hid, that mote to none appeare.

6

That some doe say was so by skill devized,
To hide the terror of her uncouth hew,<sup>o</sup>

From mortall eyes that should be sore agrized;<sup>o</sup>
For that her face did like a Lion shew,
That eye of wight could not indure to view:
But others tell that it so beautious was,
And round about such beames of splendor threw,
That it the Sunne a thousand times did pass,<sup>o</sup>
Ne<sup>o</sup> could be seene, but<sup>o</sup> like an image in a glass.

7

That well may seemen true: for, well I weene
That this same day, when she on Arlo sat,<sup>o</sup>
Her garment was so bright and wondrous sheene,<sup>o</sup>
That my fraile wit cannot devize to what
It to compare, nor finde like stuffe<sup>o</sup> to that,
As those three sacred Saints, though else most wise,
Yet on mount Thabor quite their wits forgat,
When they their glorious Lord in strange disguise
Transfigured sawe; his garments so did daze<sup>o</sup> their eyes.<sup>4</sup>

8

In a fayre Plaine upon an equall<sup>o</sup> Hill,
She placèd was in a paviliön;
Not such as Craftes-men by their idle<sup>o</sup> skill
Are wont for Princes states<sup>o</sup> to fashiön:
But th'earth her self of her owne motiön,
Out of her fruitfull bosome made to growe
Most dainty trees; that, shooting up anon,<sup>o</sup>
Did seeme to bow their bloosming<sup>o</sup> heads full lowe,
For homage unto her, and like a throne did shew.<sup>o</sup>

9

So hard it is for any living wight,
All her array and vestiments to tell,
That old Dan<sup>o</sup> Geffrey (in whose gentle spright
The pure well head of Poesie did dwell)

In his Foules parley durst not with it mel,<sup>o</sup>
But it transferd<sup>o</sup> to Alane, who he thought
Had in his Plaint of kindes described it well:<sup>5</sup>
Which who will read set forth so as it ought,
Go seek he out that Alane where he may be sought.

10

And all the earth far underneath her feete
Was dight<sup>o</sup> with flowres, that voluntary grew
Out of the ground, and sent forth odours sweet,
Tenne thousand mores<sup>o</sup> of sundry sent and hew,
That might delight the smell, or please the view:
The which, the Nymphes, from all the brooks thereby
Had gathered, which they at her foot-stoole threw;
That richer seemed then any tapestry,
That Princes bowres adorne with painted imagery.

11

And Mole<sup>6</sup> himself, to honour her the more,
Did deck himself in freshest faire attire,
And his high head, that seemeth alwaies hore<sup>o</sup>
With hardned frosts of former winters ire,
He with an Oaken girlond now did tire,<sup>o</sup>
As if the love of some new Nymph late seene,
Had in him kindled youthfull fresh desire,
And made him change his gray attire to greene;
Ah gentle Mole! such joyance hath thee well beseene.<sup>7</sup>

12

Was never so great joyance since the day,
That all the gods whylome assembled were,
On Haemus hill in their divine array,
To celebrate the solemne<sup>o</sup> bridall cheare,
Twixt Peleus, and dame Thetis<sup>8</sup> pointed<sup>o</sup> there;

Where Phoebus self, that god of Poets hight,
They say did sing the spousall hymne full cleere,
That all the gods were ravisht with delight
Of his celestiall song, and Musicks wondrous might.

13

This great Grandmother of all creatures bred
Great Nature, ever young yet full of eld,<sup>o</sup>
Still<sup>o</sup> mooving, yet unmoved from her sted;<sup>o</sup>
Unseene of any, yet of all beheld;
Thus sitting in her throne as I have teld,
Before her came dame Mutabilite;
And being lowe before her presence feld,<sup>o</sup>
With meek obaysance and humilitie,
Thus gan her plaintif Plea, with words to amplifie;

14

"To thee O greatest goddesse, onely<sup>o</sup> great,
An humble suppliant loe, I lowely fly
Seeking for Right, which I of thee entreat;
Who Right to all dost deale indifferently,<sup>o</sup>
Damning all Wrong and tortious<sup>o</sup> Injurie,
Which any of thy creatures doe to other
(Oppressing them with power, unequally)<sup>o</sup>
Sith of them all thou are the equall<sup>o</sup> mother,
And knittest each to each, as brother unto brother.

15

"To thee therefore of this same Jove I plaine,
And of his fellow gods that faine<sup>o</sup> to be,
That challenge<sup>o</sup> to themselves the whole worlds raigin;
Of which, the greatest part is due to me,
And heaven it selfe by heritage in Fee:<sup>o</sup>
For, heaven and earth I both alike do deeme,<sup>o</sup>
Sith heaven and earth are both alike to thee;

And, gods no more then men thou doest esteeme:
For, even the gods to thee, as men to gods do seeme.

16

"Then weigh, O soveraigne goddesses, by what right
These gods do claime the worlds whole soverainty;
And that<sup>o</sup> is onely dew unto thy might Arrogate to themselves ambitiously:
As for the gods owne principality,<sup>o</sup>
Which Jove usurpes unjustly; that to be
My heritage, Jove's self cannot deny,
From my great Grandsire Titan, unto mee,
Derived by dew descent; as is well knowne to thee.

17

"Yet mauger<sup>o</sup> Jove, and all his gods beside,
I doe possesse the worlds most regiment;<sup>o</sup>
As, if ye please it into parts divide,
And every parts inholders<sup>o</sup> to convent,<sup>o</sup>
Shall to your eyes appeare incontinent.<sup>o</sup>
And first,<sup>9</sup> the Earth (great mother of us all)
That only<sup>o</sup> seems unmoved and permanent,
And unto Mutability not thrall;
Yet is she changed in part, and eeke<sup>o</sup> in generall.

18

"For, all that from her springs, and is ybredde,
How-ever fayre it flourish for a time,
Yet see we soone decay; and, being dead,
To turne again unto their earthly slime:
Yet, out of their decay and mortall crime,<sup>1</sup>
We daily see new creatures to arise;
And of their Winter spring another Prime,<sup>o</sup>
Unlike in forme, and changed by strange disguise:
So turne they still about, and change in restlesse wise.

19

“As for her tenants; that is, man and beasts,
The beasts we daily see massacred dy,
As thralls and vassalls unto mens beheasts:
And men themselves doe change continually,
From youth to eld, from wealth to poverty,
From good to bad, from bad to worst of all.
Ne doe their bodies only flit and fly:
But eeke their minds (which they immortal call)
Still change and vary thoughts, as new occasions fall.

20

“Ne is the water in more constant case;
Whether those same on high, or these belowe.<sup>2</sup>
For, th’Ocean moveth stil, from place to place;
And every River still doth ebbe and flowe:
Ne any Lake, that seems most still and slowe,
Ne Poole so small, that can his smoothnesse holde,
When any winde doth under heaven blowe;
With which, the clouds are also tost and rolled;
Now like great Hills; and, streight, like sluces, them unfold.<sup>3</sup>

21

“So likewise are all watry living wights
Still tost, and turnèd, with continuall change,
Never abyding in their stedfast plights.<sup>o</sup>
The fish, still floting,<sup>o</sup> doe at randon<sup>o</sup> range,
And never rest; but evermore exchange
Their dwelling places, as the streames them carrie:
Ne have the watry foules a certaine grange,<sup>o</sup>
Wherein to rest, ne in one stead<sup>o</sup> do tarry;
But flitting still doe flie, and still their places vary.

22

"Next is the Ayre: which who feels not by sense
(For, of all sense it is the middle meane<sup>4</sup>)
To flit still? and, with subtill influence<sup>o</sup>
Of his thin spirit, all creatures to maintaine,
In state of life? O weake life! that does leane
On thing so tickle<sup>o</sup> as th'unsteady ayre;
Which every howre is changed, and altred cleane<sup>o</sup>
With every blast that bloweth fowle or faire:
The faire doth it prolong; the fowle doth it impaire.

23

"Therein the changes infinite beholde,
Which to her creatures every minute chaunce;
Now, boyling hot: streight, friezing deadly cold:
Now, faire sun-shine, that makes all skip and daunce:
Streight, bitter storms and balefull countenance,
That makes them all to shiver and to shake:
Rayne, hayle, and snowe do pay them sad penance,
And dreadfull thunder-claps (that make them quake)
With flames and flashing lights that thousand changes make.

24

"Last is the fire: which, though it live for ever,
Ne can be quenched quite;<sup>o</sup> yet, every day,
We see his parts, so soone as they do sever,
To lose their heat, and shortly to decay;
So, makes himself his owne consuming pray.
Ne any living creatures doth he breed:
But all, that are of others bredd, doth slay;
And, with their death, his cruell life dooth feed;
Nought leaving, but their barren ashes, without seede.

25

"Thus, all these fower<sup>o</sup> (the which the ground-work bee
Of all the world, and of all living wights)

To thousand sorts of Change we subject see:
Yet are they changed (by other wondrous slights<sup>o</sup>)
Into themselves,<sup>o</sup> and lose their native might;
The Fire to Aire, and th'Ayre to Water sheere,<sup>o</sup>
And Water into Earth: yet Water fights
With Fire, and Aire with Earth approaching neere:
Yet all are in one body, and as one appeare.

26

"So, in them all raignes Mutabilitie;
How-ever these, that Gods themselves do call,
Of them doe claime the rule and soverainty:
As, Vesta, of the fire aethereall;
Vulcan, of this, with us so usuall;
Ops,<sup>5</sup> of the earth; and Juno of the Ayre;
Neptune, of Seas; and Nymphes, of Rivers all.
For, all those Rivers to me subject are:
And all the rest, which they usurp, be all my share.

27

"Which to approven<sup>o</sup> true, as I have told,
Vouchsafe, O goddesse, to thy presence call
The rest which doe the world in being hold:
As, times and seasons of the yeare that fall:
Of all the which, demand<sup>o</sup> in generall,
Or judge thy selfe, by verdit<sup>o</sup> of thine eye,
Whether to me they are not subject all."
Nature did yeeld thereto; and by-and-by,<sup>o</sup>
Bade Order call them all, before her Majesty.

28

So, forth issewed the Seasons of the yeare;
First, lusty<sup>o</sup> Spring, all dight in leaves of flowres
That freshly budded and new bloosmes<sup>o</sup> did beare
(In which a thousand birds had built their bowres

That sweetly sung, to call forth Paramours<sup>o</sup>):
And in his hand a javelin he did beare,
And on his head (as fit for warlike stoures<sup>o</sup>)
A guilt<sup>o</sup> engraven morion<sup>o</sup> he did weare;
That as some did him love, so others did him feare.

29

Then came the jolly Sommer, being dight
In a thin silken cassock<sup>o</sup> coloured greene,
That was unlynèd all, to be more light:
And on his head a girland well beseene<sup>6</sup>
He wore, from which as he had chauffèd<sup>o</sup> been
The sweat did drop; and in his hand he bore
A boawe and shaftes, as he in forrest greene
Had hunted late the Libbard<sup>o</sup> or the Bore,
And now would bathe his limbes, with labor heated sore.<sup>o</sup>

30

Then came the Autumne all in yellow clad,
As though he joyèd in his plentious store,
Laden with fruits that made him laugh, full glad
That he had banisht hunger, which to-fore<sup>o</sup>
Had by the belly oft him pinchèd sore.
Upon his head a wreath that was enrold<sup>o</sup>
With eares of corne,<sup>o</sup> of every sort he bore:
And in his hand a sickle he did holde,
To reape the ripened fruits the which the earth had yold.<sup>o</sup>

31

Lastly, came Winter cloathèd all in frize.<sup>7</sup>
Chattering his teeth for cold that did him chill,
Whil'st on his hoary beard his breath did freese;
And the dull drops that from his purpled bill<sup>o</sup>
As from a limbeck<sup>o</sup> did adown distill.
In his right hand a tippèd<sup>o</sup> staffe he held,

With which his feeble steps he stayèd still:°
For, he was faint with cold, and weak with eld;
That scarce his loosèd limbes he hable was to weld.°

32

These, marching softly,° thus in order went,
And after them, the Monthes all riding came;
First, sturdy° March<sup>8</sup> with brows full sternly bent,
And armèd strongly, rode upon a Ram,
The same which over Hellespontus swam:°
Yet in his hand a spade he also hent,°
And in a bag all sorts of seeds ysame,°
Which on the earth he strowèd as he went,
And fild her womb with fruitfull hope of nourishment.

33

Next came fresh Aprill full of lustyhed,°
And wanton as a Kid whose home new buds:
Upon a Bull he rode, the same which led Europa floting through th'Argolick fluds:°
His homes were gilden all with golden studs,
And garnishèd with garlonds goodly dight
Of all the fairest flowres and freshest buds
Which th'earth brings forth, and wet he seemed in sight.
With waves, through which he waded for his loves delight.

34

Then came faire May, the fayrest mayd on ground,
Deckt all with dainties of her seasons pryde,
And throwing flowres out of her lap around:
Upon two brethrens shoulders she did ride,
The twinnes of Leda;° which on eyther side
Supported her like to their souveraine Queene.
Lord! how all creatures laught, when her they spide,

And leapt and daunc't as they had ravisht<sup>o</sup> beene!
And Cupid selfe about her fluttred all in greene.

35

And after her, came jolly June, arrayd
All in greene leaves, as he a Player<sup>3</sup> were;
Yet in his time, he wrought<sup>o</sup> as well as playd,
That by his plough-yrons<sup>o</sup> mote right well appeare:
Upon a Crab he rode, that him did beare
With crooked crawling steps an uncouth pase,
And backward yode,<sup>o</sup> as Bargemen<sup>o</sup> wont to fare
Bending their force contrary to their face,
Like that ungracious crew which faines demurest grace.<sup>4</sup>

36

Then came hot July boyling like to fire,
That all his garments he had cast away:
Upon a Lyon raging yet with ire
He boldly rode and made him to obay:
It was the beast that whylome did forray<sup>o</sup>
The Nemaean forrest, till th'Amphytrionide<sup>5</sup>
Him slew, and with his hide did him array;
Behinde his back a sithe,<sup>o</sup> and by his side
Under his belt he bore a sickle<sup>6</sup> circling wide.

37

The sixth was August, being rich arrayd
In garment all of gold downe to the ground:
Yet rode he not, but led a lovely Mayd
Forth by the lilly hand, the which was cround
With eares of corne, and full her hand was found;
That was the righteous Virgin,<sup>7</sup> which of old
Lived here on earth, and plenty made abound;
But, after Wrong was loved and Justice solde,

She left th'unrighteous world and was to heaven extold.°

38

Next him, September marchèd eeke on foote;
Yet was he heavy laden with the spoyle
Of harvests riches, which he made his boot,°
And him enricht with bounty of the soyle:
In his one hand, as fit for harvests toyle,
He held a knife-hook; and in th'other hand
A paire of waights, with which he did assoyle°
Both more and lesse, where it in doubt did stand,
And equal° gave to each as Justice duly scanned.°

39

Then came October full of merry glee:
For, yet his noule was totty of the must,<sup>8</sup>
Which he was treading in the wine-fats see,<sup>9</sup>
And of the joyous oyle, whose gentle gust°
Made him so frolick and so full of lust:°
Upon a dreadful Scorpion he did ride,
The same which by Dianaes doom° unjust
Slew great Orion:<sup>1</sup> and eeke by his side
He had his ploughing share, and coulter<sup>2</sup> ready tyde.

40

Next was November, he full grosse and fat,
As fed with lard, and that right well might seeme;
For, he had been a fattening° hogs of late,
That yet his browes with sweat, did reek and steem,
And yet the season was full sharp° and breem;°
In planting eeke he took no small delight:
Whereon he rode, not easie was to deeme;°
For it a dreadfull Centaure was in sight,
The seed of Saturne, and faire Naïs, Chiron<sup>3</sup> hight.

41

And after him, came next the chill December:
Yet he through merry feasting which he made,
And great bonfires, did not the cold remember;
His Saviours birth his mind so much did glad:
Upon a shaggy-bearded Goat he rade,<sup>o</sup>
The same wherewith Dan Jove in tender yeares,
They say, was nourisht by th'Idaeon mayd;<sup>4</sup>
And in his hand a broad deepe boawle he beares;
Of which, he freely drinks an health to all his peeres.

42

Then came old January, wrapped well
In many weeds<sup>o</sup> to keep the cold away;
Yet did he quake and quiver like to quell,<sup>o</sup>
And blowe his nayles to warme them if he may:
For, they were numbd with holding all the day
An hatchet keene, with which he fellèd wood,
And from the trees did lop the needlesse spray:<sup>o</sup>
Upon an huge great Earth-pot steane<sup>5</sup> he stood;
From whose wide mouth, there flowèd forth the Romane floud.<sup>6</sup>

43

And lastly, came cold February, sitting
In an old wagon, for he could not ride;
Drawne of two fishes<sup>o</sup> for the season fitting,
Which through the flood before<sup>7</sup> did softly slyde
And swim away: yet had he by his side
His plough and harnesse fit to till the ground,
And tooles to prune the trees, before the pride<sup>o</sup>
Of hasting Prime<sup>o</sup> did make them burgein<sup>o</sup> round:
So past the twelve Months forth, and their dew places found.

44

And after these, there came the Day, and Night,
Riding together both with equall pase,
Th'one on a Palfrey<sup>o</sup> blacke, the other white;
But Night had covered her uncomely face
With a blacke veile, and held in hand a mace,
On top whereof the moon and stars were pight,<sup>o</sup>
And sleep and darknesse round about did trace:<sup>o</sup>
But Day did beare, upon his scepters hight,
The goodly Sun, encompass all with beamès bright.

45

Then came the Howres, faire daughters of high Jove,
And timely<sup>8</sup> Night, the which were all endewed
With wondrous beauty fit to kindle love;
But they were Virgins all, and love eschewed,
That might forslack<sup>9</sup> the charge to them fore-shewed
By mighty Jove; who did them Porters make
Of heavens gate (whence all the gods issued)
Which they did dayly watch, and nightly wake<sup>o</sup>
By even turnes, ne ever did their charge forsake.

46

And after all came Life, and lastly Death;
Death with most grim and griesly visage seene,
Yet is he nought but parting of the breath;
Ne ought to see, but like a shade to weene,<sup>o</sup>
Unbodièd, unsouled, unheard, unseene.
But Life was like a faire young lusty boy,
Such as they faine Dan Cupid to have beene,
Full of delightfull health and lively joy,
Deckt all with flowres, and wings of gold fit to employ.

47

When these were past, thus gan the Titanesse:
"Lo, mighty mother, now be judge and say,

Whether in all thy creatures more or lesse
Change doth not raig and beare the greatest sway:
For, who sees not, that Time on all doth pray?°
But Times do change and move continually.
So nothing here long standeth in one stay:
Wherefore, this lower world who can deny
But to be subject still° to Mutabilitie?"

48

Then thus gan Jove: "Right true it is, that these
And all things else that under heaven dwell
Are chaunged of Time, who doth them all disseise°
Of being: But, who is it (to me tell)
That Time himselfe doth move and still compell
To keepe his course? Is not that namely wee
Which poure that vertue° from our heavenly cell,
That moves them all, and makes them changèd be?
So them we gods doe rule, and in them also thee."

49

To whom, thus Mutability: "The things
Which we see not how they are moved and swayd,
Ye may attribute to your selves as Kings,
And say they by your secret powre are made:
But what we see not, who shall us perswade?
But were they so, as ye them faine to be,
Moved by your might, and ordred by your ayde;
Yet what if I can prove, that even yee
Your selves are likewise changed, and subject unto mee?"

50

"And first, concerning her that is the first,<sup>1</sup>
Even you faire Cynthia, whom so much ye make Joves dearest darling, she was bred and nurst
On Cynthus hill,<sup>2</sup> whence she her name did take:

Then is she mortall borne, how-so<sup>o</sup> ye crake;<sub>o</sub>
Besides, her face and countenance every day
We changèd see, and sundry forms partake,
Now hornd, now round, now bright, now brown<sup>o</sup> and gray:
So that 'as changefull as the Moone' men use<sup>o</sup> to say.

51

"Next, Mercury, who though he lesse appeare
To change his hew, and alwayes seeme as one;
Yet, he his course doth altar every yeare,
And is of late far out of order gone:<sup>3</sup>
So Venus eeke, that goodly Paragone,<sup>o</sup>
Though faire all night, yet is she darke all day;
And Phoebus self, who lightsome is alone,<sup>o</sup>
Yet is he oft eclipsed by the way,<sup>o</sup>
And fills the darkned world with terror and dismay.

52

"Now Mars that valiant man is changèd most:
For, he some times so far runs out of square,
That he his way doth seem quite to have lost,
And cleane without<sup>o</sup> his usuall sphere to fare;
That even these Star-gazers stonisht are
At sight thereof, and damne their lying bookes:
So likewise, grim Sir Saturne oft doth spare<sup>o</sup>
His sterne aspect,<sup>4</sup> and calme his crabbèd<sup>o</sup> lookes:
So many turning cranks<sup>o</sup> these have, so many crookes.

53

"But you Dan Jove, that only constant are,
And King of all the rest, as ye do clame,
Are you not subject eeke to this misfare?<sup>o</sup>
Then let me aske you this withouten blame,
Where were ye borne? some say in Crete by name,
Others in Thebes, and others other-where;

But wheresoever they comment<sup>o</sup> the same,
They all consent that ye begotten were,
And borne here in this world, ne other<sup>5</sup> can appeare.

54

“Then are ye mortall borne, and thrall to me,
Unless the kingdome of the sky yee make<sup>o</sup>
Immortall, and unchangeable to bee;
Besides, that power and vertue<sup>6</sup> which ye spake,
That ye here worke, doth many changes take,
And your owne natures change: for, each of you
That vertue have, or<sup>o</sup> this, or that to make,
Is checkt and changed from his nature trew,
By others opposition or obliquid view.<sup>7</sup>

55

“Besides, the sundry motions of your Spheares,<sup>8</sup>
So sundry waies and fashions as clerkes<sup>o</sup> faine,
Some in short space, and some in longer yeares;
What is the same but alteration plaine?
Onely the starrie skie<sup>9</sup> doth still remaine:<sup>o</sup>
Yet do the Starres and Signes therein still move,
And even it self is moved, as wizards saine.<sup>o</sup>
But all that moveth, doth mutation love:
Therefore both you and them to me I subject prove.

56

“Then since within this wide great Universe
Nothing doth firme and permanent appeare,
But all things tost and turned by transverse:<sup>o</sup>
What then should let,<sup>o</sup> but I aloft should reare
My Trophee, and from all, the triumph beare?
Now judge then (O thou greatest goddesse trew!)
According as thy selfe doest see and heare,

And unto me addoom that<sup>o</sup> is my dew;
That is the rule of all, all being ruled by you."

57

So having ended, silence long ensewed,
Ne<sup>o</sup> Nature to or fro<sup>1</sup> spake for a space,
But with firme eyes affixt, the ground still viewed.
Meane while, all creatures, looking in her face,
Expecting<sup>o</sup> th'end of this so doubtfull case,
Did hang in long suspence what would ensew,
To whether<sup>o</sup> side should fall the soveraigne place:
At length, she looking up with chearefull view,
The silence brake, and gave her doome in speeches<sup>o</sup> few.

58

"I well consider all that ye have sayd,
And find that all things steadfastnes doe hate
And changèd be: yet being rightly wayd<sup>o</sup>
They are not changèd from their first estate;<sup>o</sup>
But by their change their being doe dilate:<sup>2</sup>
And turning to themselves at length againe,
Doe worke their owne perfection so by fate:
Then over them Change doth not rule and raigne;
But they raigne over change, and doe their states maintaine.

59

"Cease therefore daughter further to aspire,
And thee content thus to be ruled by me:
For thy decay<sup>o</sup> thou seekst by thy desire;
But time shall come that all shall changèd bee,
And from thenceforth, none no more change shall see."<sup>3</sup>
So was the Titaness put downe and whist,<sup>o</sup>
And Jove confirmed in his imperiall see.<sup>o</sup>
Then was that whole assembly quite dismiss,

And Natur's selfe did vanish, whither no man wist.<sup>o</sup>

The 8 Canto, unperfite.*<sup>o</sup>

1

When I bethinke me on that speech whyleare,<sup>o</sup>
Of Mutability, and well it way:<sup>o</sup>
Me seemes, that though she all unworthy were
Of the Heav'ns Rule; yet very sooth to say,
In all things else she beares the greatest sway.
Which makes me loath this state of life so tickle,<sup>o</sup>
And love of things so vaine to cast away;
Whose flowring pride, so fading and so fickle,
Short Time shall soon cut down with his consuming sickle.

2

Then gin<sup>o</sup> I thinke on that which Nature sayd,
Of that same time when no more Change shall be,
But stedfast rest of all things firmly stayd
Upon the pillours of Eternity,
That is contrayr to<sup>o</sup> Mutabilitie:
For, all that moveth, doth in Change delight:
But thence-forth all shall rest eternally
With Him that is the God of Sabbaoth hight:
O that great Sabbaoth God, graunt me that Sabaoths sight.<sup>4</sup>

Endnotes

- Note 1: The old cosmology held that change occurred only in the sublunary realm.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The Titans were the sons and daughters of sky and earth; their king was Cronus (Time). Jove, Cronus's son, dethroned him and established the rule of the gods. But some descendants of the original Titans, such as Prometheus and Hecate, survived. Spenser invents another, a Titaness called Mutabilitie.Return to reference 2

- Note 3: A goddess of Hades but also often associated with the powerful and generally benevolent goddess Artemis (in Rome, Diana). Her name is pronounced HEK-a-tee.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Roman goddess of war.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Those two; that is, Hecate and Bellona.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The highest sublunary region.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The transparent sphere that, in the Ptolemaic cosmology, revolved around the earth, carrying the moon along. (The sun, the other known planets, and, collectively, the fixed stars were similarly carried by their spheres.)Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Cynthia, Diana, or Phoebe, the moon goddess, often associated with Queen Elizabeth.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: That is, the constellations.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: That is, whether he liked it or not.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Soon, she resolved.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Cynthia's bent brows are the horns of the crescent moon.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Strange behavior.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: In the Ptolemaic system the sphere of Mercury was next beyond that of the moon. In mythology Mercury was the messenger of the gods. In stanza 19, his Greek name, Hermes, is used. "Chaos": in Greek mythology, the first created being—the scarcely personified, profoundly unordered primordial soup.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A giant who had rebelled against Jove.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: That is, stop interfering with the moon's free movement.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, the caduceus, Mercury's rod, which could bring spirits from the underworld.Return to reference 8

- Note 9: The moon as the twin sister of Phoebus Apollo, the sun god.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: That is, his awesome nod of judgment.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Deliver. "Straight": straightaway.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Care. "Earth's daughter": that is, Mutability.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Earth is the offspring of Chaos, in Hesiod and later mythologies.Return to reference 4
- Note 5:
In this variant myth, Titan, eldest son of Uranus, abdicated in favor of his younger brother Saturn on condition that Saturn would eat all his own male children, thus assuring the succession would eventually revert to Titan's line. When Jove was born to Rhea, Saturn's wife, she gave Saturn a stone to swallow instead of the baby, and her attendants, the Corybantes, beat on their shields to drown out the baby's cries. Eventually Jove deposed his father.
Return to reference 5
- Note 6:
Procrustes was a robber who waylaid strangers and made them fit his bed by cutting or stretching them. (Spenser includes him among those punished by Jove, though the standard version of the myth has Theseus in that role.) Typhon was a hundred-headed monster overthrown by Jove. Ixion tried to seduce Jove's wife and was punished by being bound to a wheel of fire in hell. Prometheus stole fire from heaven and gave it to humankind, for which Jove punished him by chaining him to a cliff where an eagle fed on his liver, which grew back every night.
Return to reference 6
- Note 7: That is, his locks were sprinkled with a fragrant balm. "Nectar" more often referred to the drink of the gods.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Lightning bolt.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Through fear of her.Return to reference 9

- Note 1: That is, no living person, however worthy, can claim any title to power or authority in heaven.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: That is, who is called father of gods and humans, with equal authority over both. Androgynous Nature is here male, but in the following canto female.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Evidently Spenser makes Phoebus Apollo the secretary ("Scribe") of the gods because he is the god of poetry.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: That is, Galtymore, a peak of the mountain range Spenser calls "my old father Mole," near Kilcolman Castle, where he lived in Ireland. The last two lines of the stanza refer to Spenser's praise of Mole in his pastoral eclogue Colin Clouts Come Home Againe.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Thread (of the story).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Ireland is called the "holy-Island" because, according to legend, Christianity first found a foothold there and thence spread to the rest of the British Isles.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Calliope is the Muse of epic poetry. Clio is the Muse of history.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Were accustomed to.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: That is, as Diana, goddess of forests, fond of hunting.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Nymphs in Greek mythology were minor female deities of streams, springs, trees, and other parts of nature. Satyrs were minor male gods of the woods, given to drinking and sensual pleasure. The Romans identified them with their goat-footed fauns; hence "Faunus" (stanza 42) and "Faune" (stanza 46).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The river Awbeg, whose joining with the river Bregog is told in Colin Clouts Come Home Againe. The Molanna is the shallow, rocky river Behanna.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Magnificent.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Privacy. Spenser here adapts the classical story of Actaeon with local Irish geographical references. Actaeon while hunting happened to see Diana bathing; he was turned into a stag and pursued and killed by his own hounds.Return to reference 4

- Note 5: Noted for their redness and early ripening.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: That is, who cared nothing for her. Fanchin is the river Funsheon.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Secretly; close up.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, as a due reward to one so foolhardy, he was devoured by his hunting dogs in the slaughter (“hew”) that follows a hunt.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Thought; vanity or pride.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Paralyzed with fear.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Destroy.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: This overwhelming with stones accounts for the shallowness of the river, mentioned in stanza 40.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The richest plain to be seen anywhere.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The river Suir.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Despoil.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Hunting ground.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Proclaims her righteous judgment.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Calliope, though possibly Clio. See canto 6, stanza 37 and n. 7.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Jove fathered the Muses on the Titaness Mnemosyne (Memory).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Meaning either that the infernal powers controlled the fiends by fear or that the heavenly and earthly powers feared them.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: King and queen of the Underworld.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Peter, James, and John saw Jesus transfigured on a mountain (traditionally Mount Tabor, in Galilee). See Matthew 17:1–8.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Chaucer, in his Parliament of Fowls, lines 316–18, refers to Alain de Lille’s De Planctu Naturae as Aley’s Pleynt of Kynde

(Complaint of Nature).Return to reference 5

- Note 6: See canto 6, stanza 36 and n. 4.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Well becomes you.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Mortal king and sea goddess, the parents of Achilles. Haemus is a mountain in Thrace. (But in the standard accounts the wedding is said to have taken place on Mount Pelion, in Greece.)Return to reference 8
- Note 9: In what follows, Mutabilitie argues the ubiquity of change in each of the traditional four elements (see stanza 25): earth, water, air, and fire. The most notable sources are Ovid, Metamorphoses 15, and Lucretius, De rerum natura 5.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: That is, death and disintegration.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: As in Genesis 1:7, where God divides “the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament.”Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Open. “Streight”: immediately.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The conductor or medium.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Roman goddess of plenty and fertility, who rules over earth. Vesta, goddess of the hearth, is assigned by Spenser to rule over the fire that is above the air. Vulcan, the blacksmith god, rules over earthly fire (“this, with us so usuall”).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Seen to look well; attractive.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: A coarse woolen cloth.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: In the Julian calendar (used in England until 1752), the year began on March 25.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: A ram, sometimes identified as Jove in one of the many forms he took for purposes of ravishment or seduction, carried Helle through the air. But she fell off into a body of water that has since borne her name: the Hellespont.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The Argolic Gulf of the Aegean Sea. The bull was Jupiter in disguise. He swam with Europa from the ancient Middle Eastern city of Tyre to Crete, off the southern coast of the continent that was supposedly named after her.Return to reference 1

- Note 2: Castor and Pollux (the zodiacal sign of Gemini). Each month brings its zodiacal sign to the conference.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Actor. Actors appearing as wild or savage men were attired in leafy costumes.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Like those who, in excessive and false politeness, walk backward as they leave a room.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: That is, Hercules, whose mother was the wife of King Amphitryon (though his father was Jupiter). Strangling the supernaturally powerful lion that had terrorized the region of Nemea in Greece was the first of Hercules' Twelve Labors.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: July both mows (with his scythe) and reaps.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Astraea, the goddess of justice. After leaving earth—in despair—she became the constellation Virgo.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, his head was unsteady from the new wine.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Wine vats' sea.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: According to one myth Orion boasted that he could kill anything that came from the earth. Indignant at his arrogance Diana sent a scorpion that stung and killed him.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The iron blade of a plow, which makes a vertical cut in the soil ahead of the plowshare, which cuts the furrow.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: He was stellified as the zodiacal sign Sagittarius,Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The nymph Amalthea, of Mount Ida in Crete. Jove was saved by his mother, Rhea, from being eaten by Cronus, his father. He was brought up in Crete and suckled by a goat identified with the zodiacal sign Capricorn.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Urn; here standing for the constellation Aquarius.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: That is, the Tiber River.Return to reference 6

- Note 7: That is, the water flowing from Aquarius's urn.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Temporal, belonging to time; in contrast to "high Jove," who is immortal.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Cause (them) to neglect.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The moon is first because its orbit is closest to the earth.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Mount Cynthus, on the Greek isle Delos.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The actual orbits of Mercury and the other planets were not accurately predictable by the Ptolemaic (earth-centric) astronomical model.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Punning on the astrological sense of "aspect" as the relative position of planets, which supposedly affects their influence. Saturn often runs so far out of his course that his generally baleful influence is lessened.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Nor anything else.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Power; that is, the paired words are synonymous.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Referring to the fundamental idea of astrology: that each planet has a "vertue" (power) that it sheds on earth, but that the effect depends on its position and the position of other planets. "Opposition" and "obliquity" are technical terms for the relative position of celestial bodies. "Obliquid" (found only here) is a coinage from oblique, presumably for the sake of the meter.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: See canto 6, stanza 8, n. 7.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The crystalline sphere that bore all the fixed stars, beyond the spheres of the moon, sun, and planets.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: For or against.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Expand, as they fulfill their natures.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Compare 1 Corinthians 15:51, 54: "we shall all be changed. . . . when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory."Return to reference 3

- Note 4: Spenser here confuses, perhaps intentionally, the Hebrew word for "armies, hosts" (Sabaoth) with that for "rest" (Sabbath).Return to reference 4

From Amoretti

1

Happy ye leaves<sup>1</sup> when as those lilly hands,
Which hold my life in their dead doing<sup>o</sup> might,
Shall handle you and hold in loves soft bands,<sup>o</sup>
Lyke captives trembling at the victors sight.
5 And happy lines, on which with starry light,
Those laming<sup>o</sup> eyes will deigne sometimes to look
And reade the sorrowes of my dying spright,<sup>o</sup>
Written with teares in harts close<sup>o</sup> bleeding book.
And happy rymes bath'd in the sacred brooke
10 Of Helicon<sup>2</sup> whence she derivèd is,
When ye behold that Angels blessèd looke,
My soules long lackèd foode, my heavens blis.
Leaves, lines, and rymes, seeke her to please alone,
Whom if ye please, I care for other none.

Lyke as a ship that through the Ocean wyde,
 By conduct of some star doth make her way,
 Whenas a storme hath dimd her trusty guyde,
 Out of her course doth wander far astray:
 5 So I whose star, that wont<sup>o</sup> with her bright ray
 Me to direct, with cloudes is overcast,
 Doe wander now in darknesse and dismay,
 Through hidden perils round about me plast.<sup>o</sup>
 Yet hope I well, that when this storme is past
 10 My Helice<sup>4</sup> the lodestar<sup>o</sup> of my lyfe
 Will shine again, and looke on me at last,
 With lovely light to cleare my cloudy grief.
 Till then I wander carefull<sup>o</sup> comfortlesse,
 In secret sorow and sad pensivenesse.

What guyle is this, that those her golden tresses,
 She doth attyre under a net of gold:
 And with sly<sup>o</sup> skill so cunningly them dresses,
 That which is gold or heare,<sup>o</sup> may scarce be told?
 5 Is it that mens frayle eyes, which gaze too bold,
 She may entangle in that golden snare:
 And being caught may craftily enfold
 Theyr weaker harts, which are not wel aware?<sup>o</sup>
 Take heed therefore, myne eyes, how ye doe stare
 Henceforth too rashly on that guilefull net,
 10 In which if ever ye entrappèd are,
 Out of her bands ye by no means shall get.
 Fondnesse<sup>o</sup> it were for any being free,
 To covet fetters, though they golden bee.

Of this worlds Theatre in which we stay,
 My love like the Spectator ydly sits
 Beholding me that all the pageants<sup>o</sup> play,
 Disguysing diversly my troubled wits.
 Sometimes I joy when glad occasion fits,
 5 And mask in myrth lyke to a Comedy:
 Soone after when my joy to sorrow flits,
 I waile and make my woes a Tragedy.
 Yet she beholding me with constant<sup>o</sup> eye,
 Delights not in my merth nor rues my smart:<sup>o</sup>
 10 But when I laugh she mocks, and when I cry
 She laughes and hardens evermore her hart.
 What then can move her? if nor merth nor mone,<sup>o</sup>
 She is no woman, but a sencelesse stone.

Comming to kisse her lyps (such grace I found)
 Me seemd I smelt a gardin of sweet flowres
 That dainty odours from them threw around,
 For damzels fit to decke their lovers bowres.
 5 Her lips did smell lyke unto Gillyflowers,<sup>o</sup>
 Her ruddy cheeks lyke unto Roses red;
 Her snowy browes lyke budded Bellamoures,<sup>6</sup>
 Her lovely eyes like Pincks but newly spred,
 Her goodly bosome lyke a Strawberry bed,
 10 Her neck lyke to a bounch of Cullambynes;
 Her brest lyke lillyes, ere theyr leaves be shed,
 Her nipples lyke yong blossomd Jessemynes.<sup>o</sup>
 Such fragrant flowres doe give most odorous smell,
 But her sweet odour did them all excell.

Lyke as a huntsman after weary chace,

 Sits downe to rest him in some shady place,
 With panting hounds beguiled<sup>o</sup> of their pray:
 So after long pursuit and vaine assay,<sup>o</sup>
 5 When I all weary had the chace forsooke,
 The gentle deare returnd the selfe-same way,
 Thinking to quench her thirst at the next<sup>o</sup> brooke.
 There she beholding me with mylder looke,
 Sought not to fly, but fearelesse still did bide:
 10 Till I in hand her yet halfe trembling tooke,

 Strange thing me seemd to see a beast so wyld,
 So goodly wonne with her owne will beguyld.<sup>8</sup>

Men call you fayre, and you doe credit<sup>o</sup> it,
 For that your selfe ye dayly such doe see:
 But the trew fayre,<sup>o</sup> that is the gentle wit,<sup>o</sup>

Epithalamion

Ye learned sisters<sup>o</sup> which have oftentimes
Beene to me ayding, others to adorne:<sup>1</sup>
Whom ye thought worthy of your gracefull rymes,
That even the greatest did not greatly scorne
To heare theyr names sung in your simple layes,<sup>o</sup>
5 But joyed in theyr prayse.
And when ye list<sup>o</sup> your owne mishaps to mourne,
Which death, or love, or fortunes wreck did rayse,
Your string could soone to sadder tenor<sup>o</sup> turne,
And teach the woods and waters to lament
10 Your dolefull dreriment.<sup>o</sup>
Now lay those sorrowfull complaints aside,
And having all your heads with girland crownd,
Helpe me mine owne loves prayes to resound,
Ne<sup>o</sup> let the same of<sup>o</sup> any be envie:
15 So Orpheus did for his owne bride,<sup>2</sup>
So I unto my selfe alone will sing,
The woods shall to me answer and my eccho ring.

Early before the worlds light giving lampe,
His golden beame upon the hils doth spred,
20 Having disperst the nights unchearefull dampe,
Doe ye awake, and with fresh lustyhed<sup>o</sup>
Go to the bowre<sup>o</sup> of my beloved love,
My truest turtle dove,
Bid her awake; for Hymen<sup>3</sup> is awake,
25 And long since ready forth his maske to move,
With his bright Tead<sup>4</sup> that flames with many a flake,<sup>o</sup>
And many a bachelor to waite on him,
In theyr fresh garments trim.

30 Bid her awake therefore and soone her dight,<sup>o</sup>
For lo the wishèd day is come at last,
That shall for al the paynes and sorrowes past,
Pay to her usury<sup>o</sup> of long delight:
And whylest she doth her dight,
35 Doe ye to her of joy and solace<sup>o</sup> sing,
That all the woods may answer and your Eccho ring.

Bring with you all the Nymphes that you can heare<sup>o</sup>
Both of the rivers and the forrests greene:
And of the sea that neighbours to her neare,
Al with gay girlands goodly wel beseene.<sup>o</sup>
40 And let them also with them bring in hand,
Another gay girland
For my fayre love of lillyes and of roses,
Bound truelove wize<sup>o</sup> with a blew silke riband.
And let them make great store<sup>o</sup> of bridale poses,<sup>o</sup>
45 And let them eeke<sup>o</sup> bring store of other flowers
To deck the bridale bowers.
And let the ground whereas<sup>o</sup> her foot shall tread,
For feare the stones her tender foot should wrong
Be strewed with fragrant flowers all along,
50 And diapred lyke the discolored mead.<sup>5</sup>
Which done, doe at her chamber dore awayt,
For she will waken strayt,<sup>o</sup>
The whiles doe ye this song unto her sing,
The woods shall to you answer and your Eccho ring.
55

Ye Nymphes of Mulla<sup>6</sup> which with careful heed,
The silver scaly trouts doe tend full well,
And greedy pikes which use<sup>o</sup> therein to feed,
(Those trouts and pikes all others doo excell)
And ye likewise which keepe the rushy lake,<sup>o</sup>
60 Where none doo fishes take,
Bynd up the locks the which hang scatterd light,
And in his waters which your mirror make,

Behold your faces as the christall bright,
That when you come whereas<sup>o</sup> my love doth lie,
65 No blemish she may spie.
And eke ye lightfoot mayds which keepe the deere,<sup>7</sup>
That on the hoary<sup>o</sup> mountayne use to towre,<sup>8</sup>
And the wylde wolves which seeke them to devoure,
With your steele darts<sup>o</sup> doo chace from comming
70 neer,
Be also present heere,
To helpe to decke her and to help to sing,
That all the woods may answer and your eccho ring.

Wake now my love, awake; for it is time,
The Rosy Morne long since left Tithones bed,<sup>9</sup>
75 All ready to her silver coche<sup>o</sup> to clyme,
And Phoebus<sup>o</sup> gins<sup>o</sup> to shew his glorious hed.
Hark how the cheerefull birds do chaunt theyr laies
And carroll of loves praise.
The merry Larke hir mattins<sup>o</sup> sings aloft,
80 The thrush replyes, the Mavis descant<sup>1</sup> playes,
The Ouzell shrills, the Ruddock<sup>2</sup> warbles soft,
So goodly all agree with sweet consent,<sup>o</sup>
To this dayes merriment.
Ah my deere love why doe ye sleepe thus long,
85 When meeter<sup>o</sup> were that ye should now awake,
T'awayt the comming of your joyous make,<sup>o</sup>
And hearken to the birds lovelearnèd song,
The deawy leaves among.
For they of joy and pleasance to you sing,
90 That all the woods them answer and theyr eccho
ring.

My love is now awake out of her dreame,
And her fayre eyes like stars that dimmèd were

With darksome cloud, now shew<sup>o</sup> theyr goodly beams
More bright then<sup>o</sup> Hesperus<sup>o</sup> his head doth rere.
95 Come now ye damzels, daughters of delight,
Helpe quickly her to dight,<sup>o</sup>
But first come ye fayre houres<sup>3</sup> which were begot
In Joves sweet paradise, of Day and Night,
Which doe the seasons of the yeare allot,
100 And al that ever in this world is fayre
Doe make and still<sup>o</sup> repayre.
And ye three handmayds of the Cyprian Queene,<sup>4</sup>
The which doe still adorne her beauties pride,
Helpe to addorne my beautifulest bride:
105 And as ye her array, still throw betweene<sup>o</sup>
Some graces to be seene,
And as ye use<sup>o</sup> to Venus, to her sing,
The whiles the woods shal answer and your eccho
ring.

Now is my love all ready forth to come,
110 Let all the virgins therefore well awayt,
And ye fresh boyes that tend upon her groome
Prepare your selves; for he is comming strayt.<sup>o</sup>
Set all your things in seemely good aray<sup>o</sup>
Fit for so joyfull day,
115 The joyfulst day that ever sunne did see.
Faire Sun, shew forth thy favourable ray,
And let thy lifull<sup>o</sup> heat not fervent<sup>o</sup> be
For feare of burning her sunshyny face,
Her beauty to disgrace.<sup>o</sup>
120 O fayrest Phoebus, father of the Muse,<sup>5</sup>
If ever I did honour thee aright,
Or sing the thing, that mote<sup>o</sup> thy mind delight,
Doe not thy servants simple boone<sup>o</sup> refuse,
But let this day let this one day be myne,
125

Let all the rest be thine.
Then I thy soverayne prayses loud wil sing,
That all the woods shal answer and theyr eccho ring.

Harke how the Minstrels gin to shrill aloud
Their merry Musick that resounds from far,
130 The pipe, the tabor,<sup>o</sup> and the trembling Croud,<sup>6</sup>
That well agree withouten breach or jar.<sup>o</sup>
But most of all the Damzels doe delite,
When they their tymbrels<sup>o</sup> smyte,
And thereunto doe daunce and carrol sweet,
135 That all the sences they doe ravish quite,
The whyles the boyes run up and downe the street,
Crying aloud with strong confusèd noyce,
As if it were one voyce.

Hymen<sup>7</sup> iô Hymen, Hymen they do shout, 140 That even to the heavens theyr shouting shrill
Doth reach, and all the firmament doth fill,
To which the people standing all about,
As in approvance doe thereto applaud
And loud advance her laud,<sup>o</sup>
145 And evermore they Hymen Hymen sing,
That all the woods them answer and theyr eccho
ring.

Loe where she comes along with portly<sup>o</sup> pace,
Lyke Phoebe from her chamber of the East,
Arysing forth to run her mighty race,<sup>8</sup>
150 Clad all in white, that seemes<sup>o</sup> a virgin best.
So well it her beseems that ye would weene<sup>o</sup>
Some angell she had beene.
Her long loose yellow locks lyke golden wyre,
Sprinckled with perle, and perling flowres a tweene,<sup>9</sup>
155 Doe lyke a golden mantle her attyre,
And being crownèd with a girland greene,

Seeme lyke some mayden Queene.
Her modest eyes abashèd to behold
So many gazers, as on her do stare, 160 Upon the lowly ground affixèd are.
Ne dare lift up her countenance too bold,
But blush to heare her prayses sung so loud,
So farre from being proud.
Nathlesse doe ye still loud her prayses sing,
165 That all the woods may answer and your eccho ring.

Tell me ye merchants daughters did ye see
So fayre a creature in your towne before,
So sweet, so lovely, and so mild as she,
Adornd with beautyes grace and vertues store,<sup>o</sup>
170 Her goodly eyes lyke Saphyres shining bright,
Her forehead yvory white,
Her cheekes lyke apples which the sun hath rudded,
<sup>o</sup>
Her lips lyke cherries charming men to byte,
Her brest like to a bowle of creame uncruddled,<sup>o</sup>
175 Her paps<sup>o</sup> lyke lyllies budded,
Her snowie necke lyke to a marble towre,
And all her body like a pallace fayre,
Ascending uppe with many a stately stayre,
Ascending uppe with many a stately stayre,
180 To honors seat and chastities sweet bowre.<sup>1</sup>
Why stand ye still ye virgins in amaze,
Upon her so to gaze,
Whiles ye forget your former lay to sing,
To which the woods did answer and your eccho ring.

But if ye saw that which no eyes can see,
185 The inward beauty of her lively spright,<sup>o</sup>
Garnisht with heavenly guifts of high degree,
Much more then would ye wonder at that sight,
And stand astonisht lyke to those which red<sup>o</sup>
Medusaes mazeful hed.<sup>2</sup>

190 There dwels sweet love and constant chastity,
Unspotted fayth<sup>o</sup> and comely womanhood,
Regard of honour and mild modesty,
There vertue raynes as Queene in royal throne,
And giveth lawes alone.
195 The which the base<sup>o</sup> affections doe obay,
And yeeld theyr services unto her will,
Ne thought of thing uncomely ever may
Thereto approach to tempt her mind to ill.
Had ye once seene these her celestial treasures,
200 And unrevealèd pleasures,
Then would ye wonder and her prayses sing,
That all the woods should answer and your Echo
ring.

Open the temple gates unto my love,
205 Open them wide that she may enter in,<sup>3</sup>
And all the postes adorne as doth behove,<sup>4</sup>
And all the pillours deck with girlands trim,
For to recyve this Saynt with honour dew,
That commeth in to you.
With trembling steps and humble reverence,
210 She commeth in, before th'almighties vew,
Of her ye virgins learne obedience,
When so ye come into those holy places,
To humble your proud faces:
Bring her up to th'high altar, that she may 215 The sacred ceremonies there partake,
The which do endless matrimony make,
And let the roring<sup>o</sup> Organs loudly play
The praises of the Lord in lively notes,
The whiles with hollow<sup>o</sup> throates
220 The Choristers the joyous Antheme sing,
That all the woods may answere and theyr eccho
ring.

Behold whiles she before the altar stands
Hearing the holy priest that to her speakes
And blesseth her with his two happy hands,
225 How the red roses flush up in her cheekes,
And the pure snow with goodly vermill<sup>o</sup> stayne,
Like crimson dyde in grayne,<sup>o</sup>
That even th'Angels which continually,
About the sacred Altare doe remaine,
230 Forget their service and about her fly,
Ofte peeping in her face that seemes more fayre,
The more they on it stare.
But her sad<sup>o</sup> eyes still<sup>o</sup> fastened on the ground,
Are governèd with goodly modesty,
235 That suffers<sup>o</sup> not one looke to glaunce awry,
Which may let in a little thought unsownd.<sup>o</sup>
Why blush ye love to give to me your hand,
The pledge of all our band?<sup>o</sup>
Sing ye sweet Angels, Alleluya sing,
240 That all the woods may answeare and your eccho
ring.

Now al is done; bring home the bride againe,
Bring home the triumph of our victory,
Bring home with you the glory of her gaine,<sup>5</sup>
With joyance bring her and with jollity.
245 Never had man more joyfull day then this,
Whom heaven would heape with blis.
Make feast therefore now all this live long day,
This day for ever to me holy is,
Poure out the wine without restraint or stay,<sup>o</sup>
250 Poure not by cups, but by the belly<sup>o</sup> full,
Poure out to all that wull,<sup>o</sup>
And sprinkle all the postes and wals with wine,
That they may sweat, and drunken be withall.
Crowne ye God Bacchus<sup>o</sup> with a coronall,<sup>o</sup>

255 And Hymen also crowne with wreathes of vine,
And let the Graces daunce unto the rest;
For they can doo it best:
The whiles the maydens doe theyr carroll sing,
260 To which the woods shall answer and theyr eccho
ring.

Ring ye the bells, ye young men of the towne,
And leave your wonted<sup>o</sup> labors for this day:
This day is holy; doe ye write it downe,
That ye for ever it remember may.
This day the sunne is in his chieftest hight,
265 With Barnaby the bright,<sup>6</sup>
From whence declining daily by degrees,
He somewhat loseth of his heat and light,
When once the Crab<sup>7</sup> behind his back he sees.
But for this time it ill ordainèd was,
270 To chose the longest day in all the yeare,
And shortest night, when longest fitter weare:
Yet never day so long, but late<sup>o</sup> would passe.
Ring ye the bells, to make it weare away,
And bonefiers<sup>o</sup> make all day,
275 And daunce about them, and about them sing:
That all the woods may answer, and your eccho ring.

Ah when will this long weary day have end,
And lende me leave to come unto my love?
How slowly do the houres theyr numbers<sup>8</sup> spend?
280 How slowly does sad Time his feathers move?<sup>9</sup>
Hast<sup>o</sup> thee O fayrest Planet to thy home
Within the Westernne fome:
Thy tyred steedes long since have need of rest.<sup>1</sup>
Long though it be, at last I see it gloome,<sup>o</sup>
285 And the bright evening star with golden creast<sup>o</sup>
Appeare out of the East.

Fayre childe of beauty, glorious lampe of love
That all the host of heaven in rankes doost lead,
And guydest lovers through the nightès dread,
290 How chearefully thou lookest from above,
And seemst to laugh atweene thy twinkling light
As joying in the sight
Of these glad many which for joy doe sing,
That all the woods them answer and theyr echo ring.
295

Now ceasse ye damsels your delights forepast;°
Enough is it, that all the day was youres:
Now day is doen, and night is nighing° fast:
Now bring the Bryde into the brydall boures.
Now night is come, now soone her disaray,°
300 And in her bed her lay;
Lay her in lillies and in violets,
And silken courteins over her display,°
And odourd° sheetes, and Arras° coverlets.
Behold how goodly my faire love does ly
305 In proud humility;
Like unto Maia,<sup>2</sup> when as Jove her tooke,
In Tempe,<sup>3</sup> lying on the flowry gras, Twixt sleepe and wake, after she weary was,
With bathing in the Acidalian brooke.<sup>4</sup>
310 Now it is night, ye damsels may be gon,
And leave my love alone,
And leave° likewise your former lay to sing:
The woods no more shall answere, nor your echo
ring.

Now welcome night, thou night so long expected,
315 That long daies labour doest at last defray,°
And all my cares, which cruell love collected,
Hast sumd° in one, and cancellèd<sup>5</sup> for aye:°
Spread thy broad wing over my love and me,

320 That no man may us see,
And in thy sable<sup>o</sup> mantle us enwrap,
From feare of perrill and foule horror free.
Let no false treason seeke us to entrap,
Nor any dread disquiet once annoy<sup>o</sup>
The safety of our joy:
325 But let the night be calme and quiet some,
Without tempestuous storms or sad afray:<sup>o</sup>
Lyke as when Jove with fayre Alcmena<sup>6</sup> lay,
When he begot the great Tirynthian groome:
Or lyke as when he with thy selfe<sup>7</sup> did lie, 330 And begot Majesty.
And let the mayds and yongmen cease to sing:
Ne let the woods them answer, nor theyr Eccho ring.

Let no lamenting cryes, nor dolefull teares,
Be heard all night within nor yet without:
335 Ne let false whispers, breeding hidden feares,
Breake gentle sleepe with misconceivèd dout.<sup>o</sup>
Let no deluding dreames, nor dreadful sights
Make sudden sad affrights;
Ne let housefyres, nor lightnings helpelesse<sup>o</sup> harmes,
340 Ne let the Pouke,<sup>8</sup> nor other evill sprights,
Ne let mischivous witches with theyr charmes,
Ne let hob Goblins, names whose sence we see not,
Fray<sup>o</sup> us with things that be not.
Let not the shrieck Oule, nor the Storke be heard:
345 Nor the night Raven that still<sup>o</sup> deadly yels,<sup>9</sup>
Nor damnèd ghosts cald up with mighty spels,
Nor griesly<sup>o</sup> vultures make us once affeard:
Ne let th'unpleasant Quayre of Frogs still croking
Make us to wish theyr choking.
350 Let none of these theyr drery accents sing;
Ne let the woods them answer, nor theyr eccho ring.

But let stil Silence trew night watches keepe,
That sacred peace may in assurance rayne,
And tymely Sleep, when it is tyme to sleepe,
355 May poure his limbs forth on your pleasant playne,
The whiles an hundred little winged loves,<sup>o</sup>
Like divers fethered doves,
Shall fly and flutter round about your bed,
And in the secret darke, that none reproves,
360 Their prety stealthes shal worke, and snares shal spread
To filch away sweet snatches of delight,
Conceald through covert night.
Ye sonnes of Venus, play your sports at will,
For greedy pleasure, carelesse of your toyes,<sup>o</sup>
365 Thinks more upon her paradise of joyes,
Then<sup>o</sup> what ye do, albe it<sup>o</sup> good or ill.
All night therefore attend your merry play,
For it will soone be day:
Now none doth hinder you, that say or sing,
370 Ne will the woods now answer, nor your Eccho ring.

Who is the same, which at my window peepes?
Or whose is that faire face, that shines so bright,
Is it not Cinthia,<sup>1</sup> she that never sleepes,
But walkes about high heaven al the night?
375 O fayrest goddesse, do thou not envy
My love with me to spy:
For thou likewise didst love, though now unthought,<sup>o</sup>
And for a fleece of woll,<sup>o</sup> which privily,
The Latmian shephard<sup>2</sup> once unto thee brought,
380 His pleasures with thee wrought.
Therefore to us be favorable now;
And sith<sup>o</sup> of wemens labours thou hast charge,<sup>3</sup>
And generation goodly dost enlarge,
Encline thy will t'effect our wishfull vow,

385 And the chaste wombe informe<sup>o</sup> with timely seed,
That may our comfort breed:
Till which we cease our hopefull hap<sup>o</sup> to sing,
Ne let the woods us answer, nor our Eccho ring.

390 And thou great Juno, which with awful<sup>o</sup> might
The lawes of wedlock still dost patronize,<sup>o</sup>
And the religion<sup>o</sup> of the faith first plight<sup>o</sup>
With sacred rites hast taught to solemnize:
And eeke<sup>o</sup> for comfort often callèd art
Of women in their smart,<sup>o</sup>
395 Eternally bind thou this lovely band,<sup>o</sup>
And all thy blessings unto us impart.
And thou glad Genius,<sup>4</sup> in whose gentle hand,
The bridale bowre and geniall bed remaine,
Without blemish or staine,
400 And the sweet pleasures of theyr loves delight
With secret ayde doest succour<sup>o</sup> and supply,
Till they bring forth the fruitfull progeny,
Send us the timely fruit of this same night.
And thou fayre Hebe,<sup>5</sup> and thou Hymen free, 405 Grant that it may so be.
Til which we cease your further prayse to sing,
Ne any woods shall answer, nor your Eccho ring.

And ye high heavens, the temple of the gods,
410 In which a thousand torches flaming bright
Doe burne, that to us wretched earthly clods,
In dreadful darknesse lend desired light;
And all ye powers which in the same remayne,
More then we men can fayne,<sup>o</sup>
415 Poure out your blessing on us plentiously,
And happy influence upon us raine,
That we may raise a large posterity,
Which from the earth, which they may long possesse,

With lasting happinesse,
Up to your haughty<sup>o</sup> pallaces may mount,
420 And for the guerdon<sup>o</sup> of theyr glorious merit
May heavenly tabernacles there inherit,
Of blessed Saints for to increase the count.
So let us rest, sweet love, in hope of this,
425 And cease till then our tymely joyes to sing,
The woods no more us answer, nor our eccho ring.

Song made in lieu of many ornaments,
With which my love should duly have bene dect,<sup>o</sup>
Which cutting off through hasty accidents,
Ye would not stay your dew time to expect,<sup>o</sup>
430 But promist both to recompens,
Be unto her a goodly ornament,
And for short time an endlesse monument.<sup>6</sup>

Endnotes

- Note 1: To write poems in praise of others.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Orpheus, archetype of the poet in classical antiquity, was famous for his love for his wife, Eurydice.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The god of marriage, who leads a “maske” or procession at weddings.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: A ceremonial torch, associated with marriages since classical times.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Ornamented like the many-colored meadow.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A river near Spenser’s home in Ireland.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: All wild animals, kept by the woodland nymphs.Return to reference 7

- Note 8: A falconry term meaning to occupy heights.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: See Song of Solomon 2:10–13: “Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away. For, lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come.” In classical myth, Tithonus is the aged husband of Aurora, the dawn.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: A melody or counterpoint written above a musical theme—a soprano obbligato. “Mavis”: the song thrush.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The European robin. “Ouzell”: the blackbird (which sings in England). The birds’ concert is a convention of medieval love poetry.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The Hours, or Horae, are Olympian deities who attend to natural growth and to social order. They were traditionally the daughters of Jove and the Titaness Themis, but in the Mutabilitie Cantos of The Faerie Queene (above), Spenser says Jove fathered them on Night.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Venus. “Three handmayds”: the Graces, representing brightness, joy, and abundance.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Phoebus Apollo, god of the sun, was also god of music and poetry, but he was not normally regarded as the father of the Nine Muses (Zeus was).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Primitive fiddle. Spenser here designates Irish, not classical, instruments and music for the classical masque or ballet.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The name of the classical god of marriage, used as a conventional exclamation at weddings in ancient Greece.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Phoebe is the moon, a virgin like the bride; the reference to her anticipates the night.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Between. “Perling”: winding.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The head, where the higher faculties are. The catalog of qualities is a convention in love poetry (compare Song of Solomon 4–8).Return to reference 1

- Note 2: Medusa, one of the Gorgons, had serpents instead of hair (hence a “mazeful hed”): to stone.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: See Psalms 24:7: “Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in.”Return to reference 3
- Note 4: As is proper. The doorposts were trimmed for weddings in classical times, and the custom was often referred to in classical and later love poetry.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: That is, the glory of gaining her.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Saint Barnabas’s Day, at the time of the summer solstice.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The constellation Cancer between Gemini and Leo. The sun, passing through the zodiac, leaves the Crab behind toward the end of July.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, the number of minutes or the numbers depicted on a clock.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: In traditional iconography, Time is winged.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The sun’s chariot completes its daily course in the western sea (“fome”).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The eldest and most beautiful of the seven daughters of Atlas. (They were stellified as the Pleiades.) Jove fathered Mercury on her.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The Vale of Tempe in Thessaly (not, however, traditionally the site of Jove’s encounter with Maia).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Associated with Venus.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Annulled or rendered void (as with a debt); compensated for.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The mother of Hercules (“the great Tirynthian groome”). Jove made that first night last as long as three.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Night. This is Spenser’s own myth.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Puck, Robin Goodfellow—here more powerful and evil than Shakespeare made him in A Midsummer Night’s Dream.Return to reference 8

- Note 9: The owl and the night raven were birds of ill omen. The stork, in Chaucer's Parliament of Fowls, is called an avenger of adultery.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Cynthia (or Diana) is goddess of the moon.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Endymion, beloved of the moon. The "fleece of woll," however, comes from another story—that of Pan's enticement of the moon.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Diana is, as Lucina, patroness of births. The "labours" are, of course, those of childbirth.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: God of generation and birth. "Geniall": a puns on his name having both the usual sense and the sense of generative.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Goddess of youth and freedom.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The envoy (brief final stanza addressed to the poem itself) is traditionally apologetic in tone: the poem is offered as a substitute for presents ("ornaments") that did not arrive in time for the wedding. But this elaborate poem is itself a "goodly ornament," for it stands as a timeless monument of art to the passing day that it celebrates.Return to reference 6

Commonplace Book

Many of the authors in this volume—including, famously, Elizabeth I—recorded their writings, and those of other people, in “commonplace books.” These were personal anthologies, written out and organized by their compilers under subject headings (or “places,” in the sense of the Greek topoi, or “topics”). Essentially handwritten scrapbooks, commonplace books combined favorite passages, revered bits of text, and observations needing further thought; they at once provided an account and a summary of their owners’ reading, a handy guide for conversation, and a template for imitation. As commonplace books were generally written in one hand, they gave a sameness and unity to vastly different material, which might have its source in printed texts, manuscripts, and sometimes oral exchanges. And compilers often further personalized the snippets they had chosen to record by adding their own words to them or making other changes. That is why the “same” texts preserved in more than one commonplace book often differ. Thus several selections in the commonplace book here—including Sir John Harington’s “A Certain Man,” Marlowe’s “The Passionate Shepherd to His Love,” and Robert Wisdome’s “A Religious Use of Taking Tobacco”—exist in variant forms, which may be explained by authorial revision or by the commonplace book culture. Commonplace books make it hard to know what the “real author” or the “real text” is and, indeed, whether those are the correct questions to ask.

Though Erasmus had set down rules for possessing and organizing commonplace books, which he thought essential to the education of the humanist, surviving commonplace books seldom have educational improvement as their (only) goal. Some are funny, some bawdy, some practical, and some mixtures of all of these. What follows, a commonplace book compiled by the Norton anthology editors from a range of early modern sources, reflects the mingled seriousness and humor typical of many commonplace books: it shows writers of the period being frank, annoyed, and humorous as well as decorous and pastoral. The headings chosen, too, are editorial, and are arranged in alphabetical order, and it will be clear that several poems could easily have been slotted into other “places” and put into dialogue with other texts.

Of the poems and prose in this section, some are sourced from commonplace books of the time; others are taken from print or manuscript texts regularly quoted in commonplace books; and still others have been commonplace by the Norton editors. As sixteenth-century commonplace books ranged over oral, sung, and written texts, so this commonplace book includes all three types, setting the voices of the literate by those of the illiterate (who often recorded their thoughts in popular song), working men and women by courtiers, the young by the old, the ill by the well, and the successful by the unsuccessful. As often happens in commonplace books, some of the texts here are anonymous, meaning that the sex, race, and age of their writers cannot always be determined. As with any commonplace book, this one contains texts that are not easily datable, so some may not fit exactly into the period of this volume.

Commonplace books reveal as well as dictate the active way in which individuals read in the period: they show how some readers were “collectors,” searching texts for discrete passages to add to their compilations. Some of the extraordinary literary exuberance included in this volume—the rhymes, the puns, the conceits, the sententiae, the proverbial wisdom, the euphuisms—may have been written to be excerpted: written, that is to say, with commonplace books and their construction in mind.

AGING

George Gascoigne The son of a respectable country gentleman, Gascoigne (1534/5–1577) lived a turbulent life. Having squandered his inheritance in an attempt to establish himself at court, he failed both as a lawyer and as a soldier and was constantly in search of occupation and patronage. As part of this search, his writing, which included courtly entertainments, plays, literary criticism, moral tracts, a hunting treatise, military reportage, and a brilliant work of prose fiction as well as many poems, won him considerable esteem. But the esteem was not unmixed—some of his work was criticized as obscene—and Gascoigne seems to have died, as he lived, in financial straits. In this grown-up lullaby, the aging Gascoigne sings farewell to his youth and sexual energy—or does he?

The Lullaby of a Lover

Sing lullaby, as women do,
Wherewith they bring their babes to rest,
And lullaby can I sing too,
As womanly as can the best.
5 With lullaby they still the child,
And if I be not much beguiled,o
Full many wantono babes have I,
Which must be stilled with lullaby.

First, lullaby my youthful years,
It is now time to go to bed,
10 For crooked age and hoary hairs
Have won the haveno within my head.
With lullaby then, youth, be still,
With lullaby content thy will,1 15 Since courage quails and comes behind,
Go sleep, and so beguile thy mind.

Next, lullaby my gazing eyes,
Which wonted wereo to glance apace:o
For every glasso may now suffice
20 To show the furrows in my face.
With lullaby then winko awhile,
With lullaby your looks beguile.
Let no fair face nor beauty bright
Entice you efto with vain delight.

And lullaby my wanton will,
25 Let reason's rule now rein thy thought,
Since all too late I find by skillo
How dear I have thy fancies bought.

30 With lullaby now take thine ease,
 With lullaby thy doubts appease.
 For trust to this, if thou be still,
 My body shall obey thy will.

35 Eke<sup>o</sup> lullaby my loving boy,
 My little Robin,<sup>o</sup> take thy rest.
 Since age is cold and nothing coy,<sup>o</sup>
 Keep close thy coin, for so is best.
 With lullaby be thou content,
 With lullaby thy lusts relent.<sup>o</sup>
 Let others pay which hath mo<sup>o</sup> pence;
 40 Thou art too poor for such expense.<sup>2</sup>

45 Thus lullaby, my youth, mine eyes,
 My will, my ware,<sup>o</sup> and all that was.
 I can no mo delays devise,
 But welcome pain, let pleasure pass.
 With lullaby now take your leave,
 With lullaby your dreams deceive,
 And when you<sup>3</sup> rise with waking eye,
 Remember then this lullaby.
Ever or never.

Michael Drayton The son of a Warwickshire butcher or tanner, Drayton (1563–1631) had a long and productive career as a professional writer. He collaborated on plays and wrote scriptural paraphrases, pastorals, satires, odes, poetic epistles, verse legends, and a historical epic. His masterpiece is Poly-Olbion, a 15,000-line historical-geographical poem celebrating all the counties of England and Wales. He contributed as well to the period's vogue for sonnets, publishing a sequence of fifty-one sonnets called Idea's Mirror (1594), which, following substantial revision, he republished as Idea. In this poem he takes malicious delight in what time will do to the woman who has rejected him.

There's Nothing Grieves Me, But That Age Should Haste

There's nothing grieves me, but that<sup>o</sup> age should haste,
That<sup>o</sup> in my days I may not see thee old;
That where those two clear, sparkling eyes are placed,
Only two loopholes then I might behold;
That lovely archèd, ivory, polished brow
5 Defaced with wrinkles that I might but see;
Thy dainty hair, so curled and crispèd now,
Like grizzled moss upon some agèd tree;
Thy cheek, now flush with roses, sunk and lean;
Thy lips, with age as any wafer thin;
10 Thy pearly teeth out of thy head so clean,<sup>o</sup>
That when thou feed'st, thy nose shall touch thy chin.
These lines that now thou scorn'st, which should delight thee,
Then would I make thee read, but to despite<sup>o</sup> thee.

Samuel Daniel A poet, playwright, historian, and translator, Daniel (1562/3–1619) was a member of the circle of Mary Sidney, Countess of Pembroke, and he later held various offices in the household of Anne of Denmark, James I's queen. He wrote tragedies, court masques, a historical epic, a prose history of England, a defense of rhyme, several fine verse epistles, a verse dialogue on the purpose of writing poetry, a popular "complaint" poem in which the ghost of a king's mistress laments her fate, and one of the best Elizabethan sonnet sequences, Delia. This poem imagines the aging of the woman who has rejected him. Will she feel pity then?

When Men Shall Find Thy Flower, Thy Glory, Pass

When men shall find thy flower, thy glory, pass,
And thou, with careful<sup>o</sup> brow sitting alone,
Receivèd hast this message from thy glass,<sup>o</sup>
That tells thee truth, and says that all is gone,
5 Fresh shalt thou see in me the wounds thou madest,
Though spent thy flame, in me the heat remaining:
I that have loved thee thus before thou fadest,
My faith shall wax,<sup>o</sup> when thou art in thy waning.
The world shall find this miracle in me,
10 That fire can burn when all the matter's spent;
Then, what my faith hath been thyself shall see,
And that thou wast unkind thou may'st repent.
Thou may'st repent that thou hast scorned my tears,
When winter snows upon thy golden hairs.

Anonymous Sir Henry Lee (1533–1611), Master of the Armory, served as the Queen's Champion, defending her honor against all comers, at annual tournaments or jousts, from 1559 to 1590. He retired, at the age of fifty-seven, in favor of the Earl of Cumberland. On that occasion this lyric was sung by Robert Hales, the queen's lutenist, on behalf of Lee. The authorship, sometimes ascribed to George Peele because the poem was first printed at the end of his Polyhymnia, is uncertain. It may be by Lee himself.

The Queen's Champion Retires

His golden locks time hath to silver turned;
O time too swift, O swiftness never ceasing!
His youth 'gainst time and age hath ever spurned,
But spurned in vain; youth waneth by increasing:<sup>1</sup>
Beauty, strength, youth are flowers but fading seen;
5 Duty, faith, love are roots, and ever green.

His helmet now shall make a hive for bees;
And lovers' sonnets turned to holy psalms;
A man-at-arms must now serve on his knees
And feed on prayers, which are age's alms:<sup>2</sup>
10 But though from court to cottage he depart,
His saint<sup>3</sup> is sure of his unspotted heart.

And when he saddest<sup>4</sup> sits in homely cell,<sup>o</sup>
He'll teach his swains this carol for a song:
"Blessed be the hearts that wish my sovereign well;
15 Cursed be the souls that think her any wrong."
Goddess,<sup>5</sup> allow this aged man his right
To be your beadsman<sup>6</sup> now, that was your knight.

Anonymous These lyrics are sometimes said to be by Thomas Morley (1557–1642), who published them in Airs (1600), along with a musical setting. They purportedly give the “cry” of a peddler selling goods for the female market—in particular, a “dog” with “a hole in his head”: a fillable dildo with an opening at its top.

CARPE DIEM

Thomas Lodge The London-born Lodge (1558–1625) was educated at Oxford, studied law, and eventually became a physician. He sailed in 1591 on a disastrous voyage to the New World, which he was fortunate to survive. In a career complicated by his lifelong Catholicism in a time of persecution, he tried his hand at writing poems, literary tracts, plays, translations, and prose fictions (one of which became the source of Shakespeare's As You Like It). This is one of several poems interspersed in Lodge's romance The Famous, True, and Historical Life of Robert, Second Duke of Normandy (1591).

Pluck the Fruit and Taste the Pleasure

Pluck the fruit and taste the pleasure,
Youthful lordings,<sup>o</sup> of delight,
Whilst occasion gives you seizure,<sup>1</sup>
Feed your fancies and your sight:
After death when you are gone,
5 Joy and pleasure is there none.

Here on earth no thing is stable,
Fortune's changes well are known,
Whilst as youth doth then enable,
Let your seeds of joy be sown:
10 After death when you are gone,
Joy and pleasure is there none.

Feast it freely with your lovers,
Blithe and wanton sweets do fade,
Whilst that lovely Cupid hovers
15 Round about this lovely shade:
Sport it freely one to one,
After death is pleasure none.

Now the pleasant spring allureth,
And both place and time invites:

DEATH

Fulke Greville The wealthy Fulke Greville, Lord Brooke (1554–1628), was educated at Cambridge, traveled widely on the Continent, served in Parliament, and was a successful courtier under Elizabeth I, James I, and Charles I. Never married, he wrote some conventional love poetry addressed to a woman he called Caelica, but his most passionate expressions of love were for his friend Sir Philip Sidney, whose death, in 1586, he never ceased to mourn. In addition to a number of powerful, brooding short poems, Greville wrote long philosophical verse treatises, several politically charged closet dramas, and a moving biography of Sidney. The end of Greville's life was grimly in keeping with his general pessimism: he was fatally stabbed by a longtime servant who then killed himself.

The verse is accompanied by images, also in brass, showing Emma Foxe, her seven sons and seven daughters.

Sir Walter Raleigh

Raleigh wrote The History of the World (1614) during his long years in the Tower awaiting execution. He began it with the Creation and ended it, here, with death. The work emphasized the providential punishment of evil princes and projected a treatment of English history—although not of recent events, because, he declared, he who follows truth too closely at the heels might get kicked in the teeth. The work was to have been dedicated to Henry, Prince of Wales, Raleigh's most powerful friend and supporter, who declared, "Only my father would keep such a bird in a cage." But Henry died in 1612, and the dispirited Raleigh broke off his narrative at 168 B.C.E. In this conclusion, Raleigh considers the tremendous leveling power of death.

From The History of the World

[CONCLUSION: ON DEATH]

It is * * * Death alone that can suddenly make man to know himself. He tells the proud and insolent that they are but abjects,<sup>1</sup> and humbles them at the instant; makes them cry, complain, and repent; yea, even to hate their forepassed<sup>2</sup> happiness. He takes the account<sup>3</sup> of the rich, and proves him a beggar, a naked beggar, which hath interest in nothing but in the gravel that fills his mouth. He holds a glass<sup>4</sup> before the eyes of the most beautiful, and makes them see therein their deformity and rottenness, and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, just, and mighty Death! Whom none could advise, thou hast persuaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised; thou hast drawn together all the far-stretched greatness, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with these two narrow words: Hic jacet!<sup>5</sup>

The Dance and Song of Death. This engraving, which shows skeletons dancing people of all ranks to their death, depicts a wide range of society: the king and the beggar; the old man and the child; the wise man and the fool. In the middle, Sickness sits over a grave on a chair of bones and plays the music. At the corners are (left) a miser and a prisoner and (right) a judge and a pair of lovers; they too are summoned to join the dance by prancing skeletons.

DRINK

William Stevenson/John Still This drinking song appears in the play Gammer Gurtons Needle, published in 1575 and first performed sometime between 1553 and 1562. It was put on at Cambridge and may have been written by William Stevenson (1530–1575), a clergyman, or John Still (1543–1608), master of St. John's and Trinity College, Cambridge, and bishop of Bath and Wells. The text is assumed to be about poverty, which is relieved and cheered by drink, but the song's topic also naturally fits its student environment.

Jolly Good Ale and Old

Back and side go bare, go bare,
Both foot and hand go cold.
But, belly, God send thee good ale enough,
Whether it be new or old.

5 I cannot eat but little meat,
My stomach is not good;
But sure I think that I can drink
With him that wears a hood.<sup>1</sup>
Though I go bare, take ye no care,<sup>o</sup>
I am nothing a-cold:
10 I stuffed my skin, so full within
Of jolly good ale and old.

Back and side go bare, go bare,
Both foot and hand go cold.
But, belly, God send thee good ale enough,
15 Whether it be new or old.

I love no roast, but a nut-brown toast
And a crab laid in the fire,<sup>2</sup>
A little bread shall do me stead,<sup>o</sup>
Much bread I not desire.
20 No frost nor snow, no wind I trow<sup>o</sup>
Can hurt me if I would,<sup>o</sup>
I am so wrapped, and thoroughly lapped
Of jolly good ale and old.

25 Back and side go bare, go bare,
Both foot and hand go cold.
But, belly, God send thee good ale enough,

Whether it be new or old.

And Tib, my wife, that as her life
Loveth well good ale to seek,
30 Full oft drinks she, till ye may see
The tears run down her cheeks.
Then doth she troll<sup>o</sup> to me the bowl
Even as a malt-worm<sup>3</sup> should,
And saith "sweetheart, I took my part
35 Of this jolly good ale and old."

Back and side go bare; go bare,
Both foot and hand go cold.
But, belly, God send thee good ale enough,
Whether it be new or old.

40
Now let them drink till they nod and wink,<sup>o</sup>
Even as good fellows<sup>o</sup> should do.
They shall not miss,<sup>o</sup> to have the bliss,
Good ale doth bring men to.
And all poor souls that have scoured<sup>o</sup> bowls
45 Or have them lustily<sup>o</sup> trolled,
God save the lives of them and their wives
Whether they be young or old.

Back and side go bare, go bare,
Both foot and hand go cold.
50 But, belly, God send thee good ale enough,
Whether it be new or old.

Thomas Dekker This verse is printed at the end of The Shoemaker's Holiday (1600), a play by Dekker (1572–1632), a man-about-town who apparently supported himself through writing. The “toast” drunk in the second and fourth stanza, which is to be repeated “as often as there are men to drink,” and the fact that the final stanza is preceded by the stage direction “when all have drunk, this verse” show this to be an action poem in which ale is consumed throughout the performance.

EXECUTION

Chidiock Tichborne Tichborne (1562–1586) was part of the Babington conspiracy to assassinate Queen Elizabeth and her chief ministers; release Mary, Queen of Scots, from her long captivity; and promote an uprising of English Catholics to coincide with a Spanish invasion. The detection of this plot by Walsingham, and the proof of Mary's complicity in it, finally cost the Scottish queen her life. Tichborne, one of six conspirators assigned to kill Elizabeth, pled guilty at his trial and was executed. His "Elegy" was published in a volume called Verses of Praise and Joy Written upon Her Majesty's Preservation; it was later set to music by three different composers.

My crop of corn<sup>o</sup> is but a field of tares,<sup>o</sup>
And all my good is but vain hope of gain;
The day is past, and yet I saw no sun,
5 And now I live, and now my life is done.

My tale was heard and yet it was not told,
My fruit is fallen and yet my leaves are green,
My youth is spent and yet I am not old,
I saw the world and yet I was not seen;
10 My thread is cut and yet it is not spun,
And now I live, and now my life is done.

I sought my death and found it in my womb,
I looked for life and saw it was a shade,<sup>o</sup>
I trod the earth and knew it was my tomb,
15 And now I die, and now I was but made;
My glass<sup>o</sup> is full, and now my glass is run,
And now I live, and now my life is done.

Sir Walter Raleigh Raleigh (1552–1618) called his son by his own name, Walter; writing to him was by extension writing about himself. Here he cautions the younger Walter (1593–1618), a wild “wag,” to avoid the gallows—a genuine concern, given that the poem’s author was himself executed. Raleigh embraced the manuscript circulation of his poems at court but actively opposed appearing as a poet in print—in one case he forced a printer to recall a volume and paste a slip of paper over his initials. That makes it difficult to put the copies that circulated in manuscript, often in commonplace books, in any reliably chronological order or to date them. This poem may date to around 1600, in which case it is addressed to a naughty child; it may date from later, in which case the “wag” is engaging in adult bad behavior.

Sir Walter Raleigh to His Son<sup>1</sup>

Three things there be that prosper up apace
And flourish, whilst they grow asunder far,
But on a day, they meet all in one place,
And when they meet, they one another mar;
And they be these: the wood, the weed,<sup>o</sup> the wag.
5 The wood is that which makes the gallow tree;
The weed is that which strings the hangman's bag;<sup>2</sup>
The wag, my pretty knave, betokeneth<sup>o</sup> thee.
Mark well, dear boy, whilst these assemble not,
Green springs the tree, hemp grows, the wag is wild,
10 But when they meet, it makes the timber rot,
It frets the halter,<sup>o</sup> and it chokes the child.
Then bless thee, and beware, and let us pray
We part not with thee at this meeting day.

ca. 1600

Sir Walter Raleigh Against orders, men under Raleigh's command in Guiana had attacked a Spanish outpost. His son Walter was killed in the attack, which proved fatal to Raleigh as well, since King James I was determined to repair the breach with Spain. Raleigh, who had had an earlier sentence of execution stayed, was resented. The seventeenth-century story, which may be true, was that Raleigh inscribed this poem in his Bible the night before he was beheaded. The epitaph, a version of the last stanza of his "Nature, That Washed Her Hands in Milk" (p. 502 in this volume), completes its brave acknowledgment of death with the trust—or hope—that Raleigh will be resurrected on Judgment Day.

The Author's Epitaph, Made by Himself

Even such is time, which takes in trust
Our youth, our joys, and all we have,
And pays us but with age and dust;
Who in the dark and silent grave,
When we have wandered all our ways,
5 Shuts up the story of our days:
And from which earth, and grave, and dust
The Lord shall raise me up, I trust.

FOREIGNERS

Anonymous The content of this “libel” (a defamatory writing put up in public) is recorded in a manuscript book (ca. 1599–1601) of letters, orations, and various other texts transcribed by John Mansell (1580–1631), a churchman, theologian, philosopher, and later president of Queens’ College, Cambridge. The libel itself is apparently about Protestant asylum seekers fleeing religious persecution in the Netherlands; records of the Privy Council attest that it was first hung up, in manuscript, in the churchyard of the so-called Dutch church where the refugees prayed. But Mansell mistitles the work “A libel fixed upon the French Church Wall in London,” showing how easy it was to confuse one despised people with another. Said to be in the hand of “Tamberlaine,” the name of the title character of two plays by Christopher Marlowe, the poem got Marlowe in trouble with the authorities, who saw him as one of the instigators of anti-alien riots in Southwark in 1593, of which this libel was a part. He is unlikely, though, to have “hidden” his authorship under so obvious a name. “Tamberlaine” probably indicates instead the character as depicted in Marlowe’s plays, who cruelly annihilated his enemies. Foreigners (“strangers”), often economic migrants from elsewhere in Europe, were crucial to English commercial expansion, but could be feared and hated. Here they are accused of buying goods and selling them at a higher price, producing better merchandise, being spies, causing rents to increase, having more than one trade, and pretending to be Protestants.

The Dutch Libel

Ye strangers<sup>o</sup> that do inhabit in this land,
Note this same writing; do it understand.
Conceit<sup>o</sup> it well—for safeguard<sup>o</sup> of your lives,
Your goods, your children and your dearest wives.
5 Your Machiavellian merchant spoils<sup>o</sup> the state,<sup>1</sup>
Your usury doth leave us all for dead,
Your artifex<sup>o</sup> and craftsman works our fate
And, like the Jews, you eat us up as bread.<sup>2</sup>
The merchant doth ingross<sup>o</sup> all kind of wares;
10 Forestalls the markets wheresoe'er he goes;<sup>3</sup>
Sends forth his wares by peddlers to the fairs;
Retails at home; and with his horrible shows
Undoeth thousands.

In baskets your wares trot up and down
15 Carried the streets by the country nation.<sup>4</sup>
You are intelligencers<sup>o</sup> to the state and crown
And in your hearts do wish an alteration.<sup>5</sup>
You transport goods, and bring us gauds<sup>o</sup> good store,
Our lead, our vittle, our ordinance and what not,<sup>6</sup>
That Egypt's plagues vexed not th'Egyptians more 20 Than you do us;<sup>7</sup> then death shall be your lot.
No prize<sup>o</sup> comes in but you make claim thereto,
And every merchant hath three trades at least,
And cutthroat-like in selling, you undo
Us all, and with our store continually you feast.
25 We cannot suffer long.

Our poor artificers<sup>o</sup> do starve and die

For that they cannot now be set on work.<sup>o</sup>
And for<sup>o</sup> your work, more curious<sup>o</sup> to the eye,
In chambers twenty in one house will lurk—
30 Raising of rents was never known before—
Living far better than at native home;
And our poor souls are clean thrust out of door
And to the wars are sent abroad to roam
To fight it out for France and Belgia
35 And die like dogs as sacrifice for you.<sup>8</sup>
Expect you therefore such a fatal day
Shortly on you and yours for to ensue
As never was seen.

Since words nor threats nor any other thing
40 Can make you to avoid this certain ill,
We'll cut your throats in your temples praying:
Not Paris massacre<sup>9</sup> so much blood did spill
As we will do just vengeance on you all
In counterfeiting religion for your flight,
45 When 'tis well known you are loath for to be thrall.<sup>o1</sup>
Your coin and you as countries cause to flight.<sup>2</sup>
With Spanish gold you all are infected<sup>3</sup>
And with that gold our nobles wink at feats.<sup>4</sup>
Nobles said I? Nay, men to be rejected:
50 Upstarts that enjoy the noblest seats,
That wound their country's breast for lucre's<sup>o</sup> sake,
And wrong our gracious queen and subjects good
By letting strangers make our hearts to ache,<sup>5</sup>
For which our swords are whet to shed their blood.
55 And, for a truth, let it be understood:
Fly,<sup>o</sup> fly and never return.

Per.<sup>o</sup> Tamberlaine

William Shakespeare This is a speech from the manuscript play of Sir Thomas More (ca. 1591–93), which is written in five anonymous hands: A, B, C, D, and E. Hand D, and the author of this speech, is thought to be Shakespeare. This section of the play depicts a riot against foreigners that occurred in London on May 1, 1517, a day that came to be called “Evil May Day.” As it is clearly also a reference to the more recent anti-immigrant unrest in the 1590s (see headnote to “The Dutch Libel”), the text was thought incendiary and was censored; the Master of the Revels, Sir Edmund Tilney, declared that the play should be altered to “leave out the insurrection wholly and the cause thereof.” There is no proof that the play ever made it to the stage. In this speech, More pleads with the rioters for tolerance and asks them to consider how they would feel if they themselves were immigrants.

From Sir Thomas More

Grant them<sup>1</sup> removed, and grant that this your noise
Hath chid down<sup>o</sup> all the majesty of England.
Imagine that you see the wretched strangers,
Their babies at their backs and their poor luggage,
Plodding to th'ports and coasts for transportation,
5 And that you sit as kings in your desires,
Authority quite silenced by your brawl,
And you in ruff of your opinions clothed;<sup>2</sup>
What had you got? I'll tell you. You had taught
How insolence and strong hand should prevail;
10 How order should be quelled; and by this pattern
Not one of you should live an agèd man,
For other ruffians, as their fancies wrought,
With selfsame hand, self-reasons, and self-right,
Would shark<sup>o</sup> on you, and men like ravenous fishes
15 Would feed on one another.
You'll put down<sup>o</sup> strangers,
Kill them, cut their throats, possess their houses,
And lead the majesty of law in lyam,<sup>o</sup>
To slip him like a hound.<sup>3</sup> Say now the king
20 (As he is clement<sup>o</sup> if th'offender mourn)
Should so much come too short of your great trespass
As but to banish you,<sup>4</sup> whither would you go?
What country, by the nature of your error,
Should give you harbor? Go you to France or 25 Flanders,
To any German province, to Spain or Portugal,
Nay, anywhere that not adheres to England,

Why, you must needs be strangers. Would you be pleased
To find a nation of such barbarous temper
That, breaking out in hideous violence,
30 Would not afford you an abode on earth;
Whet their detested knives against your throats;
Spurn you like dogs and, like as if that God Owed<sup>o</sup> not nor made not you, nor that the claimants<sup>o</sup>
35 Were not all appropriate to your comforts
But chartered unto<sup>o</sup> them? What would you think
To be thus used? This is the strangers' case,<sup>o</sup>
And this your mountainish inhumanity.

IMAGINATION

Fulke Greville The hundredth sonnet from Caelica (1633), this poem considers the frightening visions that the “inward” eye reveals in the dark.

In Night When Colors All to Black Are Cast

In night when colors all to black are cast,
Distinction lost, or gone down with the light,
The eye a watch to inward senses placed,
Not seeing, yet still having power of sight,
Gives vain alarums to the inward sense,
5 Where fear stirred up with witty tyranny<sup>o</sup>
Confounds all powers and thorough self-offense<sup>o</sup>
Doth forge and raise impossibility:
Such as in thick depriving darknesses
Proper reflections of the error be,
10 And images of self-confusednesses,
Which hurt imaginations only see;
And from this nothing seen tells news of devils,
Which but expressions be of inward evils.

Michael Drayton From the sonnet cycle Ideas Mirror (1594), this poem compares the “things” (women) who will be forgotten with one who will survive—because Drayton has preserved her in verse.

How Many Paltry, Foolish, Painted Things

How many paltry, foolish, painted things,
That now in coaches trouble every street,
Shall be forgotten, whom no poet sings,
Ere they be well wrapped in their winding sheet?°
Where° I to thee eternity shall give,
5 When nothing else remaineth of these days;
And queens hereafter shall be glad to live
Upon the alms of thy superfluous praise.
Virgins and matrons, reading these my rhymes,
Shall be so much delighted with thy story
10 That they shall grieve they lived not in these times,
To have seen thee, their sex's only glory:
So shalt thou fly above the vulgar° throng,
Still to survive in my immortal song.

LYING

Sir Walter Raleigh This poem circulated anonymously and in manuscript—but a series of “answer poems,” often angry about it, reveal that the text was popularly understood to be by Raleigh. In this relentless, frantic poem, the author “gives the lie to” (accuses of lying—a phrase typically used when challenging someone to a duel) institutions such as the church and the court, types of people held in high esteem, and a manic list of intangibles, from wit to aging.

The Lie

Go, soul, the body's guest,
Upon a thankless errand;
Fear not to touch<sup>o</sup> the best;
The truth shall be thy warrant.
5 Go, since I needs must die,
And give the world the lie.<sup>1</sup>

Say to the court, it glows
And shines like rotten wood;<sup>o</sup>
Say to the church, it shows
What's good, and doth no good.
10 If church and court reply,
Then give them both the lie.

Tell potentates they live
Acting by others' action;
Not loved unless they give,
15 Not strong but by a faction.
If potentates reply,
Give potentates the lie.

Tell men of high condition,
That manage the estate,<sup>o</sup>
20 Their purpose is ambition,
Their practice only hate.
And if they once reply,
Then give them all the lie.
Tell them that brave it<sup>o</sup> most,
25 They beg for more by spending,
Who, in their greatest cost,
Seek nothing but commending.<sup>o</sup>

30 And if they make reply,
Then give them all the lie.

Tell zeal it wants<sup>o</sup> devotion;
Tell love it is but lust;
Tell time it is but motion;
Tell flesh it is but dust.
35 And wish them not reply,
For thou must give the lie.

Tell age it daily wasteth;<sup>o</sup>
Tell honor how it alters;
Tell beauty how she blasteth;<sup>o</sup>
Tell favor how it falters.
40 And as they shall reply,
Give every one the lie.

Tell wit<sup>o</sup> how much it wrangles
In tickle points of niceness;<sup>o</sup>
Tell wisdom she entangles
45 Herself in overwiseness.
And when they do reply,
Straight give them both the lie.

Tell physic<sup>o</sup> of her boldness;<sup>o</sup>
Tell skill it is pretension;
50 Tell charity of coldness;
Tell law it is contention.
And as they do reply,
So give them still the lie.

Tell fortune of her blindness;
55 Tell nature of decay;
Tell friendship of unkindness;
Tell justice of delay.
And if they will reply,

60           Then give them all the lie.
           Tell arts<sup>2</sup> they have no soundness,
           But vary by esteeming;<sup>3</sup>
           Tell schools<sup>4</sup> they want profoundness,
           And stand too much on seeming.
 65           If arts and schools reply,
           Give arts and schools the lie.
           Tell faith<sup>o</sup> it's fled the city;
           Tell how the country erreth;
           Tell manhood shakes off pity;
 70           Tell virtue least preferreth.<sup>o</sup>
           And if they do reply,
           Spare not to give the lie.
           So when thou hast, as I
           Commanded thee, done blabbing,<sup>o</sup>
 75           Although to give the lie
           Deserves no less than stabbing,
           Stab at thee he that will,
           No stab thy soul can kill.

LOVE: HAPPY

John Davies of Hereford Always associated in print with his birthplace in the historic Welsh Marches, an area on the border between England and Wales, in order to avoid confusion with a contemporary poet of the same name, John Davies of Hereford (1564/5–1618) moved to London to work as a writing master, tutoring members of the nobility in penmanship. At the same time, he produced scores of poems, including religious and moral treatises, love sonnets, satires, eclogues, and his best-known work, a collection of epigrams (short, pointed poems), many of them addressed to the era's most prominent writers.

If There Were (Oh!) an Hellespont of Cream

The author loving these homely meats specially, viz., cream, pancakes, buttered pippin pies<sup>1</sup> (laugh, good people), and tobacco, writ to that worthy and virtuous gentlewoman whom he calleth mistress, as followeth:

If there were (oh!) an Hellespont<sup>2</sup> of cream
Between us, milk-white mistress, I would swim
To you, to show to both my love's extreme,
Leander-like<sup>3</sup>—yea, dive from brim to brim.
But met I with a buttered pippin pie
5 Floating upon't, that would I make my boat,
To waft me to you without jeopardy,
Though seasick I might be while it did float.
Yet if a storm should rise, by night or day,
Of sugar snows and hail of caraways,<sup>4</sup>
10 Then, if I found a pancake in my way,<sup>5</sup>
It, like a plank, should bring me to your quays:<sup>6</sup>
Which having found, if they tobacco kept,
The smoke should dry me well, before I slept.

Thomas Campion After three years at Cambridge, Campion (1567–1620) studied law before finally settling on medicine. A composer, a writer of court masques, and a poet, he wrote his first poetic compositions in Latin, and he remained interested in the possibility of applying the classical principles of quantitative versification to English. His most memorable achievements arose from the fact that he was both poet and composer: his aim, he wrote, was “to couple my words and notes lovingly together.” This poem and the two lyrics that follow appeared, with musical settings, in A Book of Airs, which contains Campion’s first work as a composer. This piece is imitated and partly translated from a poem by Catullus (87–ca. 54 B.C.E.), the Latin lyric poet who often celebrated the charms of an unidentified married woman he called Lesbia.

My Sweetest Lesbia

My sweetest Lesbia, let us live and love,
And though the sager sort our deeds reprove,
Let us not weigh<sup>o</sup> them: heav'n's great lamps do dive
Into their west, and straight<sup>o</sup> again revive,
But soon as once set is our little light,
5 Then must we sleep one ever-during<sup>o</sup> night.

If all would lead their lives in love like me,
Then bloody swords and armor should not be;
No drum nor trumpet peaceful sleeps should move,<sup>o</sup>
Unless alarm<sup>o</sup> came from the camp of love.
10 But fools do live, and waste their little light,
And seek with pain their ever-during night.

When timely death my life and fortune ends,
Let not my hearse<sup>o</sup> be vexed with mourning friends,
But let all lovers, rich in triumph, come 15 And with sweet pastimes grace my happy tomb;
And Lesbia, close up thou my little light,
And crown with love my ever-during night.

Thomas Campion Published in A Book of Airs (1601), Campion's song about women and class compares the demands of court "ladies" with the availability of the country maid Amaryllis.

I Care Not for These Ladies

I care not for these ladies
That must be wooed and prayed;
Give me kind Amaryllis,<sup>1</sup>
The wanton country<sup>2</sup> maid.
Nature art<sup>o</sup> disdaineth;

    She never will say no.
10
If I love Amaryllis,
She gives me fruit and flowers;
But if we love these ladies,
We must give golden showers.
Give them gold that sell love,
15 Give me the nut-brown<sup>o</sup> lass
    Who when we court and kiss,
    She cries "Forsooth, let go!"
    But when we come where comfort is,
    She never will say no.
20
These ladies must have pillows,
And beds by strangers wrought.<sup>o</sup>
Give me a bower of willows,
Of moss and leaves unbought,
And fresh Amaryllis,
25 With milk and honey fed,
    Who when we court and kiss,
    She cries "Forsooth, let go!"
    But when we come where comfort is,

Thomas Campion Love, in this song from Campion's Third and Fourth Book of Aires (1617), is presented as a way of passing the long winter nights.

Now Winter Nights Enlarge

Now winter nights enlarge
The number of their hours,
And clouds their storms discharge
Upon the airy towers.
Let now the chimneys blaze
5 And cups o'erflow with wine,
Let well-tuned words amaze
With harmony divine.
Now yellow waxen lights
Shall wait on honey Love,
10 While youthful revels, masques,<sup>o</sup> and courtly sights
Sleep's leaden spells remove.

This time doth well dispense
With<sup>1</sup> lovers' long discourse;
Much speech hath some defense,
15 Though beauty no remorse.
All do not all things well:
Some measures<sup>2</sup> comely<sup>o</sup> tread,
Some knotted riddles tell,
Some poems smoothly read.
20 The Summer hath his joys,
And Winter his delights;
Though Love and all his pleasures are but toys,<sup>o</sup>
They shorten tedious nights.

Richard Barnfield

Barnfield (1574–1620) was sometimes thought to have been the “rival poet” of Shakespeare’s sonnets. His first work, The Affectionate Shepherd (1594), a pastoral account of “the love of a shepherd to a boy,” was criticized for its homoeroticism. As these later sonnets show, gay love remained a focus of much of his writing.

Sonnet 9

Diana (on a time) walking the wood
To sport herself, of her fair train forlorn,<sup>2</sup>
Chanced for to prick her foot against a thorn,
And from thence issued out a stream of blood.
No sooner she was vanished out of sight,
5 But love's fair queen<sup>o</sup> came there away by chance,
And having of this hap<sup>o</sup> a glimm'ring glance,
She put the blood into a crystal<sup>o</sup> bright.
When being now come unto Mount Rhodope,<sup>3</sup>
10 With her fair hands she forms a shape of snow,
And blends it with this blood; from whence doth grow
A lovely creature, brighter than the day.
And being christened in fair Paphos'<sup>4</sup> shrine,
She called him Ganymede,<sup>5</sup> as all divine.

Sonnet 11

Sighing, and sadly sitting by my love,
He asked the cause of my heart's sorrowing,
Conjuring me by heaven's eternal king
To tell the cause which me so much did move.
Compelled (quoth I), to thee will I confess 5 Love is the cause, and only love it is
That doth deprive me of my heavenly bliss;
Love is the pain that doth my heart oppress.
And what is she (quoth he) whom thou dost love?
Look in this glass<sup>o</sup> (quoth I), there shalt thou see

10           The perfect form of my felicity.
When, thinking that it would strange magic prove,<sup>o</sup>
He opened it: and taking off the cover,
He straight perceived himself to be my lover.

LOVE: UNHAPPY

Michael Drayton

From Ideas Mirror, a sequence that Drayton began writing in 1594, this poem puns throughout on the homonyms aye (yes) and I. Especially in the sonnet's final couplet, a nearly limitless number of interpretations can be produced by varying the punctuation—including the quotation marks, all of which are editorial—and letting the mind play freely with the homonyms.

Nothing but "No" and "I" and "I" and "No"?

Nothing but "No" and "I" and "I" and "No"?
How falls it out<sup>o</sup> so strangely you reply?
I tell ye (fair), I'll not be answered so,
With this affirming "No," denying "I."
5 I say, "I love"; you slightly<sup>o</sup> answer, "I."
I say, "You love"; you pule me out<sup>1</sup> a "No."
I say, "I die"; you echo me with "I."
"Save me," I cry; you sigh me out a "No."
Must Woe and I have nought but "No" and "I"?
No I am I, if I no more can have.
10 Answer no more: with silence make reply,
And let me take myself what I do crave.
Let "No" and "I" with I and you be so,
Then answer "No" and "I" and "I" and "No."

George Gascoigne This poem appears at the end of Gascoigne's evidently autobiographical novella, The Adventures of Master F. J. (1573), which mixes prose and verse; it is occasioned by a conversation between F. J. and his mistress, the wife of his host in Italy. F. J. accuses her of betraying him with her male secretary, "and she . . . denied it, until at last being still urged with such evident tokens [that is, clear proofs] as he alleged, she gave him this bone to gnaw upon: And if I did so (quoth she), what then? Whereunto F. J. made none answer, but departed. . . . And when he was in place solitary, he compiled these following [verses], for a final end of the matter."

And If I Did, What Then?

"And if I did, what then?
Are you aggrieved therefore?
The sea hath fish for every man,
And what would you have more?"

5 Thus did my mistress once
Amaze<sub>o</sub> my mind with doubt,
And popped a question, for the nonce,<sub>o</sub>
To beat my brains about.

10 Whereto I thus replied,
"Each fisherman can wish
That all the sea at every tide
Were his alone to fish.

15 "And so did I (in vain);
But since it may not be,
Let such<sub>o</sub> fish there as find the gain,
And leave the loss for me.

20 "And with such luck and loss,
I will content myself,
Till tides of turning time may toss
Such fishers on the shelf.<sub>o</sub>

"And when they stick on sands,
That every man may see,
Then will I laugh and clap my hands,
As they do now at me."

As in Some Countries Far Remote from Hence

As in some countries far remote from hence,
The wretched creature destinèd to die,
Having the judgment due to his offense,
By surgeons begg'd their art<sup>o</sup> on him to try,
Which<sup>o</sup> on the living work without remorse,
5 First make incision on each mast'ring vein,<sup>o</sup>

And with their balms recure<sup>o</sup> the wounds again,
Then poison, and with physic<sup>o</sup> him restore,
Not that they fear the hopeless man to kill,
10 But their experience to increase the more:
Ev'n so my mistress works upon my ill,<sup>o</sup>
By curing me and killing me each hour
Only to show her beauty's sov'reign power.

Sir Walter Raleigh A series of “vicious bitter” descriptions of “false” love, this poem was set to music by William Byrd in Psalms, Sonnets and Songs (1588): as ever, what is a poem and what a song, who is author and who is composer, is hard to disentangle.

Farewell, False Love

Farewell, false love, the oracle<sup>o</sup> of lies,
A mortal foe and enemy to rest;
An envious boy, from whom all cares arise,
A bastard vile, a beast with rage possessed;
5 A way of error, a temple full of treason,
In all effects contrary unto reason.

A poisoned serpent covered all with flowers,
Mother of sighs and murtherer<sup>o</sup> of repose,
A sea of sorrows from whence are drawn such showers
10 As moisture lends to every grief that grows;
A school of guile, a net of deep deceit,
A gilded hook that holds a poisoned bait.

A fortress foiled<sup>o</sup> which reason did defend,
A siren song, a fever of the mind,
15 A maze wherein affection finds no end,
A raging cloud that runs before the wind,
A substance like the shadow of the sun,
A goal of grief for which the wisest run.

A quenchless fire, a nurse of trembling fear,
20 A path that leads to peril and mishap;
A true retreat of sorrow and despair,
An idle boy that sleeps in pleasure's lap,
A deep distrust of that which certain seems,
A hope of that which reason doubtful deems.

25 Sith<sup>o</sup> then thy trains<sup>o</sup> my younger years betrayed,
And for my faith<sup>o</sup> ingratitude I find,
And sith repentance hath my wrongs bewrayed<sup>o</sup>

Whose course was ever contrary to kind<sup>o</sup>—
False love, desire, and beauty frail, adieu!
Dead is the root whence all these fancies grew.

The Marriage Balance. Love or worth? Cupid and a man are set on one side of the balance; money and a woman, probably a widow—she wears black—are set on the other. They are not equally balanced, and money appears to win out over love. Marriages were often strategic in the period, hence the many texts about unattainable love.

PASTORAL LOVE

Christopher Marlowe This pastoral lyric of invitation is one of the most famous Elizabethan songs. First published in The Passionate Pilgrim (1599), a book of poems attributed to Shakespeare, its author has long been recognized as Marlowe. The poem exists in several different manuscript and print forms and media (including as a single-sheet ballad text). Many poets have written replies to it; the best known of them, by Sir Walter Raleigh, follows.

The Passionate Shepherd to His Love

Come live with me and be my love,
And we will all the pleasures prove<sup>o</sup>
That valleys, groves, hills, and fields,
Woods, or steepy mountain yields.

5 And we will sit upon the rocks,
Seeing the shepherds feed their flocks,
By shallow rivers to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.

10 And I will make thee beds of roses
And a thousand fragrant posies,<sup>o</sup>
A cap of flowers, and a kirtle<sup>o</sup>
Embroidered all with leaves of myrtle;

15 A gown made of the finest wool
Which from our pretty lambs we pull;
Fair lined slippers for the cold,
With buckles of the purest gold;

20 A belt of straw and ivy buds,
With coral clasps and amber studs:
And if these pleasures may thee move,
Come live with me, and be my love.

The shepherd swains shall dance and sing
For thy delight each May morning:
If these delights thy mind may move,
Then live with me and be my love.

Sir Walter Raleigh

The “nymph’s reply” is an answer to the preceding poem.

The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd

If all the world and love were young,
And truth in every shepherd's tongue,
These pretty pleasures might me move
To live with thee and be thy love.

5 Time drives the flocks from field to fold
When rivers rage and rocks grow cold,
And Philomel<sup>o</sup> becometh dumb;
The rest complains of cares to come.

10 The flowers do fade, and wanton fields
To wayward winter reckoning yields;<sup>o</sup>
A honey tongue, a heart of gall,
Is fancy's spring, but sorrow's fall.

15 Thy gowns, thy shoes, thy beds of roses,
Thy cap, thy kirtle,<sup>o</sup> and thy posies<sup>o</sup>
Soon break, soon wither, soon forgotten—
In folly ripe, in reason rotten.

20 Thy belt of straw and ivy buds,
Thy coral clasps and amber studs,
All these in me no means can move
To come to thee and be thy love.

But could youth last and love still breed,
Had joys no date<sup>o</sup> nor age no need,
Then these delights my mind might move
To live with thee and be thy love.

PLAGUE

Thomas Nashe This poem is from the play A Pleasant Comedy Called Summer's Last Will and Testament, acted before the archbishop of Canterbury in his palace at Croydon in 1592 and published in 1600. Composed during an outbreak of the bubonic plague, "A Litany" is a contemplation about death from the perspective of a plague sufferer ("Lord have mercy on us" was written on the door of plague-ridden households). Literally, a litany is a form of public prayer in which each of a series of supplications by the clergy is followed by a response from the congregation, with the same formula of response being repeated several times.

A Litany in Time of Plague

Adieu, farewell, earth's bliss,
This world uncertain is;
Fond<sup>o</sup> are life's lustful<sup>o</sup> joys,
Death proves them all but toys,<sup>o</sup>
5 None from his darts<sup>o</sup> can fly;
I am sick, I must die.
Lord, have mercy on us!

Rich men, trust not in wealth,
Gold cannot buy you health;
10 Physic himself<sup>o</sup> must fade,
All things to end are made.
The plague full swift goes by;
I am sick, I must die.
Lord, have mercy on us!

Beauty is but a flower
15 Which wrinkles will devour;
Brightness falls from the air,
Queens have died young and fair,
Dust hath closed Helen's<sup>o</sup> eye.
I am sick, I must die.
20 Lord, have mercy on us!

Strength stoops unto the grave,
Worms feed on Hector<sup>1</sup> brave;
Swords may not fight with fate,
Earth still holds ope her gate.
25 "Come, come!" the bells<sup>2</sup> do cry.
I am sick, I must die.
Lord, have mercy on us!

30 Wit with his wantonness
 Tasteth death's bitterness;
 Hell's executioner
 Hath no ears for to hear
 What vain art<sup>o</sup> can reply.
 I am sick, I must die.
 Lord, have mercy on us!
 35
 Haste, therefore, each degree,<sup>o</sup>
 To welcome destiny;
 Heaven is our heritage,
 Earth but a player's stage;
 Mount we unto the sky.
 40 I am sick, I must die.
 Lord, have mercy on us!

John Davies of Hereford The following extract is from Davies' long poem The Triumph of Death, published in 1609. It is about the 1603 outbreak of plague, which killed one in five Londoners.

From The Triumph of Death

* * *

At London, sink of sin, as at the fount,<sup>o</sup>
This all-confounding pestilence began,
According to that plague's most woeful wont,<sup>o</sup>
From whence it, flowing, all the realm o'erran.

5 Which to prevent, at first, they pesterèd
Pesthouses<sup>1</sup> with their murrain-tainted<sup>o</sup> sick,
But though from them, and thence,<sup>o</sup> the healthy fled,
They, ere suspected, mortified<sup>o</sup> the quick.<sup>o</sup>

10 Those so infected, being ignorant
That so they are, converse with whomsoe'er
Whose open shops and houses all do haunt,<sup>2</sup>
And find most danger where they least do fear.

15 And so not knowing sick folk from the sound
(For such ill air's not subject to the sense)
They one with other do themselves confound,<sup>3</sup>
And so confound all with a pestilence.

* * *

20 The king himself—O wretched times the while!—
From place to place to save himself did fly;<sup>4</sup>
Which from himself himself did seek t'exile,
Who (as amaz'd) not safe knew where to lie.<sup>5</sup>
It's hard with subjects when the sovereign

Hath no place free from plagues his head to hide;
And hardly can we say the King doth reign
That nowhere for just fear can well abide.

25 For nowhere comes he but death follows him
Hard at the heels, and reacheth at his head;
So sinks all sports<sup>o</sup> that would like triumphs swim,
For what life have we when we all are dead:

30 Dead in our spirits, to see our neighbors die;
To see our king so shift his life to save;
And with his council all conclusions try<sup>6</sup>
To keep themselves from th'insatiate<sup>o</sup> grave.

35 For hardly could one man another meet,
That in his bosom brought not odious death;
It was confusion but a friend to greet.<sup>o</sup>
For, like a fiend, he banèd<sup>o</sup> with his breath.

40 The wildest wastes, and places most remote
From man's repair<sup>o</sup> are now the most secure;
Happy is he that there doth find a cote<sup>o</sup>
To shroud his head from this plague's smoking shower.

A beggar's home, though dwelling in a ditch,
If far from London it were situate,
He might rent out, if pleased him, to the rich,
That now as Hell their London homes do hate.

SIMPLE LIFE

Thomas Campion This piece praises, in idealized form, the realities of English rustic life—a contrast to the pastoral poetry of so much of this volume. It appears, with its music, in Campion's Two Books of Aires (1613).

Jack and Joan, They Think No Ill

Jack and Joan, they think no ill,
But loving live, and merry still;<sup>o</sup>
Do their weekdays' work, and pray
Devotely<sup>o</sup> on the holyday;
Skip and trip it<sup>o</sup> on the green,
5 And help to choose the summer queen;
Lash out,<sup>o</sup> at a country feast,
Their silver penny with the best.

Well can they judge of nappy<sup>o</sup> ale,
And tell at large a winter tale;<sup>1</sup>
10 Climb up to the apple loft,
And turn the crabs<sup>o</sup> till they be soft.
Tib<sup>2</sup> is all the father's joy,
And little Tom the mother's boy.
All their pleasure is content;
15 And care, to pay their yearly rent.<sup>3</sup>

Joan can call by name her cows,
And deck her windows with green boughs;
She can wreaths and tutties<sup>o</sup> make,
And trim with plums a bridal cake.
20 Jack knows what brings gain or loss,
And his long flail<sup>4</sup> can stoutly toss;
Makes the hedge, which others<sup>5</sup> break,
And ever thinks what he doth speak.<sup>6</sup>

Now you courtly dames and knights,
25 That study only strange<sup>7</sup> delights,
Though you scorn the homespun gray,

And revel in your rich array;
 Though your tongues dissemble deep,
 And can your heads from danger keep;
 Yet, for all your pomp and train,<sup>8</sup>
 Securer lives the silly<sup>o</sup> swain.

TIME

Robert Greene Greene (1558–1592) was a popular writer of prose and romantic comedies for the stage. Probably the first professional author, he was known for his vicious critiques of colleagues, including Shakespeare. The many stories told of and by him—that he abandoned his wife and son; had another son by a mistress who was sister to a famous criminal, whom he called “Infortunatus”; and died of a “surfeit of pickle herring and Rhenish wine”—have led to speculation that he might have been the model for Shakespeare’s Falstaff. This verse is sung to a lute by a woman, Doralicia, in one of his prose works, Arbusto: The Anatomy of Fortune (1584). It argues that everything can change in time, including one’s affections.

Doralicia's Ditty

In time we see that silver drops
The craggy stones make soft;
The slowest snail in time we see,
Doth creep and clime aloft.

5      With feeble puffs the tallest pine
In tract of time doth fall;
The hardest heart in time doth yield
To Venus' luring call.

10     Where chilling frost a-late did nip
There flasheth now a fire;
Where deep disdain bred noisome<sup>o</sup> hate
There kindleth now desire.

15     Time causeth hope to have his hap;<sup>o</sup>
What care in time not eased?
In time I loathed that now I love,
In both content and pleased.

John Dowland Set to music by Dowland (1563–1626) in his Book of Songs or Aires (1603), this lyric is likely to be by its composer. Musicians are interested in time from a practical perspective—but this poem, about working hard but being rejected at court, seems particularly personal. An “obstinate Papist,” as Queen Elizabeth called him, Dowland was, throughout his life, ill-treated for reasons of his faith. He left England to seek employment in a more forgiving country, becoming court lutenist, singer, and composer for Christian IV of Denmark; when he returned, he was taken into the court of James I. Yet Dowland never seems to have stopped feeling like an outsider, and his melancholy verses and music apparently mirror his frustration.

It Was a Time When Silly Bees Could Speak

It was a time when silly<sup>o</sup> bees could speak,
And in that time I was a silly bee
Who fed on time until my heart gan<sup>o</sup> break,
Yet never found the time would favor me.
5 Of all the swarm I only did not thrive,
Yet brought I wax and honey to the hive.

Then thus I buzzed when time no sap would give,
"Why should this blessed time to me be dry,
Sith by this time the lazy drone<sup>o</sup> doth live,
10 The wasp, the worm, the gnat, the butterfly?"
Mated<sup>o</sup> with grief, I kneelèd on my knees,
And thus complained unto the king of bees:

"My liege, gods grant thy time may never end,
And yet vouchsafe<sup>o</sup> to hear my plaint<sup>o</sup> of time,
Which fruitless flies have found to have a friend,<sup>o</sup>
15 And I cast down when atomies<sup>o</sup> do clime."
The king replied but thus, "peace, peevish<sup>o</sup> bee, Th'art bound to serve the time, the time not thee."

Sir Walter Raleigh This poem is divided into halves: three stanzas are on Nature's creation of the visually perfect (but hard-hearted) woman; three stanzas are on Time and how it destroys her. Raleigh adapted the final stanza when writing his own epitaph on the night before his execution (see p. 479).

Nature, That Washed Her Hands in Milk

5 Nature, that washed her hands in milk,
And had forgot to dry them,
Instead of earth took snow and silk,
At Love's request to try them,
If she a mistress could compose
To please Love's fancy out of those.

10 Her eyes he would should be of light,
A violet breath, and lips of jelly;
Her hair not black, nor overbright,
And of the softest down her belly;
As for her inside he'd have it
Only of wantonness<sup>o</sup> and wit.

15 At Love's entreaty such a one
Nature made, but with her beauty
She hath framed a heart of stone;
So as Love, by ill destiny,
Must die for her whom Nature gave him,
Because her darling would not save him.

20 But Time (which Nature doth despise,
And rudely gives her love the lie,
Makes Hope a fool, and Sorrow wise)
His hands do neither wash nor dry;
But being made of steel and rust,
Turns snow and silk and milk to dust.

25 The light, the belly, lips, and breath,
He dims, discolors, and destroys;
With those he feeds but fills not death,

Which sometimes were the food of joys.
Yea, Time doth dull each lively wit,
And dries all wantonness with it.

30

Oh, cruel Time! which takes in trust
Our youth, our joys, and all we have,
And pays us but with age and dust;
Who in the dark and silent grave
When we have wandered all our ways
Shuts up the story of our days.

William Shakespeare The narrative poem The Rape of Lucrece (1594) is about an aristocratic Roman woman who was raped by the heir to the throne, Tarquin, and subsequently committed suicide. The revolt against the Tarquin family, led by Lucrece's husband and family, led to the founding of the Roman Republic (traditionally dated to 509 B.C.E.). In this excerpt, the violated Lucrece considers how our destinies are shaped by time. Time solves problems, but often by obliterating them entirely.

From The Rape of Lucrece

* * *

Time's glory is to calm contending kings,
To unmask falsehood and bring truth to light,
940 To stamp the seal of time in agèd things,
To wake the morn and sentinel<sup>o</sup> the night,
To wrong the wronger till he render right,
To ruinate proud buildings with thy hours,
945 And smear with dust their glittering golden towers;

To fill with wormholes stately monuments,
To feed oblivion with decay of things,
To blot old books and alter their contents,
To pluck the quills from ancient ravens' wings,
950 To dry the old oak's sap and cherish springs,
To spoil antiquities of hammered steel,
And turn the giddy round of Fortune's wheel;

To show the beldam<sup>o</sup> daughters of her daughter,
To make the child a man, the man a child,
955 To slay the tiger that doth live by slaughter,
To tame the unicorn and lion wild,
To mock the subtle in themselves beguiled,<sup>1</sup>
To cheer the ploughman with increaseful crops,
And waste<sup>o</sup> huge stones with little water drops.

TOBACCO

Robert Wisdome Wisdome (d. 1568) was a Protestant preacher, exiled under Mary Tudor but, under Elizabeth I, made archdeacon of Ely. His published verse is religious, but this poem, preserved in manuscript and not possible to date, shows his interest in worldly pleasures. A reworked version, "Tobacco's but an Indian weed," sometimes attributed to George Wither, was sung as a ballad and made its way to Virginia with the early settlers.

A Religious Use of Taking Tobacco

The Indian<sup>o</sup> weed witherèd quite—
Green at morn, cut down at night—
Shows thy decay; all flesh is hay:
Thus think, then drink<sup>o</sup> tobacco.<sup>1</sup>

5 And when the smoke ascends on high,
Think thou behold'st the vanity
Of worldly stuff, gone with a puff:
Thus think, then drink tobacco.

10 The ashes that are left behind
May serve to put thee still in mind
That unto dust return thou must:
Thus think, then drink tobacco.

Tobias Hume This poem appears in The First Part of Aires, French, Polish, and Others (1605), by Hume (ca. 1579–1645), a Scottish composer and mercenary who served as officer with both the Swedish and the Russian armies. He was known for his lighthearted rhymes and musical pranks: here, for example, he argues that tobacco and love are alike.

Tobacco

Tobacco, tobacco,
Sing sweetly for tobacco,
Tobacco is like love,
O love it,
For you see I will prove it.
5

Love maketh lean the fat men's tumor,<sup>o</sup>
So doth tobacco;
Love still dries up the wanton<sup>o</sup> humor,
So doth tobacco;
Love makes men sail from shore to shore,
10 So doth tobacco;
'Tis fond<sup>o</sup> love often makes men poor.
So doth tobacco;
Love makes men scorn all coward fears,
So doth tobacco;
15 Love often sets men by the ears,<sup>o</sup>
So doth tobacco.

Tobacco, tobacco,
Sing sweetly for tobacco.
Tobacco is like love,
20 O love it,
For you see I have proved it.

This commonplace book held in the Beinecke Rare Books Library, Yale University, shows a text that descends from Wisdome's poem about tobacco. In this new form, it is often attributed to George Wither.

TRADE

Robert Wilson The song of the broom seller is found in The Three Ladies of London (1584), a play by the clown and playwright Wilson (active 1572–1600). It may be by him or may originate in a lost ballad entered into the Stationer's Register in 1563–64 called "Buy, Brooms, Buy." Because the text is directed to "maidens" with money or goods to barter, and is sung in the play by a woman, Conscience, it offers a glimpse into female trade and social relationships of the period.

New Brooms

New brooms, green brooms, will you buy any?
Come maidens, come quickly, let me take a penny.

My brooms are not steeped,<sup>o</sup>
but very well bound;
My brooms be not crooked,
5 but smooth cut and round.
I wish it should please you to buy of my broom;
Then would it well ease me
if market were done.<sup>1</sup> 10 Have you any old boots, or any old shoon,<sup>o</sup>
Pouch-rings,<sup>o</sup> or buskins, to cope<sup>o</sup> for new broom?
15 If so you have, maidens,
I pray you bring hither,
That you and I friendly
may bargain together.

New brooms, green brooms, will you buy any:
Come maidens, come quickly, let me take a penny.

Robert Wilson This dialogue song, in which potential male servants beg for hire—and are firmly rejected by the distrustful woman called Conscience—is from Wilson's play The Three Ladies of London (1584). The characters in this play are depicted by their names: the men in this scene are called Fraud, Dissimulation, Usury, Simony, and Simplicity; the women are called Lucre, Love, and Conscience.

Your service,<sup>o</sup> good ladies, is that we do crave.

We like not nor list<sup>o</sup> not such servants to have.

Anonymous The three poems that follow are all from Deuteromelia (1609), a song collection by the composer Thomas Ravenscroft (1588–1635). Ravenscroft was a boy chorister at St. Paul's Cathedral who went on to become a composer in his own right. He also published song collections, which seem to have mingled popular oral music—street cries, songs of trade—with songs of his own. This song, which gathers the street cries of a variety of London vendors, may be by Ravenscroft or may be traditional. In it, we see female and male traders who are made happy or unhappy by their jobs. The poorest people are here said to be the happiest.

Cries of London

Who liveth so merry in all this land
As doth the poor widow that selleth the sand?
And ever she singeth, as I can guess,
"Will you buy any sand, any sand, mistress?"

5 The broom-man<sup>o</sup> maketh his living most sweet
With carrying of brooms from street to street.
Who would desire a pleasanter thing
Than all the day long to do nothing but sing?

10 The chimney-sweeper all the long day
He singeth and sweepeth the soot away.
Yet when he comes home, although he be weary,
With his sweet wife he maketh full merry.

15 The cobbler he sits cobbling till noon,
And cobbleth his shoes till they be done.
Yet doth he not fear, and so doth say,
For he knows his work will soon decay.

20 The merchantman doth sail on the seas,
And lie on the shipboard with little ease,
Always in doubt<sup>o</sup> the rock is near—
How can he be merry and make good cheer?

25 The husbandman<sup>o</sup> all day goeth to plow,
And when he comes home he serveth<sup>o</sup> his sow.
He moileth<sup>o</sup> and toileth all the long year,
How can he be merry and make good cheer?

The serving-man waiteth<sup>o</sup> from street to street,

30                   With blowing his nails and beating his feet,<sup>1</sup>
                       And serveth for forty shillings a year,
                       That 'tis impossible to make good cheer.

                       Who liveth so merry and maketh such sport
                       As those that be of thy poorest sort?
                       The poorest sort, wheresoever they be,
                       They gather together by one, two, and three,
 35                   And every man will spend his penny:
                       What makes such a shot<sup>o</sup> among a great many?
                       <sup>2</sup>

ca. 1609

“Soldier’s Song” was probably gathered by Ravenscroft, as it concerns mercenaries returning from the Dutch Revolt (1566/8–1648) against the Spaniards. The French imprecation suggests the soldiers have been fighting alongside the French and have learned some of their phrases. The text combines bravado and desperation: these penniless fighters have returned home desperate for money and drink; the song contains a threat that they may do mischief to those who will not help them.

We be soldiers three,
Pardonnez-moi je vous en prie,<sup>1</sup>
Lately come forth of the low country,

With never a penny of money.

10 And he that will not pledge me<sup>2</sup> this,

Pays for the shot,<sup>3</sup> whatever it is,
With never a penny of money.

We be three poor mariners
Newly come from the seas;
We spend our lives in jeopardy
Whiles others live at ease.
5 Shall we go dance the round
And shall we go dance the round?
And he that is a bully boy,<sup>o</sup> come pledge me on the ground.<sup>1</sup>

We care not for those martial men
That do our states disdain;
10 But we care for those merchantmen
Which do our states maintain.<sup>2</sup>

WOMEN

Sir John Harington, Lady Mary Cheke This poetic exchange is recorded in a commonplace book of about 1630, kept by Robert Bishop (dates unknown). It consists of a poem by Harington (1561–1612)—published, but in a different form, in 1618—that claims that there once was a “certain” man but has never been a certain woman, not even in the Bible (the joke conflates several senses of certain: “particular,” “clear,” “able to be relied on,” and “knowing one’s own mind”). The reply, by Cheke (ca. 1532–1616), lady of the privy chamber to Elizabeth I, takes the form of an answer poem: it turns the table on the first poem and corrects it (in a literal but also figurative sense, as, Cheke points out, the phrase “certain woman” is in the Bible). By making Harington’s statement into the first part of a dialogue, Cheke upstages him to “win” what she has ingeniously rendered a dispute.

SIR JOHN HARINGTON: A Certain Man

It was not certain when a certain preacher—
That having never learned would be<sup>o</sup> a teacher—
And having thus in Latin read his text
Of "Erat quidam homo", much perplexed,
He seemed the same with diligence to scan<sup>o</sup>
5 In English thus, " 'There was a certain man'.<sup>1</sup>
And now", said he, "good people mark you this,
He saith there was, he doth not say there is,
For in this age of ours, it is most certain,
Of promise, word, deed, oath, there's no man
10 certain,
Yet by my text it's clearly brought to pass<sup>o</sup>
That surely once a certain man there was.
But this I think, in all the bible no man
Can find this text: 'there was a certain woman.' "
before 1612

Endnotes

- Note 1: That no such line appears in the Vulgate (Latin) Bible undercuts Harington's story. The preacher is probably looking at "Homo quidam erat dives" (There was a certain rich man; Luke 16:19).Return to reference 1

LADY MARY CHEKE: The Reply

That no man yet could in the Bible find
A certain woman argues men all blind:
Blind as the preacher who had little learning,
The certain cause of his so ill<sup>o</sup> discerning.
A certain woman of the multitude
5 Said "blessed be the paps<sup>o</sup> that gave our savior food".<sup>2</sup>
A certain woman, too, a millstone<sup>3</sup> threw
And from the wall Abimelech she slew.<sup>4</sup>
Nay more. By men though it be oversaid,<sup>o</sup>
The text records there was a certain maid,
10 Which proves directly certain women then,
And certain too, more certain far then men.<sup>5</sup>
Your preacher, then, may well stand much perplexed
To see how grossly he belied<sup>o</sup> the text,
And blush that's sermon was no better suited
15 Than by a woman thus to be confuted.<sup>o</sup>
Yet, for his comfort, one true note he made
When "there is now no certain man" he said.

before 1612

All Married Men Desire to Have Good Wives

All married men desire to have good wives,
But few give good example by their lives.
They are our head; they would have us their heels.<sup>1</sup>
This makes the good wife kick; the goodman<sup>o</sup> reels.<sup>o</sup>
When God brought Eve to Adam for a bride,
5 The text says she was ta'en from out man's side,
A symbol of that side whose sacred blood
Flowed for his spouse: the church's saving good.<sup>2</sup>
This is a mystery<sup>o</sup> perhaps too deep
For blockish<sup>o</sup> Adam that was fallen asleep.

JOHN LYLY 1554–1606

John Lyly was the grandson of William Lily, the author of the standard Latin grammar that every English schoolboy studied. After receiving an M.A. degree at Oxford, Lyly went to London, where his prose romance Euphues (1578) enjoyed an instant success. He later wrote several elegant, sophisticated plays acted at court by the children's companies and served several terms as a member of Parliament, though his hopes of obtaining a lucrative court appointment were disappointed.

The title Euphues, taken from the name of that book's hero, is Greek for "of good natural parts, graceful, witty"; the subtitle, Anatomy of Wit, means something like "analysis of the mental faculties." The plot of the work involves a young man who leaves university for the temptations of the city, falls in love, betrays his best friend, is in turn betrayed, repents, and thereafter ladles out great quantities of moral wisdom. But the story is secondary to the prose style, which has come to be known as "euphuism" and which greatly influenced a generation of writers eager to follow the fashion the book established. The style has two distinctive features: a sentence structure based on comparison and antithesis; and a wealth of verbal embellishments, including proverbs, incidents from history and poetry, and fanciful similes drawn from contemporary science, classical texts, or the author's own imagination. Euphuism became a rage for a while, especially at court. The style may have been particularly popular among court women: in 1632 the publisher of Lyly's Six Court Comedies informed his readers that "all our ladies were then his [Euphues's or Lyly's] scholars, and the beauty in court who could not parley Euphuism was as little regarded as she which now there speaks not French." When it started to fall out of fashion, euphuism was criticized by Sidney, parodied by Shakespeare, and mocked by Thomas Nashe and Ben Jonson. Although it did not last, Lyly's highly self-conscious, overwrought style is an example of the Elizabethan fascination with ornate language and artifice.

From Euphues: The Anatomy of Wit

[EUPHUES INTRODUCED]

There dwelt in Athens a young gentleman of great patrimony, and of so comely a personage, that it was doubted<sup>1</sup> whether he were more bound to Nature for the lineaments of his person, or to Fortune for the increase of his possessions. But Nature impatient of comparisons, and as it were disdainning a companion or copartner in her working, added to this comeliness of his body such a sharp capacity of mind, that not only she proved Fortune counterfeit, but was half of that opinion that she herself was only current.<sup>2</sup> This young gallant, of more wit<sup>3</sup> than wealth, and yet of more wealth than wisdom, seeing himself inferior to none in pleasant conceits,<sup>4</sup> thought himself superior to all in honest conditions, insomuch that he deemed himself so apt to all things, that he gave himself almost to nothing, but practicing of those things commonly which are incident to these sharp wits, fine phrases, smooth quipping, merry taunting, using jesting without mean,<sup>5</sup> and abusing mirth without measure. As therefore the sweetest rose hath his prickles, the finest velvet his brack,<sup>6</sup> the fairest flower his bran,<sup>7</sup> so the sharpest wit hath his wanton will, and the holiest head his wicked way. And true it is that some men write and most men believe, that in all perfect shapes, a blemish bringeth rather a liking every way to the eyes, than a loathing any way to the mind. Venus had her mole in her cheek which made her more amiable: Helen<sup>8</sup> her scar on her chin which Paris called cos amoris, the whetsone of love. Aristippus his wart, Lycurgus<sup>9</sup> his wen: So likewise in the disposition of the mind, either virtue is over-shadowed with some vice, or vice overcast with some virtue. Alexander valiant in war, yet given to wine. Tully eloquent in his glozes, yet vainglorious: Solomon wise, yet too too wanton: David holy but yet an homicide:<sup>1</sup> none more witty than Euphues, yet at the first none more wicked. The freshest colors soonest fade, the teenest<sup>2</sup> razor soonest turneth his edge, the finest cloth is soonest eaten with moths, and the cambric sooner stained than the coarse canvas: which appeared well in this Euphues, whose wit being like wax apt to receive any impression, and having the bridle in his own hands, either to use the rein or the spur, disdaining counsel, leaving his country, loathing his old acquaintance, thought either by wit to obtain some conquest, or by shame to abide<sup>3</sup> some conflict, and leaving the rule of reason, rashly ran unto destruction. Who preferring fancy before friends, and his present humor<sup>4</sup> before honor to come, laid reason in water being too salt for his taste, and followed unbridled affection, most pleasant for his tooth.<sup>5</sup> When parents have more care how to leave their children wealthy than wise, and are more desirous to have them maintain the name than the nature of a gentleman; when they put gold into the hands of youth, where they should put a rod under their girdle,<sup>6</sup> when instead of awe they make them past grace, and leave them rich executors of goods, and poor executors of godliness, then is it no marvel that the son, being left rich by his father's will, become retchless by his own will.<sup>7</sup>

It hath been an old-said saw,<sup>8</sup> and not of less truth than antiquity, that wit is the better if it be the dearer bought: as in the sequel of this history<sup>9</sup> shall most manifestly appear. It happened this young imp<sup>1</sup> to arrive at Naples (a place of more pleasure than profit, and yet of more profit than piety), the very walls and windows whereof shewed it rather to be the Tabernacle of Venus than the Temple of Vesta.<sup>2</sup>

There was all things necessary and in readiness that might either allure the mind to lust or entice the heart to folly, a court more meet<sup>3</sup> for an atheist than for one of Athens, for Ovid than for Aristotle, for a graceless lover than for a godly liver: more fitter for Paris than Hector, and meeter for Flora than Diana.<sup>4</sup>

Here my youth (whether for weariness he could not, or for wantonness would not, go any further) determined to make his abode: whereby it is evidently seen that the fleetest fish swalloweth the delicatest bait, that the highest soaring hawk traineth<sup>5</sup> to the lure, and that the wittiest sconce<sup>6</sup> is inveigled with the sudden view or alluring vanities.

Here he wanted<sup>7</sup> no companions which courted him continually with sundry kinds of devices, whereby they might either soak<sup>8</sup> his purse to reap commodity, or soothe his person to win credit, for he had guests and companions of all sorts.

There frequented to this lodging and mansion house as well the spider to suck poison of his fine wit as the bee to gather honey, as well the drone as the dove, the fox as the lamb, as well Damocles<sup>9</sup> to betray him as Damon<sup>1</sup> to be true to him: yet he behaved himself so warily, that he singled his game<sup>2</sup> wisely. He could easily discern Apollo's music from Pan his pipe,<sup>3</sup> and Venus's beauty from Juno's bravery,<sup>4</sup> and the faith of Laelius<sup>5</sup> from the flattery of Aristippus, he welcomed all but trusted none, he was merry but yet so wary that neither the flatterer could take advantage to entrap him in his talk nor the wisest any assurance of his friendship: who being demanded of<sup>6</sup> one what countryman he was, he answered, "What countryman am I not? If I be in Crete, I can lie, if in Greece I can shift, if in Italy I can court it:<sup>7</sup> if thou ask whose son I am also, I ask thee whose son I am not. I can carouse with Alexander, abstain with Romulus, eat with the Epicure, fast with the Stoic, sleep with Endymion, watch with Chrysippus,"<sup>8</sup> using these speeches and other like. An old gentleman in Naples seeing his pregnant wit,<sup>9</sup> his eloquent tongue somewhat taunting, yet with delight, his mirth without measure yet not without wit, his sayings vainglorious yet pithy, began to bewail his nurture and to muse at his nature, being incensed against the one as most pernicious, and enflamed with the other as most precious: for he well knew that so rare a wit would in time either breed an intolerable trouble or bring an incomparable treasure to the common weal:<sup>1</sup> at the one he greatly pitied, at the other he rejoiced.

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY

1554–1586

Sir Philip Sidney's face was "spoiled with pimples," Ben Jonson remarked in 1619, distancing himself from the virtual cult that had arisen in the years after Sidney's death. Knight, soldier, poet, friend, and patron, Sidney seemed to most Elizabethans to embody all the traits of character and personality they admired: he was Castiglione's perfect courtier come to life. When he was killed in battle in the Low Countries at the age of thirty-two, fighting for the Protestant cause against the hated Spanish, all England mourned. Stories, not all necessarily true, immediately began to circulate about his gallantry on the battlefield—grievously wounded, he gave his water to a dying foot soldier with the words "Thy necessity is yet greater than mine"—and about his astonishing self-composure as he himself lay dying: suffering from his putrifying, gangrenous wound, Sidney composed a song and had it sung by his deathbed. When his corpse was brought back to England for burial, the spectacular funeral procession, one of the most elaborate ever staged, almost bankrupted his father-in-law, Francis Walsingham, the wealthy head of Queen Elizabeth's secret service.

Philip Sidney's father was Sir Henry Sidney, thrice lord deputy (governor) of Ireland, and his mother was a sister of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, the most spectacular and powerful of all the queen's favorites. He entered Shrewsbury School in 1564, at the age of ten, on the same day as Fulke Greville, who became his lifelong friend and his biographer. Greville wrote of Sidney, "Though I lived with him and knew him from a child, yet I never knew him other than a man—with such staidness of mind, lovely and familiar gravity, as carried grace and reverence above greater years." He attended Oxford but left without taking a degree; he completed his education by extended travels on the Continent. There he met many of the most important people of the time, from kings and queens to philosophers, theologians, and poets. In France he witnessed the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre, which began in Paris on August 24, 1572, and raged through France for more than a month, as Catholic mobs incited by Queen Catherine de Médicis slaughtered perhaps fifty thousand Huguenots (French Protestants). This experience undoubtedly strengthened Sidney's ardent Protestantism. In an intense correspondence with his mentor, the humanist reformer Hubert Languet of Burgundy, France, he brooded on how he could help save Europe from what he viewed as the Roman Catholic menace.

Languet and his associates clearly hoped that this brilliant and wonderfully well-connected young Englishman would be able to steer English royal policy toward active intervention in Europe's wars of religion. Yet when he returned to England, Sidney found the direct path to heroic action blocked by the caution and hard-nosed realism of Queen Elizabeth and her principal advisers. Though she sent him on some modest diplomatic missions, the queen clearly regarded the zealous young man with considerable skepticism. As a prominent courtier with literary interests, Sidney actively encouraged authors such as Edward Dyer, Greville, and, most important, Edmund Spenser, who dedicated The Shepheardes Calender to him as "the president [chief exemplar] of noblesse and of chevalree." But he clearly longed to be something more than an influential patron of letters. In 1580 his Protestant convictions led him publicly to oppose Queen Elizabeth's projected marriage to the Catholic Duke of Anjou. The queen, who hated interference with her diplomatic maneuvers, angrily dismissed Sidney from the court.

He retired to Wilton, the estate of his beloved and learned sister, Mary Herbert, Countess of Pembroke, and there he wrote a long, elaborate epic romance in prose, called Arcadia. Sidney's claim, made with studied nonchalance, that the work was written on the spur of the moment for his sister's private entertainment is belied by its considerable literary, political, and moral ambitions, qualities that were reinforced and intensified in the extensive revisions he began to make to it in 1582. Our selection is from this revised version, which scholars call the New Arcadia.

In addition to Arcadia, which inspired many imitations, including the Urania of Sidney's niece, Lady Mary Wroth, two other influential works by Sidney have had still more lasting importance. One of these, The Defense of Poesy, is the major work of literary criticism produced in the English Renaissance. In this long essay Sidney eloquently defends poetry (his term for all imaginative literature) against its attackers and, in the process, greatly exalts the role of the poet, the freedom of the imagination, and the moral value of fiction. Perhaps Sidney's finest literary achievement is Astrophil and Stella (Starlover and Star), the first of the great Elizabethan sonnet cycles. The principal focus of these sonnets is not a sequence of events or an unfolding relationship. Rather, they explore the lover's state of mind and soul—the contradictory impulses, intense desires, and frustrations that haunt him.

In his guise as a lovelorn sonneteer, Sidney repeatedly insists that the thought of his beloved drives all more mundane matters from his mind. Yet a number of the sonnets betray a continuing preoccupation with matters of politics and foreign policy. Neither love nor literature could distract Sidney for long from what he took to be his destined role. In 1585 he tried to join Sir Francis Drake's West Indian expedition but was prevented by the queen; instead, she appointed him governor of Flushing in the Netherlands, where as a volunteer and knight-errant he engaged in several vicious skirmishes in the war against Spain. At Zutphen on September 13, 1586, leading a charge against great odds, Sidney was wounded in the thigh, shortly after he had thrown away his thigh armor in an ill-fated chivalric gesture. He died twenty-six days later.

In keeping with the norms of his class, Sidney did not publish any of his major literary works himself. His ambition, continually thwarted, was to be a man of action whose deeds would affect his country's destiny. Yet he was the author of the most ambitious work of prose fiction, the most important piece of literary criticism, and the most influential sonnet cycle of the Elizabethan Age.

The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia     Sidney

wrote his epic romance in two forms, which scholars have dubbed the Old Arcadia and the New Arcadia. Shortly after the Old Arcadia was completed, in five "books," Sidney began to recast and greatly expand it, but he broke off in midsentence and left the revision unfinished. This revised fragment, almost three books, is known as the New Arcadia; it was published after his death, in 1590. In 1593 Sidney's sister, the Countess of Pembroke, herself a gifted writer, made some small changes to the New Arcadia and the last two books of the Old, stitched them together, and published them as a single text. (The complete Old Arcadia, as Sidney had left it in manuscript, was not rediscovered and published until the twentieth century.) Both Sidney's original version and his revision are full of oracles, princes in disguise, mistaken identity, melodramatic incidents, and tangled love situations, but the New Arcadia has a much more labyrinthine, interwoven plot, as well as a more consistently elevated tone of moral and heroic high seriousness. Some episodes are of political interest, and Sidney clearly put into the work more of his serious thought on statecraft (the responsibilities of a king or queen, the evils of rebellion, and the duties of ministers, judges, and advisers of state) than his claim that the Arcadia was mere entertainment suggests. Many poems—pastoral eclogues and songs—are interspersed throughout the narrative; they represent Sidney's experiments with diverse lyric kinds and verse forms.

[THE ABSENT URANIA]

It was in the time that the earth begins to put on her new apparel against the approach of her lover, and that the sun, running a most even course, becomes an indifferent arbiter between the night and the day, when the hopeless shepherd Strephon was come to the sands which lie against the island of Cithera; where viewing the place with a heavy kind of delight, and sometimes casting his eyes to the isleward, he called his friendly rival, the pastor<sup>2</sup> Klaius, unto him; and setting first down in his darkened countenance a doleful copy of what he would speak,

“O my Klaius,” said he, “hither we are now come to pay the rent for which we are so called unto by over-busy remembrance—remembrance, restless remembrance, which claims not only this duty of us but for it will have us forget ourselves. I pray you, when we were amid our flock, and that of other shepherds some were running after their sheep strayed beyond their bounds, some delighting their eyes with seeing them nibble upon the short and sweet grass, some medicining their sick ewes, some setting a bell for an ensign of a sheepish squadron,<sup>3</sup> some with more leisure inventing new games of exercising their bodies and sporting their wits; did remembrance grant us any holiday either for pastime or devotion—nay either for necessary food or natural rest—but that still it forced our thoughts to work upon this place where we last (alas, that the word last should so long last) did gaze our eyes upon her ever-flourishing beauty? Did it not still cry within us ‘Ah, you base-minded wretches, are your thoughts so deeply bemired in the trade or ordinary worldeings, as for respect of gain some paltry wool may yield you, to let so much time pass without knowing perfectly her estate, especially in so troublesome a season; to leave that shore unsaluted from whence you may see to the island where she dwelleth; to leave those steps unkissed wherein Urania printed the farewell of all beauty?’

“Well, then, remembrance commanded; we obeyed, and here we find that as our remembrance came ever clothed unto us in the form of this place, so this place gives new heat to the fever of our languishing remembrance. . . .” * * *

[Klaius] “. . . Hath not the only love<sup>4</sup> of her made us, being silly ignorant shepherds, raise up our thoughts above the ordinary level of the world, so as great clerks<sup>5</sup> do not disdain our conference? Hath not the desire to seem worthy in her eyes made us, when others were sleeping, to sit viewing the course of the heavens; when others were running at base,<sup>6</sup> to run over learned writings; when others mark<sup>7</sup> their sheep, we mark ourselves? Hath not she thrown reason upon our desires and, as it were, given eyes unto Cupid?<sup>8</sup> Hath in any but in her, love-fellowship maintained friendship between rivals, and beauty taught the beholders chastity?”

[THE COUNTRY OF ARCADIA]

* * * The third day after, in the time that the morning did strew roses and violets in the heavenly floor against the coming of the sun, the nightingales (striving one with the other which could in most dainty variety recount their wrong-caused sorrow)<sup>9</sup> made them put off their sleep, and rising from under a tree (which that night had been their pavilion) they went on their journey, which by and by welcomed Musidorus’ eyes, wearied with the wasted soil of Laconia,<sup>1</sup> with delightful prospects.

There were hills which garnished their proud heights with stately trees; humble valleys whose base estate seemed comforted with refreshing of silver rivers; meadows enameled<sup>2</sup> with all sorts of eye-pleasing flowers; thickets, which, being lined with most pleasant shade, were witnessed so to by the cheerful deposition<sup>3</sup> of many well-tuned birds; each pasture stored with sheep feeding with sober security, while the pretty lambs with bleating oratory craved the dams' comfort; here a shepherd's boy piping as though he should never be old; there a young shepherdess knitting and withal singing, and it seemed that her voice comforted her hands to work and her hands kept time to her voice's music. As for the houses of the country—for many houses came under their eye—they were all scattered, no two being one by the other, and yet not so far off as that it barred mutual succour: a show, as it were, of an accompanable solitariness and of a civil wildness.<sup>4</sup>

"I pray you," said Musidorus, then first unsealing his long silent lips, "what countries be these we pass through which are so divers in show, the one wanting no store,<sup>5</sup> the other having no store but of want?"

"The country," answered Klaius, "where you were cast ashore and now are passed through is Laconia, not so poor by the barrenness of the soil (though in itself not passing fertile) as by a civil war, which being these two years within the bowels of that estate between the gentlemen and the peasants (by them named Helots)<sup>6</sup> hath in this sort as it were disfigured the face of nature, and made it so unhospital<sup>7</sup> as now you have found it: the towns neither of the one side nor the other willingly opening their gates to strangers, nor strangers willingly entering for fear of being mistaken.

"But this country where now you set your foot is Arcadia;<sup>8</sup> and even hard by is the house of Kalandar whither we lead you: this country being thus decked with peace and (the child of peace) good husbandry. These houses you see so scattered are of men as we two are that live upon the commodity of their sheep, and therefore in the division of the Arcadian estate are termed shepherds: a happy people, wanting little because they desire not much."

"What cause then," said Musidorus, "made you venture to leave this sweet life and put yourself in yonder unpleasant and dangerous realm?"

"Guarded with poverty," answered Strephon, "and guided with love."

[KALANDER TELLS ABOUT BASILIUS]

Which Kalander perceiving, "Well," said he, "my dear guest, I know your mind and I will satisfy it. Neither will I do it like a niggardly answerer, going no further than the bounds of the question; but I will discover<sup>9</sup> unto you as well that wherein my knowledge is common with others as that which by extraordinary means is delivered unto me, knowing so much in you (though not long acquainted) that I shall find your ears faithful treasurers." So then sitting down in two chairs and sometimes casting his eye to the picture,<sup>1</sup> he thus spake:

"This country Arcadia among all the provinces of Greece hath ever been had in singular reputation; partly for the sweetness of the air and other natural benefits, but principally for the well-tempered minds of the people who (finding that the shining title of glory, so much affected by other nations, doth indeed help little to the happiness of life) are the only people which, as by their justice and providence give neither cause nor hope to their neighbors to annoy them, so are they not stirred with false praise to trouble others' quiet, thinking it a small reward for the wasting of their own lives in ravening<sup>2</sup> that their posterity should long after say they had done so. Even the Muses<sup>1</sup> seem to approve their good determination by choosing this country for their chief repairing<sup>3</sup> place, and by bestowing their perfections so largely here that the very shepherds have their fancies lifted to so high conceits<sup>4</sup> that the learned of other nations are content both to borrow their names and imitate their cunning.

"Here dwelleth and reigneth this prince (whose picture you see) by name Basilius;<sup>5</sup> a prince of sufficient skill to govern so quiet a country, where the good minds of the former princes had set down good laws, and the well-bringing up of the people did serve as a most sure bond to hold them. But to be plain with you, he excels in nothing so much as in the zealous love of his people, wherein he doth not only pass all his own foregoers but, as I think, all the princes living. Whereof the cause is that though he exceed not in the virtues which get admiration, as depth of wisdom, height of courage, and largeness of magnificence, yet is he notable in those which stir affection, as truth of word, meekness, courtesy, mercifulness, and liberality.

“He, being already well stricken in years, married a young princess named Gynecia,<sup>6</sup> daughter to the king of Cyprus, of notable beauty as by her picture you see: a woman of great wit, and in truth of more princely virtues than her husband; of most unspotted chastity, but of so working a mind and so vehement spirits as a man may say it was happy<sup>7</sup> she took a good course, for otherwise it would have been terrible.

“Of these two are brought into the world two daughters, so beyond measure excellent in all the gifts allotted to reasonable creatures that we may think they were born to show that nature is no stepmother to that sex, how much soever some men, sharp-witted only in evil speaking, have sought to disgrace them. The elder is named Pamela, by many men not deemed inferior to her sister. For my part, when I marked them both, methought there was (if at least such perfections may receive the word of more) more sweetness in Philoclea but more majesty in Pamela: methought love played in Philoclea’s eyes and threatened in Pamela’s; methought Philoclea’s beauty only persuaded, but so persuaded as all hearts must yield; Pamela’s beauty used violence, and such violence as no heart could resist. And it seems that such proportion is between their minds: Philoclea so bashful, as though her excellencies had stolen into her before she was aware; so humble, that she will put all pride out of countenance; in sum, such proceeding as will stir hope but teach good manners. Pamela of high thoughts, who avoids not pride with not knowing her excellencies, but by making that one of her excellencies, to be void of pride; her mother’s wisdom, greatness, nobility, but—if I can guess aright—knit with a more constant temper. Now then, our Basilius—being so publicly happy as to be a prince, and so happy in that happiness as to be a beloved prince, and so in his private blessed as to have so excellent a wife and so over-excellent children—hath of late taken a course which yet makes him more spoken of than all these blessings. For, having made a journey to Delphos<sup>8</sup> and safely returned, within short space he brake up his court and retired himself, his wife and children, into a certain forest hereby which he calleth his desert; wherein, besides a house appointed for stables and lodgings for certain persons of mean calling who do all household services, he hath builded two fine lodges. In the one of them himself remains with his younger daughter Philoclea—which was the cause they three were matched together in this picture—without having any other creature living in that lodge with him.

“Which though it be strange, yet not strange as the course he hath taken with the princess Pamela whom he hath placed in the other lodge; but how think you accompanied? Truly with none other but one Dametas, the most arrant doltish clown that I think ever was without the privilege of a bauble,<sup>9</sup> with his wife Miso and daughter Mopsa, in whom no wit can devise anything wherein they may pleasure her but to exercise her patience and to serve for a foil of her perfections.”

From *Book Two

In these pastoral pastimes<sup>2</sup> a great number of days were sent to follow their flying predecessors, while the cup of poison<sup>3</sup> (which was deeply tasted of this noble company) had left no sinew of theirs without mortally searching into it; yet never manifesting his venomous work, till once that the night (parting away angry that she could distill no more sleep into the eyes of lovers) had no sooner given place to the breaking out of the morning light and the sun bestowed his beams upon the tops of the mountains, but that the woeful Gynecia (to whom rest was no ease) had left her loathed lodging and gotten herself into the solitary places those deserts<sup>4</sup> were full of, going up and down with such unquiet motions as a grieved and hopeless mind is wont to bring forth. There appeared unto the eyes of her judgment the evils she was like to run into, with ugly infamy waiting upon them: she felt the terrors of her own conscience; she was guilty of a long exercised virtue which made this vice the fuller of deformity. The uttermost of the good she could aspire unto was a mortal wound to her vexed spirits; and lastly, no small part of her evils was that she was wise to see her evils. Insomuch that, having a great while thrown her countenance ghastly about her<sup>5</sup> (as if she had called all the powers of the world to be witness of her wretched estate), at length casting up her watery eyes to heaven:

“O sun,” said she, “whose unspotted light directs the steps of mortal mankind, art thou not ashamed to impart the clearness of thy presence to such a dust-creeping worm as I am? O you heavens, which continually keep the course allotted unto you, can none of your influences prevail so much upon the miserable Gynecia as to make her preserve a course so long embraced by her? O deserts, deserts, how fit a guest am I for you, since my heart can people you with wild ravenous beasts, which in you are wanting! O virtue, where dost thou hide thyself? What hideous thing is this which doth eclipse thee? Or is it true that thou wert never but a vain name and no essential thing, which hast thus left thy professed servant when she had most need of thy lovely presence? O imperfect proportion of reason, which can too much foresee and too little prevent! Alas, alas," said she, "if there were but one hope for all my pains or but one excuse for all my faultiness! But wretch that I am, my torment is beyond all succor, and my evil-deserving doth exceed my evil fortune. For nothing else did my husband take this strange resolution to live so solitarily, for nothing else have the winds delivered this strange guest to my country, for nothing else have the destinies reserved my life to this time, but that only I, most wretched I, should become a plague to myself and a shame to womankind. Yet if my desire, how unjust soever it be, might take effect, though a thousand deaths followed it and every death were followed with a thousand shames, yet should not my sepulcher receive me without some contentment. But alas, though sure I am that Zelmane is such as can answer my love, yet as sure I am that this disguising must needs come for some foretaken conceit.<sup>6</sup> And then, wretched Gynecia, where canst thou find any small ground-plot for hope to dwell upon? No, no, it is Philoclea his heart is set upon; it is my daughter I have borne to supplant me. But if it be so, the life I have given thee, ungrateful Philoclea, I will sooner with these hands bereave thee of than my birth<sup>7</sup> shall glory she hath bereaved me of my desires. In shame there is no comfort but to be beyond all bounds of shame."

Having spoken thus, she began to make a piteous war with her fair hair, when she might hear not far from her an extremely doleful voice, but so suppressed with a kind of whispering note that she could not conceive the words distinctly. But as a lamentable tune is the sweetest music to a woeful mind, she drew thither near-away<sup>8</sup> in hope to find some companion of her misery; and as she paced on she was stopped with a number of trees so thickly placed together that she was afraid she should, with rushing through, stop the speech of the lamentable party which she was so desirous to understand. And therefore sitting her down as softly as she could (for she was now in distance to hear) she might first perceive a lute excellently well played upon, and then the same doleful voice accompanying it with these verses:

In vain, mine eyes, you labor to amend
With flowing tears your fault of hasty sight;
Since to my heart her shape you so did send,
That her I see, though you did lose your light.

In vain, my heart, now you with sight are burned,
With sighs you seek to cool your hot desire;
Since sighs, into mine inward furnace turned,
For bellows serve to kindle more the fire.

Reason in vain, now you have lost my heart,
My head you seek, as to your strongest fort;
Since there mine eyes have played so false a part,
That to your strength your foes have sure resort.
Then since in vain I find were all my strife,
To this strange death I vainly yield my life.

The ending of the song served but for a beginning of new complaints, as if the mind, oppressed with too heavy a burden of cares, was fain to discharge itself of all sides and, as it were, paint out the hideousness of the pain in all sorts of colors. For the woeful person (as if the lute had evil<sup>9</sup> joined with the voice) threw it to the ground with suchlike words:

"Alas, poor lute, how much art thou deceived to think that in my miseries thou could'st ease my woes, as in my careless<sup>1</sup> times thou wast wont to please my fancies! The time is changed, my lute, the time is changed; and no more did my joyful mind then receive everything to a joyful consideration than my careful<sup>2</sup> mind now makes each thing taste like the bitter juice of care. The evil is inward, my lute, the evil is inward; which all thou dost doth serve but to make me think more freely of, and the more I think, the more cause I find of thinking, but less of hoping. And alas, what is then thy harmony but the sweetmeats of sorrow? The discord of my thoughts, my lute, doth ill agree to the concord of thy strings; therefore be not ashamed to leave thy master, since he is not afraid to forsake himself."

And thus much spoken, instead of a conclusion was closed up with so hearty a groaning that Gynecia could not refrain to show herself, thinking such griefs could serve fitly for nothing but her own fortune. But as she came into the little arbor of this sorrowful music, her eyes met with the eyes of Zelmane, which was the party that thus had indicted herself of misery, so that either of them remained confused with a sudden astonishment, Zelmane fearing lest she had heard some part of those complaints which she had risen up that morning early of purpose to breathe out in secret to herself. But Gynecia a great while stood still with a kind of dull amazement, looking steadfastly upon her. At length returning to some use of herself, she began to ask Zelmane what cause carried her so early abroad. But, as if the opening of her mouth to Zelmane had opened some great floodgate of sorrow whereof her heart could not abide the violent issue, she sank to the ground with her hands over her face, crying vehemently, "Zelmane, help me, O Zelmane have pity on me!"

Zelmane ran to her, marveling what sudden sickness had thus possessed her; and beginning to ask her the cause of her pain and offering her service to be employed by her, Gynecia opening her eyes wildly upon her, pricked with the flames of love and the torments of her own conscience, "O Zelmane, Zelmane," said she, "dost thou offer me physic,<sup>3</sup> which art my only poison? Or wilt thou do me service, which hast already brought me into eternal slavery?"

Zelmane then knowing well at what mark she shot, yet loth to enter into it, "Most excellent lady," said she, "you were best retire yourself into your lodging, that you the better may pass this sudden fit."

"Retire myself?" said Gynecia, "If I had retired myself into myself when thou (to me unfortunate guest) camest to draw me from myself, blessed had I been, and no need had I had of this counsel. But now, alas, I am forced to fly to thee for succor whom I accuse of all my hurt, and make thee judge of my cause, who art the only author of my mischief."

Zelmane the more astonished, the more she understood her, "Madam," said she, "whereof do you accuse me that I will not clear myself? Or wherein may I stead<sup>4</sup> you that you may not command me?"

"Alas!" answered Gynecia, "What shall I say more? Take pity of me, O Zelmane, but not as Zelmane, and disguise not with me in words, as I know thou dost in apparel."

Zelmane was much troubled with that word, finding herself brought to this strait. But as she was thinking what to answer her, they might see old Basilius pass hard by them without ever seeing them, complaining likewise of love very freshly, and ending his complaint with this song, love having renewed both his invention and voice:

Let not old age disgrace my high desire,
O heavenly soul in human shape contained:
Old wood inflamed doth yield the bravest<sup>5</sup> fire,
When younger doth in smoke his virtue<sup>6</sup> spend.

Ne let white hairs which on my face do grow
Seem to your eyes of a disgraceful hue,
Since whiteness doth present the sweetest show,<sup>7</sup>
Which makes all eyes do homage unto you.

Old age is wise and full of constant truth;
Old age well stayed from ranging humor<sup>8</sup> lives;
Old age hath known whatever was in youth;
Old age o'ercome, the greater honor gives.
And to old age since you yourself aspire,
Let not old age disgrace my high desire.

Which being done, he looked very curiously<sup>9</sup> upon himself, sometimes fetching a little skip as if he had said his strength had not yet forsaken him.

But Zelmane, having in this time gotten some leisure to think for an answer, looking upon Gynecia as if she thought she did her some wrong, "Madam," said she, "I am not acquainted with those words of disguising; neither is it the profession of an Amazon; neither are you a party with whom it is to be used. If my service may please you, employ it, so long as you do me no wrong in misjudging of me."

"Alas, Zelmane," said Gynecia, "I perceive you know full little how piercing the eyes are of a true lover. There is no one beam of those thoughts you have planted in me but is able to discern a greater cloud than you do go in. Seek not to conceal yourself further from me, nor force not the passion of love into violent extremities."

Now was Zelmane brought to an exigent,<sup>1</sup> when the king, turning his eyes that way through the trees, perceived his wife and mistress<sup>2</sup> together; so that framing the most lovely<sup>3</sup> countenance he could, he came straightway towards them, and at the first word, thanking his wife for having entertained Zelmane, desired her she would now return into the lodge, because he had certain matters of estate<sup>4</sup> to impart to the Lady Zelmane. The queen, being nothing troubled with jealousy in that point, obeyed the king's commandment, full of raging agonies, and determinately bent<sup>5</sup> that as she would seek all loving means to win Zelmane, so she would stir up terrible tragedies rather than fail of her intent. And so went she from them to the lodge-ward;<sup>6</sup> with such a battle in her thoughts and so deadly an overthrow given to her best resolutions that even her body (where the field was fought) was oppressed withal, making a languishing sickness wait upon the triumph of passion,<sup>7</sup> which the more it prevailed in her, the more it made her jealousy watchful both over her daughter and Zelmane, having ever one of them entrusted to her own eyes.<sup>8</sup>

But as soon as Basilius was rid of his wife's presence, falling down on his knees, "O lady," said he, "which hast only had the power to stir up again those flames which had so long lain dead in me, see in me the power of your beauty, which can make old age come to ask counsel of youth, and a prince unconquered to become a slave to a stranger. And when you see that power of yours, love that at least in me, since it is yours, although of me you see nothing to be loved."

"Worthy prince," answered Zelmane, taking him up from his kneeling, "both your manner and your speech are so strange unto me as I know not how to answer it better than with silence."

"If silence please you," said the king, "it shall never displease me, since my heart is wholly pledged to obey you. Otherwise, if you would vouchsafe mine ears such happiness as to hear you, they shall convey your words to such a mind which is with the humblest degree of reverence to receive them."

"I disdain not to speak to you, mighty prince," said Zelmane, "but I disdain to speak to any matter which may bring my honor into question."

And therewith, with a brave counterfeited scorn she departed from the king, leaving him not so sorry for his short answer as proud in himself that he had broken<sup>9</sup> the matter. And thus did the king, feeding his mind with those thoughts, pass great time in writing verses and making more of himself than he was wont to do, that, with a little help, he would have grown into a pretty kind of dotage.

But Zelmane, being rid of this loving but little loved company, "Alas," said she, "poor Pyrocles, was there ever one but I that had received wrong and could blame nobody, that having more than I desire, am still in want of that I would?<sup>1</sup> Truly, love, I must needs say thus much on thy behalf: thou hast employed my love there where all love is deserved, and for recompense hast sent me more love than ever I desired. But what wilt thou do, Pyrocles? Which way canst thou find to rid thee of thy intricate troubles? To her whom I would be known to, I live in darkness; and to her am revealed from whom I would be most secret. What shift<sup>2</sup> shall I find against the diligent love of Basilius? What shield against the violent passions of Gynecia? And if that be done, yet how am I the nearer to quench the fire that consumes me? Well, well, sweet Philoclea, my whole confidence must be builded in thy divine spirit, which cannot be ignorant of the cruel wound I have received by you."

The Defense of Poesy In 1579 Sidney found himself the unwilling dedicatee of a small book titled The School of Abuse. Its author, the playwright-turned-moralist Stephen Gosson, attacked poets and actors from a rigidly pious perspective that called into question the morality of any fiction making. Sidney may have shared in the author's militant Protestantism, but he took a very different view of the poet's art, both more sympathetic and more complex. He did not specifically answer Gosson's polemic, but he must have had it in mind when he composed, perhaps in the same year, a major piece of critical prose that was published after his death under two titles, The Defense of Poesy and An Apology for Poetry. Probably written in 1579 though not published until 1595, The Defense of Poesy is an eloquent argument for the dignity, social efficacy, and moral value of imaginative literature in verse or prose.

Sidney gives this argument the underlying form of a classical oration, as if he were a lawyer in ancient Rome defending his client against defamatory accusations. The great masters of Roman rhetoric, Cicero and Quintilian, prescribed a set structure for such orations, and as our footnotes indicate in detail, Sidney adapts his defense to this structure.

Sidney responds to old charges against poetic fictions—charges of irresponsibility and unreality—that had been revived in his own time most strenuously by Puritan moralists. The Defense argues both that the poet, liberated from the world, is free to range “within the zodiac of his own wit” and that poetry actively intervenes in the world and transforms it for the better. After slyly putting himself down in the introduction, Sidney points out the antiquity of poetry, its high standing in the biblical and classical worlds, and its universality; also, he cites the names given to poets—vates (prophet) by the Romans, and poiētēs (maker) by the Greeks—as evidence of their ancient dignity. But he bases his defense essentially on the special status of the poetic imagination. While all arts, from astronomy to music to medicine, depend ultimately on nature as their object, poetry, he claims, is uniquely free: “Only the poet, disdaining to be tied to any such subjection, lifted up with the vigor of his own invention, doth grow in effect another nature."

This freedom, Sidney argues, enables the poet to present virtues and vices in a livelier and more affecting way than nature does, as it teaches, delights, and moves the reader at the same time. The poet is superior to both the philosopher and the historian, because he is more concrete than the one and more universal than the other. The Defense also refutes the claim of the Greek philosopher Plato that poets are liars, by arguing that the poet "nothing affirms, and therefore never lieth," and it denies as well the Platonic charge that poetry arouses base desires. Tragedy, for example, "openeth the greatest wounds," in Sidney's account, "and showeth forth the ulcers that are covered with tissue," thereby making "kings fear to be tyrants." Surveying the English literary scene of his own century, Sidney finds little to praise except for Surrey's lyrics, the moralizing verse narratives of the popular midcentury collection A Mirror for Magistrates, and Spenser's Shepheardes Calender; the drama he faults for "mingling kings and clowns" and for unrealistic distortions of time and space. (The great, sprawling plays of Marlowe and Shakespeare, which triumphantly violated many of Sidney's cherished principles, lay just ahead.) The Defense ends with a mock conjuration and a playful curse, reminders of the magical power of poetry, a power that lurks beneath both Sidney's idealism and his precepts.

From The Defense of Poesy

[THE POET AS PROPHET AND CREATOR]

Among the Romans a poet was called vates, which is as much as a diviner, foreseer, or prophet, as by his conjoined words vaticinium and vaticinari<sup>1</sup> is manifest: so heavenly a title did that excellent people bestow upon this heart-ravishing knowledge. And so far were they carried into the admiration thereof, that they thought in the chanceable hitting upon any such verses great foretokens of their following fortunes were placed. Whereupon grew the word of Sortes Virgilianae,<sup>2</sup> when by sudden opening Virgil's book they lighted upon any verse of his making, whereof the histories of the emperors' lives are full: as of Albinus,<sup>3</sup> the governor of our island, who in his childhood met with this verse and in his age performed it. Which, although it were a very vain and godless superstition, as also it was to think spirits were commanded by such verses—whereupon this word charms, derived of carmina,<sup>5</sup> cometh—so yet serveth it to show the great reverence those wits<sup>6</sup> were held in; and altogether not without ground, since both the oracles of Delphos and Sibylla's prophecies<sup>7</sup> were wholly delivered in verses. For that same exquisite observing of number and measure in the words, and that high flying liberty of conceit<sup>8</sup> proper to the poet, did seem to have some divine force in it.

Arma amens capio nec sat rationis in armis<sup>4</sup>

And may not I presume a little further, to show the reasonableness of this word vates, and say that the holy David's<sup>9</sup> Psalms are a divine poem? If I do, I shall not do it without the testimony of great learned men, both ancient and modern. But even the name of Psalms will speak for me, which being interpreted, is nothing but songs; then that it is fully written in meter, as all learned Hebricians agree, although the rules be not yet fully found;<sup>1</sup> lastly and principally, his handling his prophecy, which is merely<sup>2</sup> poetical: for what else is the awaking his musical instruments, the often and free changing of persons, his notable prosopopoeias,<sup>3</sup> when he maketh you, as it were, see God coming in His majesty, his telling of the beasts' joyfulness and hills leaping, but a heavenly poesy, wherein almost<sup>4</sup> he showeth himself a passionate lover of that unspeakable and everlasting beauty to be seen by the eyes of the mind, only cleared by faith? But truly now having named him, I fear me I seem to profane that holy name, applying it to poetry, which is among us thrown down to so ridiculous an estimation. But they that with quiet judgments will look a little deeper into it, shall find the end and working of it such as, being rightly applied, deserveth not to be scourged out of the Church of God.

But now let us see how the Greeks named it, and how they deemed of it. The Greeks called him a "poet," which name hath, as the most excellent, gone through other languages. It cometh of this word poiein, which is, to make: wherein, I know not whether by luck or wisdom, we Englishmen have met with the Greeks in calling him a maker:<sup>5</sup> which name, how high and incomparable a title it is, I had rather were known by marking the scope of other sciences than by any partial<sup>6</sup> allegation.

There is no art delivered to mankind that hath not the works of nature for his principal object, without which they<sup>7</sup> could not consist, and on which they so depend, as they become actors and players, as it were, of what nature will have set forth. So doth the astronomer look upon the stars, and, by that he seeth, set down what order nature hath taken therein. So doth the geometrician and arithmetician in their diverse sorts of quantities. So doth the musician in times tell you which by nature agree,<sup>8</sup> which not. The natural philosopher thereon<sup>9</sup> hath his name, and the moral philosopher standeth upon<sup>1</sup> the natural virtues, vices, or passions of man; and follow nature (saith he) therein, and thou shalt not err. The lawyer saith what men have determined; the historian what men have done. The grammarian speaketh only of the rules of speech; and the rhetorician and logician, considering what in nature will soonest prove and persuade, thereon give artificial rules, which still are compassed within the circle of a question according to the proposed matter.<sup>2</sup> The physician weigheth<sup>3</sup> the nature of man's body, and the nature of things helpful or hurtful unto it. And the metaphysic, though it be in the second and abstract notions, and therefore be counted supernatural,<sup>4</sup> yet doth he indeed build upon the depth of nature. Only the poet, disdaining to be tied to any such subjection, lifted up with the vigor of his own invention, doth grow in effect another nature, in making things either better than nature bringeth forth, or, quite anew, forms such as never were in nature, as the Heroes, Demigods, Cyclops, Chimeras, Furies,<sup>5</sup> and suchlike: so as he goeth hand in hand with nature, not enclosed within the narrow warrant of her gifts, but freely ranging only within the zodiac of his own wit.<sup>6</sup> Nature never set forth the earth in so rich tapestry as divers poets have done; neither with so pleasant rivers, fruitful trees, sweet-smelling flowers, nor whatsoever else may make the too much loved earth more lovely. Her world is brazen, the poets only deliver a golden.<sup>7</sup>

But let those things alone, and go to man—for whom as the other things are, so it seemeth in him her uttermost cunning is employed—and know whether she have brought forth so true a lover as Theagenes, so constant a friend as Pylades, so valiant a man as Orlando, so right a prince as Xenophon's Cyrus,<sup>8</sup> so excellent a man every way as Virgil's Aeneas. Neither let this be jestingly conceived, because the works of the one be essential, the other in imitation or fiction;<sup>9</sup> for any understanding knoweth the skill of each artificer standeth in that idea or fore-conceit<sup>1</sup> of the work, and not in the work itself. And that the poet hath that idea is manifest, by delivering them forth in such excellency as he had imagined them. Which delivering forth also is not wholly imaginative, as we are wont<sup>2</sup> to say by them that build castles in the air; but so far substantially it worketh, not only to make a Cyrus, which had been but a particular excellency as nature might have done, but to bestow a Cyrus upon the world to make many Cyruses, if they will learn aright why and how that maker made him.

Neither let it be deemed too saucy a comparison to balance the highest point of man's wit with the efficacy of nature; but rather give right honor to the heavenly Maker of that maker, who having made man to His own likeness, set him beyond and over all the works of that second nature:<sup>3</sup> which in nothing he showeth so much as in poetry, when with the force of a divine breath he bringeth things forth surpassing her doings—with no small arguments to the incredulous<sup>4</sup> of that first accursed fall of Adam, since our erected wit maketh us know what perfection is, and yet our infected will<sup>5</sup> keepeth us from reaching unto it. But these arguments will by few be understood, and by fewer granted. This much (I hope) will be given me, that the Greeks with some probability of reason gave him<sup>6</sup> the name above all names of learning.

Now let us go to a more ordinary opening<sup>7</sup> of him, that the truth may be the more palpable: and so I hope, though we get not so unmatched a praise as the etymology of his names will grant, yet his very description, which no man will deny, shall not justly be barred from a principal commendation.

[DEFINITION AND CLASSIFICATION OF POETRY]

Poesy therefore is an art of imitation, for so Aristotle termeth it in the word mimesis<sup>8</sup>—that is to say, a representing, counterfeiting, or figuring forth—to speak metaphorically, a speaking picture—with this end, to teach and delight.<sup>9</sup>

Of this have been three general kinds. The chief, both in antiquity and excellency, were they that did imitate the unconceivable excellencies of God. Such were David in his Psalms; Solomon in his Song of Songs, in his Ecclesiastes, and Proverbs; Moses and Deborah in their Hymns;<sup>1</sup> and the writer of Job: which, beside other, the learned Emanuel Tremellius and Franciscus Junius<sup>2</sup> do entitle the poetical part of the Scripture. Against these none will speak that hath the Holy Ghost in due holy reverence. (In this kind, though in a full wrong divinity, were Orpheus, Amphion, Homer in his Hymns,<sup>3</sup> and many other, both Greeks and Romans.) And this poesy must be used by whosoever will follow St. James's counsel in singing psalms when they are merry;<sup>4</sup> and I know is used with the fruit of comfort by some, when, in sorrowful pangs of their death-bringing sins, they find the consolation of the never-leaving goodness.

The second kind is of them that deal with matters philosophical, either moral, as Tyrtaeus, Phocylides, Cato;<sup>5</sup> or natural, as Lucretius and Virgil's Georgics; or astronomical, as Manilius and Pontanus; or historical, as Lucan:<sup>6</sup> which who mislike, the fault is in their judgment quite out of taste, and not in the sweet food of sweetly uttered knowledge.

But because this second sort is wrapped within the fold of the proposed subject, and takes not the course of his own invention, whether they properly be poets or no let grammarians dispute, and go to the third, indeed right<sup>7</sup> poets, of whom chiefly this question ariseth: betwixt whom and these second is such a kind of difference as betwixt the meaner<sup>8</sup> sort of painters, who counterfeit only such faces as are set before them, and the more excellent, who having no law but wit,<sup>9</sup> bestow that in colors upon you which is fittest for the eye to see: as the constant though lamenting look of Lucretia, when she punished in herself another's fault,<sup>1</sup> wherein he painteth not Lucretia, whom he never saw, but painteth the outward beauty of such a virtue. For these third<sup>2</sup> be they which most properly do imitate to teach and delight, and to imitate borrow nothing of what is, hath been, or shall be; but range, only reined with learned discretion, into the divine consideration of what may be and should be. These be they that, as the first and most noble sort may justly be termed vates, so these are waited on in the excellentest languages and best understandings with<sup>3</sup> the fore-described name of poets. For these indeed do merely<sup>4</sup> make to imitate, and imitate both to delight and teach; and delight, to move men to take that goodness in hand, which without delight they would fly as from a stranger; and teach, to make them know that goodness whereunto they are moved—which being the noblest scope to which ever any learning was directed, yet want<sup>5</sup> there not idle tongues to bark at them.

These be subdivided into sundry more special denominations. The most notable be the heroic,<sup>6</sup> lyric, tragic, comic, satiric, iambic, elegiac,<sup>7</sup> pastoral, and certain others, some of these being termed according to the matter they deal with, some by the sorts of verses they liked best to write in; for indeed the greatest part of poets have appareled their poetical inventions in that numbrous<sup>8</sup> kind of writing which is called verse—indeed but appareled, verse being but an ornament and no cause to poetry, since there have been many most excellent poets that never versified, and now swarm many versifiers that need never answer to the name of poets. For Xenophon, who did imitate so excellently as to give us effigiem iusti imperii, the portraiture of a just empire, under the name of Cyrus (as Cicero saith of him), made therein an absolute heroical poem. So did Heliodorus in his sugared invention of that picture of love in Theagenes and Chariclea;<sup>9</sup> and yet both these wrote in prose: which I speak to show that it is not rhyming and versing that maketh a poet—no more than a long gown maketh an advocate,<sup>1</sup> who though he pleaded in armor should be an advocate and no soldier. But it is that feigning notable images of virtues, vices, or what else, with that delightful teaching, which must be the right describing note<sup>2</sup> to know a poet by; although indeed the senate of poets hath chosen verse as their fittest raiment, meaning, as in matter they passed all in all,<sup>3</sup> so in manner to go beyond them: not speaking (table-talk fashion or like men in a dream) words as they chanceably fall from the mouth, but peising<sup>4</sup> each syllable of each word by just proportion according to the dignity of the subject.

[POETRY VERSUS PHILOSOPHY AND HISTORY]

Now therefore it shall not be amiss first to weigh this latter sort of poetry by his works, and then by his parts; and if in neither of these anatomies he be condemnable, I hope we shall obtain a more favorable sentence.<sup>5</sup>

This purifying of wit—this enriching of memory, enabling of judgment, and enlarging of conceit<sup>6</sup>—which commonly we call learning, under what name soever it come forth, or to what immediate end soever it be directed, the final end is to lead and draw us to as high a perfection as our degenerate souls, made worse by their clayey lodgings, can be capable of.

This, according to the inclination of the man, bred many-formed<sup>7</sup> impressions. For some that thought this felicity principally to be gotten by knowledge, and no knowledge to be so high or heavenly as acquaintance with the stars, gave themselves to astronomy; others, persuading themselves to be demigods if they knew the causes of things, became natural and supernatural philosophers; some an admirable delight drew to music; and some the certainty of demonstration to the mathematics. But all, one and other, having this scope: to know, and by knowledge to lift up the mind from the dungeon of the body to the enjoying his own divine essence.

But when by the balance of experience it was found that the astronomer, looking to the stars, might fall in a ditch,<sup>8</sup> that the inquiring philosopher might be blind in himself, and the mathematician might draw forth a straight line with a crooked heart, then lo, did proof, the overruler of opinions, make manifest that all these are but serving sciences, which, as they have each a private<sup>9</sup> end in themselves, so yet are they all directed to the highest end of the mistress-knowledge, by the Greeks called architectonike,<sup>1</sup> which stands (as I think) in the knowledge of a man's self, in the ethic and politic consideration, with the end of well-doing and not of well-knowing only—even as the saddler's next<sup>2</sup> end is to make a good saddle, but his further end to serve a nobler faculty, which is horsemanship, so the horseman's to soldiery, and the soldier not only to have the skill, but to perform the practice of a soldier. So that, the ending end of all earthly learning being virtuous action, those skills that most serve to bring forth that have a most just title to be princes over all the rest.

Wherein, if we can, show we the poet's nobleness, by setting him before his other competitors. Among whom as principal challengers step forth the moral philosophers, whom, methinketh, I see coming towards me with a sullen gravity, as though they could not abide vice by daylight, rudely clothed for to witness outwardly their contempt of outward things, with books in their hands against glory, whereto they set their names, sophistically<sup>3</sup> speaking against subtlety, and angry with any man in whom they see the foul fault of anger. These men casting largess as they go, of definitions, divisions, and distinctions,<sup>4</sup> with a scornful interrogative do soberly ask whether it be possible to find any path so ready to lead a man to virtue as that which teacheth what virtue is; and teach it not only by delivering forth his very being, his causes and effects, but also by making known his enemy, vice, which must be destroyed, and his cumbersome<sup>5</sup> servant, passion, which must be mastered; by showing the generalities that containeth it, and the specialities that are derived from it; lastly, by plain setting down how it extendeth itself out of the limits of a man's own little world to the government of families and maintaining of public societies.

The historian scarcely giveth leisure to the moralist to say so much, but that he, laden with old mouse-eaten records, authorizing himself<sup>6</sup> (for the most part) upon other histories, whose greatest authorities are built upon the notable foundation of hearsay; having much ado to accord differing writers and to pick truth out of their partiality;<sup>7</sup> better acquainted with a thousand years ago than with the present age, and yet better knowing how this world goeth than how his own wit runneth; curious for antiquities and inquisitive of novelties; a wonder to young folks and a tyrant in table talk, denieth, in a great chafe,<sup>8</sup> that any man for teaching of virtue and virtuous actions is comparable to him. "I am testis temporum, lux veritatis, vita memoriae, magistra vitae, nuntia vetustatis."<sup>9</sup> "The philosopher," saith he, "teacheth a disputative virtue, but I do an active. His virtue is excellent in the dangerless Academy of Plato, but mine showeth forth her honorable face in the battles of Marathon, Pharsalia, Poitiers, and Agincourt.<sup>1</sup> He teacheth virtue by certain abstract considerations, but I only bid you follow the footing of them that have gone before you. Old-aged experience goeth beyond the fine-witted philosopher, but I give the experience of many ages. Lastly, if he make the songbook, I put the learner's hand to the lute; and if he be the guide, I am the light." Then would he allege you innumerable examples, confirming story by stories, how much the wisest senators and princes have been directed by the credit of history, as Brutus, Alphonsus of Aragon,<sup>2</sup> and who not, if need be? At length the long line of their disputation maketh a point<sup>3</sup> in this, that the one giveth the precept, and the other<sup>4</sup> the example.

Now whom shall we find (since the question standeth for the highest form in the school of learning) to be moderator?<sup>5</sup> Truly, as me seemeth, the poet; and if not a moderator, even the man that ought to carry the title from them both, and much more from all other serving sciences. Therefore compare we the poet with the historian and with the moral philosopher; and if he go beyond them both, no other human skill can match him. For as for the divine,<sup>6</sup> with all reverence it is ever to be excepted, not only for having his scope as far beyond any of these as eternity exceedeth a moment, but even for passing<sup>7</sup> each of these in themselves. And for the lawyer, though Ius<sup>8</sup> be the daughter of Justice, and justice the chief of virtues, yet because he seeketh to make men good rather formidine poenae than virtutis amore;<sup>9</sup> or, to say righter, doth not endeavor to make men good, but that their evil hurt not others; having no care, so he be a good citizen, how bad a man he be: therefore as our wickedness maketh him<sup>1</sup> necessary, and necessity maketh him honorable, so is he not in the deepest truth to stand in rank with these<sup>2</sup> who all endeavor to take naughtiness away and plant goodness even in the secretest cabinet<sup>3</sup> of our souls. And these four are all that any way deal in that consideration of men's manners,<sup>4</sup> which being the supreme knowledge, they that best breed it deserve the best commendation.

The philosopher, therefore, and the historian are they which would win the goal, the one by precept, the other by example. But both, not having both, do both halt.<sup>5</sup> For the philosopher, setting down with thorny arguments the bare rule, is so hard of utterance and so misty to be conceived, that one that hath no other guide but him shall wade in him till he be old before he shall find sufficient cause to be honest.<sup>6</sup> For his knowledge standeth so upon the abstract and general, that happy<sup>7</sup> is that man who may understand him, and more happy that can apply what he doth understand. On the other side, the historian, wanting<sup>8</sup> the precept, is so tied, not to what should be but to what is, to the particular truth of things and not to the general reason of things, that his example draweth no necessary consequence, and therefore a less fruitful doctrine.

Now doth the peerless poet perform both: for whatsoever the philosopher saith should be done, he giveth a perfect picture of it in someone by whom he presupposeth it was done, so as he coupleth the general notion with the particular example. A perfect picture I say, for he yieldeth to the powers of the mind an image of that whereof the philosopher bestoweth but a wordish description, which doth neither strike, pierce, nor possess the sight of the soul so much as that other doth. For as in outward things, to a man that had never seen an elephant or a rhinoceros, who should tell him most exquisitely<sup>9</sup> all their shapes, color, bigness, and particular marks, or of a gorgeous palace the architecture, with declaring the full beauties, might well make the hearer able to repeat, as it were by rote, all he had heard, yet should never satisfy his inward conceit<sup>1</sup> with being witness to itself of a true lively knowledge; but the same man, as soon as he might see those beasts well painted, or that house well in model, should straightways grow, without need of any description, to a judicial<sup>2</sup> comprehending of them: so no doubt the philosopher with his learned definitions—be it of virtue, vices, matters of public policy or private government<sup>3</sup>—replenisheth the memory with many infallible grounds of wisdom, which, notwithstanding, lie dark before the imaginative and judging power, if they be not illuminated or figured forth<sup>4</sup> by the speaking picture of poesy.

Tully<sup>5</sup> taketh much pains, and many times not without poetical helps, to make us know the force love of our country hath in us. Let us but hear old Anchises speaking in the midst of Troy's flames, or see Ulysses in the fullness of all Calypso's delights bewail his absence from barren and beggarly Ithaca.<sup>6</sup> Anger, the Stoics said, was a short madness:<sup>7</sup> let but Sophocles bring you Ajax on a stage, killing or whipping sheep and oxen, thinking them the army of Greeks,<sup>8</sup> with their chieftains Agamemnon and Menelaus, and tell me if you have not a more familiar insight into anger than finding in the schoolmen his genus and difference.<sup>9</sup> See whether wisdom and temperance in Ulysses and Diomedes, valor in Achilles, friendship in Nisus and Euryalus,<sup>1</sup> even to an ignorant man carry not an apparent shining;<sup>2</sup> and, contrarily, the remorse of conscience in Oedipus, the soon repenting pride in Agamemnon, the self-devouring cruelty in his father Atreus, the violence of ambition in the two Theban brothers, the sour-sweetness of revenge in Medea;<sup>3</sup> and, to fall lower, the Terentian Gnatho and our Chaucer's Pandar<sup>4</sup> so expressed that we now use their names to signify their trades: and finally, all virtues, vices, and passions so in their own natural seats laid to the view, that we seem not to hear of them, but clearly to see through them.

But even in the most excellent determination of goodness, what philosopher's counsel can so readily direct a prince, as the feigned Cyrus in Xenophon; or a virtuous man in all fortunes, as Aeneas in Virgil; or a whole commonwealth, as the way of Sir Thomas More's Utopia? I say the way, because where Sir Thomas More erred, it was the fault of the man and not of the poet, for that way of patterning a commonwealth was most absolute,<sup>5</sup> though he perchance hath not so absolutely performed it. For the question is, whether the feigned image of poetry or the regular instruction of philosophy hath the more force in teaching: wherein if the philosophers have more rightly showed themselves philosophers than the poets have attained to the high top of their profession, as in truth

Mediocribus esse poetis,
Non dii, non homines, non concessere columnae;<sup>6</sup>

it is, I say again, not the fault of the art, but that by few men that art can be accomplished.

Certainly, even our Savior Christ could as well have given the moral commonplaces of uncharitableness and humbleness as the divine narration of Dives and Lazarus; or of disobedience and mercy, as that heavenly discourse of the lost child and the gracious father;<sup>7</sup> but that His through-searching wisdom knew the estate<sup>8</sup> of Dives burning in hell, and of Lazarus in Abraham's bosom, would more constantly (as it were) inhabit both the memory and judgment. Truly, for myself, meseems I see before mine eyes the lost child's disdainful prodigality, turned to envy a swine's dinner: which by the learned divines are thought not historical acts,<sup>9</sup> but instructing parables.

For conclusion, I say the philosopher teacheth, but he teacheth obscurely, so as the learned only can understand him, that is to say, he teacheth them that are already taught; but the poet is the food for the tenderest stomachs, the poet is indeed the right popular philosopher, whereof Aesop's tales give good proof: whose pretty allegories, stealing under the formal<sup>1</sup> tales of beasts, make many, more beastly than beasts, begin to hear the sound of virtue from these dumb speakers.

But now may it be alleged that if this imagining of matters be so fit for the imagination, then must the historian needs surpass, who bringeth you images of true matters; such as indeed were done, and not such as fantastically or falsely may be suggested to have been done. Truly, Aristotle himself, in his discourse of poesy, plainly determineth this question, saying that poetry is philosophoterion and spoudaioteron, that is to say, it is more philosophical and more studiously serious than history.<sup>2</sup> His reason is, because poesy dealeth with katholou, that is to say, with the universal consideration, and the history with kathekaston, the particular: now, saith he, the universal weighs what is fit to be said or done, either in likelihood or necessity (which the poesy considereth in his imposed names), and the particular only marks whether Alcibiades did, or suffered, this or that.<sup>3</sup> Thus far Aristotle: which reason of his (as all his) is most full of reason. For indeed, if the question were whether it were better to have a particular act truly or falsely set down, there is no doubt which is to be chosen, no more than whether you had rather have Vespasian's<sup>4</sup> picture right as he was, or, at the painter's pleasure, nothing resembling. But if the question be for your own use and learning, whether it be better to have it set down as it should be, or as it was, then certainly is more doctrinable<sup>5</sup> the feigned Cyrus in Xenophon than the true Cyrus in Justin, and the feigned Aeneas in Virgil than the right Aeneas in Dares Phrygius:<sup>6</sup> as to a lady that desired to fashion her countenance to the best grace, a painter should more benefit her to portraiture a most sweet face, writing Canidia upon it, than to paint Canidia as she was, who, Horace sweareth, was full ill-favored.<sup>7</sup>

If the poet do his part aright, he will show you in Tantalus, Atreus,<sup>8</sup> and suchlike, nothing that is not to be shunned; in Cyrus, Aeneas, Ulysses, each thing to be followed; where the historian, bound to tell things as things were, cannot be liberal (without he will be poetical) of a perfect pattern, but, as in Alexander or Scipio himself,<sup>9</sup> show doings, some to be liked, some to be disliked. And then how will you discern what to follow but by your own discretion, which you had without reading Quintus Curtius? And whereas a man may say, though in universal consideration of doctrine the poet prevaieth, yet that the history,<sup>1</sup> in his saying such a thing was done, doth warrant a man more in that he shall follow<sup>2</sup>—the answer is manifest: that, if he stand upon that was (as if he should argue, because it rained yesterday, therefore it should rain today), then indeed hath it some advantage to a gross conceit;<sup>3</sup> but if he know an example only informs a conjectured likelihood, and so go by reason,<sup>4</sup> the poet doth so far exceed him<sup>5</sup> as he is to frame his example to that which is most reasonable (be it in warlike, politic, or private matters), where the historian in his bare "was" hath many times that which we call fortune to overrule the best wisdom. Many times he must tell events whereof he can yield no cause; or, if he do, it must be poetically.

For that a feigned example hath as much force to teach as a true example (for as for to move, it is clear, since the feigned may be tuned to the highest key of passion), let us take one example wherein an historian and a poet did concur. Herodotus and Justin do both testify that Zopyrus, King Darius' faithful servant, seeing his master long resisted by the rebellious Babylonians, feigned himself in extreme disgrace of his king: for verifying of which, he caused his own nose and ears to be cut off, and so flying to the Babylonians was received, and for his known valor so sure credited, that he did find means to deliver them over to Darius.<sup>6</sup> Much like matter doth Livy record of Tarquinius and his son. Xenophon excellently feigneth such another stratagem performed by Abradatas in Cyrus' behalf. Now would I fain know, if occasion be presented unto you to serve your prince by such an honest dissimulation, why you do not as well learn it of Xenophon's fiction as of the other's verity; and truly so much the better, as you shall save your nose by the bargain: for Abradatas did not counterfeit so far. So then the best of the historian is subject to the poet; for whatsoever action, or faction, whatsoever counsel, policy, or war stratagem the historian is bound to recite, that may the poet (if he list)<sup>7</sup> with his imitation make his own, beautifying it both for further teaching and more delighting, as it please him: having all, from Dante's heaven to his hell, under the authority of his pen. Which if I be asked what poets have done so, as I might well name some, so yet say I, and say again, I speak of the art, and not of the artificer.

Now, to that which commonly is attributed to the praise of history, in respect of the notable learning is got by marking the success,<sup>8</sup> as though therein a man should see virtue exalted and vice punished—truly that commendation is particular to poetry, and far off from history. For indeed poetry ever sets virtue so out in her best colors, making Fortune her well-waiting handmaid, that one must needs be enamored of her. Well may you see Ulysses in a storm,<sup>9</sup> and in other hard plights; but they are but exercises of patience and magnanimity, to make them shine the more in the near-following prosperity. And of the contrary part, if evil men come to the stage, they ever go out (as the tragedy writer<sup>1</sup> answered to one that misliked the show of such persons) so manacled as they little animate folks to follow them. But the history, being captived to the truth of a foolish world, is many times a terror<sup>2</sup> from well-doing, and an encouragement to unbridled wickedness. For see we not valiant Miltiades<sup>3</sup> rot in his fetters? The just Phocion<sup>4</sup> and the accomplished Socrates put to death like traitors? The cruel Severus<sup>5</sup> live prosperously? The excellent Severus<sup>6</sup> miserably murdered? Sulla and Marius<sup>7</sup> dying in their beds? Pompey and Cicero<sup>8</sup> slain then when they would have thought exile a happiness? See we not virtuous Cato driven to kill himself,<sup>9</sup> and rebel Caesar so advanced that his name yet, after 1600 years, lasteth in the highest honor? And mark but even Caesar's own words of the aforementioned Sulla (who in that only did honestly, to put down his dishonest tyranny), litteras nescivit, as if want of learning caused him to do well.<sup>1</sup> He meant it not by<sup>2</sup> poetry, which, not content with earthly plagues, deviseth new punishments in hell for tyrants, nor yet by philosophy, which teacheth occidendos esse;<sup>3</sup> but no doubt by skill in history, for that indeed can afford you Cypselus, Periander, Phalaris, Dionysius,<sup>4</sup> and I know not how many more of the same kennel, that speed<sup>5</sup> well enough in their abominable injustice of usurpation.

I conclude, therefore, that he<sup>6</sup> excelleth history, not only in furnishing the mind with knowledge, but in setting it forward to that which deserveth to be called and accounted good: which setting forward, and moving to well-doing, indeed setteth the laurel crown upon the poets as victorious, not only of the historian, but over the philosopher, howsoever in teaching it may be questionable.<sup>7</sup>

For suppose it be granted (that which I suppose with great reason may be denied) that the philosopher, in respect of his methodical proceeding, doth teach more perfectly than the poet, yet do I think that no man is so much philophilosophos<sup>8</sup> as to compare the philosopher in moving with the poet. And that moving is of a higher degree than teaching, it may by this appear, that it is well nigh both the cause and effect of teaching. For who will be taught, if he be not moved with desire to be taught? And what so much good doth that teaching bring forth (I speak still of moral doctrine) as that it moveth one to do that which it doth teach? For, as Aristotle saith, it is not gnosis but praxis<sup>9</sup> must be the fruit. And how praxis cannot be, without being moved to practice, it is no hard matter to consider.

The philosopher sheweth you the way, he informeth you of the particularities, as well of the tediousness of the way, as of the pleasant lodging you shall have when your journey is ended, as of the many by-turnings that may divert you from your way. But this is to no man but to him that will read him, and read him with attentive studious painfulness;<sup>1</sup> which constant desire whosoever hath in him, hath already passed half the hardness of the way, and therefore is beholding to the philosopher but for the other half. Nay truly, learned men have learnedly thought that where once reason hath so much overmastered passion as that the mind hath a free desire to do well, the inward light each mind hath in itself is as good as a philosopher's book; since in nature<sup>2</sup> we know it is well to do well, and what is well, and what is evil, although not in the words of art which philosophers bestow upon us; for out of natural conceit<sup>3</sup> the philosophers drew it. But to be moved to do that which we know, or to be moved with desire to know, hoc opus, hic labor est.<sup>4</sup>

Now therein of all sciences (I speak still of human,<sup>5</sup> and according to the human conceit) is our poet the monarch. For he doth not only show the way, but giveth so sweet a prospect into the way, as will entice any man to enter into it. Nay, he doth, as if your journey should lie through a fair vineyard, at the first give you a cluster of grapes, that full of that taste, you may long to pass further. He beginneth not with obscure definitions, which must blur the margin with interpretations and load the memory with doubtfulness; but he cometh to you with words set in delightful proportion, either accompanied with, or prepared for, the well enchanting skill of music; and with a tale forsooth he cometh unto you, with a tale which holdeth children from play, and old men from the chimney corner. And, pretending no more, doth intend the winning of the mind from wickedness to virtue—even as the child is often brought to take most wholesome things by hiding them in such other as have a pleasant taste, which, if one should begin to tell them the nature of aloes or rhabarbarum<sup>6</sup> they should receive, would sooner take their physic at their ears than at their mouth.<sup>7</sup> So is it in men (most of which are childish in the best things, till they be cradled in their graves): glad will they be to hear the tales of Hercules, Achilles, Cyrus, Aeneas; and, hearing them, must needs hear the right description of wisdom, valor, and justice; which, if they had been barely, that is to say philosophically, set out, they would swear they be brought to school again.

That imitation whereof poetry is hath the most conveniency<sup>8</sup> to nature of all other, insomuch that, as Aristotle saith, those things which in themselves are horrible, as cruel battles, unnatural monsters, are made in poetical imitation delightful.<sup>9</sup> Truly, I have known men that even with reading Amadis de Gaule<sup>1</sup> (which God knoweth wanteth much of a perfect poesy) have found their hearts moved to the exercise of courtesy, liberality, and especially courage. Who readeth Aeneas carrying old Anchises on his back, that wisheth not it were his fortune to perform so excellent an act? Whom doth not these words of Turnus move, the tale of Turnus having planted his image in the imagination,

Fugientem haec terra videbit?

Usque adeone mori miserum est?<sup>2</sup>

Where the philosophers, as they scorn to delight, so much they be content little to move—saving wrangling whether virtus<sup>3</sup> be the chief or the only good, whether the contemplative or the active life do excell—which Plato and Boethius well knew, and therefore made Mistress Philosophy very often borrow the masking raiment of poesy.<sup>4</sup> For even those hard-hearted evil men who think virtue a school name, and know no other good but indulgere genio,<sup>5</sup> and therefore despise the austere admonitions of the philosopher, and feel not the inward reason they stand upon, yet will be content to be delighted—which is all the good-fellow poet seemeth to promise—and so steal<sup>6</sup> to see the form of goodness (which seen they cannot but love) ere themselves be aware, as if they took a medicine of cherries.

Infinite proofs of the strange effects of this poetical invention might be alleged; only two shall serve, which are so often remembered as I think all men know them. The one of Menenius Agrippa,<sup>7</sup> who, when the whole people of Rome had resolutely divided themselves from the senate, with apparent show of utter ruin, though he were (for that time) an excellent orator, came not among them upon trust of figurative speeches or cunning insinuations, and much less with far-fet<sup>8</sup> maxims of philosophy, which (especially if they were Platonic) they must have learned geometry before they could well have conceived;<sup>9</sup> but forsooth he behaves himself like a homely and familiar poet. He telleth them a tale, that there was a time when all the parts of the body made a mutinous conspiracy against the belly, which they thought devoured the fruits of each other's labor; they concluded they would let so unprofitable a spender starve. In the end, to be short (for the tale is notorious, and as notorious that it was a tale), with punishing the belly they plagued themselves. This applied by him wrought such effect in the people, as I never read that only words brought forth but then<sup>1</sup> so sudden and so good an alteration; for upon reasonable conditions a perfect reconciliation ensued. The other is of Nathan the prophet, who, when the holy David had so far forsaken God as to confirm adultery with murder,<sup>2</sup> when he was to do the tenderest office of a friend in laying his own shame before his eyes, sent by God to call again so chosen a servant, how doth he it but by telling of a man whose beloved lamb was ungratefully<sup>3</sup> taken from his bosom? The application most divinely true, but the discourse itself feigned; which made David (I speak of the second and instrumental cause<sup>4</sup>) as in a glass see his own filthiness, as that heavenly psalm of mercy<sup>5</sup> well testifieth.

By these, therefore, examples and reasons, I think it may be manifest that the poet, with that same hand of delight, doth draw the mind more effectually than any other art doth. And so a conclusion<sup>6</sup> not unfitly ensue: that, as virtue is the most excellent resting place for all worldly learning to make his end of, so poetry, being the most familiar<sup>7</sup> to teach it, and most princely to move towards it, in the most excellent work is the most excellent workman.

[CONCLUSION]

So that since the ever-praiseworthy Poesy is full of virtue-breeding delightfulness, and void of no gift that ought to be in the noble name of learning;<sup>8</sup> since the blames laid against it are either false or feeble; since the cause why it is not esteemed in England is the fault of poet-apes,<sup>9</sup> not poets; since, lastly, our tongue is most fit to honor poesy, and to be honored by poesy; I conjure you all that have had the evil luck to read this ink-wasting toy of mine, even in the name of the nine Muses, no more to scorn the sacred mysteries of poesy; no more to laugh at the name of poets, as though they were next inheritors to fools; no more to jest at the reverent title of a rhymers; but to believe, with Aristotle, that they were the ancient treasurers of the Grecians' divinity; to believe, with Bembus, that they were first bringers-in of all civility; to believe, with Scaliger, that no philosopher's precepts can sooner make you an honest man than the reading of Virgil; to believe, with Clauserus, the translator of Cornutus, that it pleased the heavenly Deity, by Hesiod<sup>1</sup> and Homer, under the veil of fables, to give us all knowledge, logic, rhetoric, philosophy natural and moral, and quid non?;<sup>2</sup> to believe, with me, that there are many mysteries contained in poetry, which of purpose were written darkly, lest by profane wits it should be abused; to believe, with Landino,<sup>3</sup> that they are so beloved of the gods that whatsoever they write proceeds of a divine fury;<sup>4</sup> lastly, to believe themselves, when they tell you they will make you immortal by their verses. Thus doing, your name shall flourish in the printers' shops; thus doing, you shall be of kin to many a poetical preface; thus doing, you shall be most fair, most rich, most wise, most all, you shall dwell upon superlatives; thus doing, though you be libertino patre natus,<sup>5</sup> you shall suddenly grow Herculea proles,<sup>6</sup>

thus doing, your soul shall be placed with Dante's Beatrice, or Virgil's Anchises.<sup>8</sup> But if (fie of such a but) you be born so near the dull-making cataract of Nilus that you cannot hear the planet-like<sup>9</sup> music of poetry; if you have so earth-creeping a mind that it cannot lift itself up to look to the sky of poetry, or rather, by a certain rustical disdain, will become such a mome as to be a Momus<sup>1</sup> of poetry; then, though I will not wish unto you the ass's ears of Midas,<sup>2</sup> nor to be driven by a poet's verses, as Bubonax<sup>3</sup> was, to hang himself, nor to be rhymed to death, as is said to be done in Ireland;<sup>4</sup> yet thus much curse I must send you, in the behalf of all poets, that while you live, you live in love, and never get favor for lacking skill of a sonnet;<sup>5</sup> and, when you die, your memory die from the earth for want of an epitaph.

- Note 3: The Homeric Hymns are a collection of ancient Greek poems addressed to various gods and formerly attributed to Homer. Similarly, Orpheus (the archetypal poet of Greek mythology) was thought to be the author of a group of poems that expound the beliefs of a Greek mystery-religion. The lyre playing of Amphion (a son of Zeus) moved stones to form themselves into the walls of Thebes. Return to reference 3

- Note 5: The Roman Marcus Cato was the author of Disticha de moribus, an immensely popular collection, in verse and prose, of moral maxims. Tyrtaeus and Phocylides are among the Greek poets Sidney has previously mentioned. Return to reference 5

- Note 6: Lucan wrote De bello civili (On the Civil War; also known as the Pharsalia), an epic poem on the struggle between Caesar and Pompey. Lucretius wrote a philosophical poem, De rerum natura (On the Nature of Things). Virgil's Georgics exalts the life and work of the farmer. Manilius wrote a long poem titled Astronomica. The 15th-century Italian writer Pontanus—the only postclassical poet in this list—was the author of another celebrated astronomical poem, Urania.Return to reference 6

- Note 3: Alcibiades, an Athenian politician and disciple of Socrates, died in 404 B.C.E.—twenty years before Aristotle’s birth. Sidney’s summary of Aristotle’s passage is accurate, with the important exception that he imposes the notion that Aristotelian universals have a morally prescriptive force, weighing “what is fit to be said or done.” Aristotle says only that “by a universal statement I mean one as to what such or such a kind of man will probably or necessarily say or do.”Return to reference 3

- Note 5: Instructive.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Mentioned in the Iliad, Dares Phrygius was the supposed author of an eyewitness account of the Trojan War. Justin was a Roman historian of the 2nd or 3rd century C.E. who wrote an abridgment of a now-lost universal history by one Trogus.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: For the lost looks of the witch Canidia, see Horace, Epodes 5.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Figures from Greek mythology. In one version of his story, Tantalus served up his son at a banquet for the gods; similarly, his grandson Atreus served his brother’s children to him.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Alexander the Great was often represented—for example, by the Roman historian Quintus Curtius—as having been corrupted by power; and even Scipio Africanus—the conqueror of Hannibal and one of the most unreservedly admired Romans—was, in his later years, accused of political misconduct. “Cannot be liberal . . . of”: is not at liberty to give.Return to reference 9
